This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

+ Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.

+ Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.

+ Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.

+ Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. PUBLISHED BY BLAIR AND RIVES, AT ONE DOLLAR PER SESSION, IN ADVANCE.

27TH CONG.....3D SESS. SATURDAY, DECEMBER 3, 1842. VOLUME 12····No. 1.

[The Senate of the United States, in secret session, on the 30th of August, 1842, passed the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the injunction of secrecy be removed from the British treaty, the correspondence which accompanied it, and all the proceedings of the Senate thereon, embracing the speeches and remarks of Senators, as soon as the ratifications of the said treaty shall have been exchanged, and it shall have been proclaimed by the President of the United States."

The ratifications of the treaty were not exchanged in time for us to publish the proceedings, correspondence, and speeches thereon, in the Congressional Globe and Appendix for the last session of Congress, to which they properly belong. Therefore, in order to preserve these important papers, we shall publish them in our Congressional Globe and Appendix for the coming session of Congress. The proceedings and the correspondence we shall publish in the Congressional Globe. The speeches made by the Senators in secret session we shall publish in the Appendix, as fast as they come to our hands. They will all be contained, probably, in the second, third, and fourth numbers of the Appendix: the first number, and part of the second, it is supposed, will be occupied by the President's annual message to Congress, and the reports of the several heads of departments, which may accompany it.

We shall print between four and five thousand surplus copies of the Congressional Globe and Appendix, for the purpose of furnishing complete copies to all persons who may subscribe for those works before the first day of January next.

We shall send to some of our friends a copy of this number of the Congressional Globe, with a Prospectus in it, with the hope that they will obtain some subscribers for us.—EDITORS CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.]

PROCEEDINGS OF THE SENATE ON THE BRITISH TREATY, IN SECRET SESSION.

THURSDAY, August 11, 1842.

The message was read.

The treaty to settle and define the boundaries between the territories of the United States and the possessions of her Britannic Majesty in North America, for the final suppression of the African slave-trade, and for the giving up of criminals fugitive from justice, in certain cases, was read twice by unanimous consent.

On motion by Mr. Rives,

Ordered, That the treaty, with the message and accompanying documents, be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and printed, in confidence, for the use of the Senate.

MONDAY, August 15, 1842.

Mr. Rives, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred, on the 11th instant, the treaty with Great Britain, reported the same without amendment.

On motion by Mr. Rives,

Ordered, That the said treaty be postponed to, and made the order of the day for, Wednesday next, the 17th instant, at 1 o'clock.

WEDNESDAY, August 17, 1842.

The Senate proceeded to consider, as in committee of the whole, the treaty with Great Britain; and, after debate,

On motion by Mr. Rives,

Ordered, That it be postponed to, and made the order of the day for, to-morrow, at half-past eleven o'clock.

THURSDAY, August 18, 1842.

Mr. Conrad submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President be requested to furnish to the Senate all documents on file in the State Department, connected with the liberation of certain slaves, the property of American citizens, which were taken from the wreck of the schooner Hermosa, near Abaco, were carried into Nassau, and then liberated by the colonial authorities; also, copies of any correspondence which may have taken place on the subject of said slaves, between the minister of the United States at the Court of St. James, and the British Government.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the said resolution, and agreed thereto.

Ordered, That the Secretary lay the said resolution before the President of the United States.

The President pro tempore informed the Senate that the Secretary, having laid before the President of the United States the resolution passed this day, requesting the documents and correspondence relative to the slaves on board the Hermosa, the papers called for were forthwith delivered to him by the Secretary of State, with a request that, as they were originals, they might, at a proper time, be returned to the department.

The Senate resumed, as in committee of the whole, the consideration of the treaty with Great Britain; and, after debate,

On motion by Mr. King,

Ordered, That it be postponed to, and made the order of the day for, to-morrow, at half-past eleven o'clock.

FRIDAY, August 19, 1842.

The Senate resumed, as in committee of the whole, the consideration of the treaty with Great Britain; and, after debate, no amendment having been made, the treaty was reported to the Senate.

Mr. Williams submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the treaty and documents now under consideration be recommitted to the Committee on Foreign Relations, with instructions to report a resolution, directing the President of the United States to take immediate possession of the disputed territory, and to report such contingent measures as, in their opinion, may be necessary to maintain the just right of the nation.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the said resolution; and,

On the question to agree thereto,

It was determined in the negative—yeas 8, nays 34.

On motion by Mr. Williams, (the yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,)

Those who voted in the affirmative are—

Messrs. Allen, Bagby, Fulton, Linn, Smith of Connecticut, Sturgeon, Walker, Williams.

Those who voted in the negative are—

Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Choate, Clayton, Conrad, Crafts, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Dayton, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, Kerr, Mangum, Miller, Morehead, Porter, Preston, Rives, Smith of Indiana, Tallmadge, Tappan, White, Woodbridge, Woodbury, Young.

So the resolution was rejected.

On motion by Mr. Benton,

To strike out the eighth article from the treaty,

The question was stated—"Shall the eighth article stand as part of the treaty?" and, after debate,

On motion by Mr. Sevier,

The Senate adjourned.

SATURDAY, August 20, 1842.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the treaty with Great Britain; and,

The question recurring, "Shall the eighth article stand as part of the treaty?" after debate,

It was determined in the affirmative—yeas 37, nays 12.

Those who voted in the affirmative are—

Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Calhoun, Choate, Clayton, Conrad, Crafts, Crittenden, Dayton, Evans, Fulton, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, Kerr, King, Mangum, Merrick, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Porter, Preston, Rives, Simmons, Smith of Indiana, Sprague, Tallmadge, Walker, White, Wilcox, Williams, Woodbridge, Young.

Those who voted in the negative are—

Messrs. Allen, Bagby, Benton, Buchanan, Cuthbert, Linn, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Sturgeon, Tappan, Woodbury, Wright.

On motion by Mr. Benton,

To strike out of the first article of the treaty the following words:

"To the outlet of the Lake Pohenagamook; thence southwestwardly, in a straight line, to a point on the northwest branch of the river St. John, which point shall be ten miles distant from the main branch of the St. John, in a straight line, and in the nearest direction; but if the said point shall be found to be less than seven miles from the nearest point of the summit or crest of the highlands that divide those rivers which empty themselves into the river St. Lawrence from those which fall into the river St. John, then the said point shall be made to recede down the said northwest branch of the river St. John, to a point seven miles, in a straight line, from the said summit or crest; thence in a straight line, in a course about south eight degrees west, to the point where the parallel of latitude of 46° 25′ north intersects the southwest branch of the St. John; thence southerly, by the said branch, to the source thereof in the highlands at the Metjarmette portage."

After debate, on the question, Shall these words stand as part of the first article?

It was determined in the affirmative—yeas 38, nays 11.

Those who voted in the affirmative are—

Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Calhoun, Choate, Clayton, Conrad, Crafts, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Dayton, Evans, Fulton, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, Kerr, King, Mangum, Merrick, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Porter, Preston, Rives, Sevier, Simmons, Smith of Indiana, Sprague, Tallmadge, Tappan, White, Woodbridge, Woodbury, and Wright.

Those who voted in the negative are—

Messrs. Allen, Bagby, Benton, Buchanan, Linn, Smith of Connecticut, Sturgeon, Walker, Wilcox, Williams, and Young.

Mr. Benton submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the treaty and documents now under consideration be recommitted to the Committee on Foreign Relations, with instructions to report an amendment to the treaty, stipulating the right of the vessels of the United States, driven by tempest or carried by violence into any of the British West India islands, to depart from the same with all their contents of persons and property, with all convenient despatch, and after receiving the hospitable treatment due to misfortune.

After debate, on the question to agree thereto,

It was determined in the negative—yeas 11, nays 37.

On motion by Mr. Benton,

The yeas and nays being desired by one fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are—

Messrs. Allen, Bagby, Benton, Buchanan, Conrad, Linn, Smith of Connecticut, Sturgeon, Walker, Williams, and Young.

Those who voted in the negative are—

Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Calhoun, Choate, Clayton, Crafts, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Dayton, Evans, Fulton, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, Kerr, King, Mangum, Merrick, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Porter, Preston, Rives, Sevier, Simmons, Smith of Indiana, Sprague, Tallmadge, Tappan, White, Wilcox, Woodbridge, and Woodbury.

So the resolution was rejected.

Mr. Benton submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the treaty and documents now under consideration be recommitted to the Committee on Foreign Relations, with instructions to report a resolution directing the President of the United States to take immediate possession of the disputed territory up to the line designated by the King of the Netherlands, and to maintain the State of Maine in possession of the territory south of that line.

After debate, on the question to agree thereto,

It was determined in the negative—yeas 2, nays 37.

On motion by Mr. Benton,

The yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are—

Messrs. Benton, Sevier.

Those who voted in the negative are—

Messrs. Archer, Bagby, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Calhoun, Choate, Clayton, Conrad, Crafts, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Dayton, Evans, Fulton, Henderson, Huntington, Kerr, King, Mangum, Merrick, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Porter, Preston, Rives, Simmons, Smith of Indiana, Sprague, Sturgeon, Tallmadge, Tappan, White, Wilcox, Woodbridge.

So the resolution was rejected.

On motion by Mr. Tappan,

To strike out of the fifth article the following words, viz:

"And further to pay and satisfy said States, respectively, for all claims for expenses incurred by them in protecting the said heretofore disputed territory, and making a survey thereof, in 1838; the Government of the United States agreeing with the States of Maine and Massachusetts to pay them the further sum of three hundred thousand dollars, in equal moieties, on account of their assent to the line of boundary described in this treaty, and in consideration of the conditions and equivalents received therefor from the Government of her Britannic Majesty;"

After debate, on the question, "Shall these words stand as part of the fifth article?"

It was determined in the affirmative—yeas 34, nays 10.

Those who voted in the affirmative are—

Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Calhoun, Choate, Clayton, Crafts, Cuthbert, Dayton, Evans, Fulton, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, Kerr, King, Mangum, Merrick, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Porter, Rives, Sevier, Simmons, Smith of Indiana, Sprague, Tallmadge, White, Wilcox, Woodbridge, Young.

Those who voted in the negative are—

Messrs. Allen, Bagby, Benton, Buchanan, Conrad, Crittenden, Linn, Smith of Connecticut, Sturgeon, Tappan.

No further amendment having been proposed,

Mr. Rives submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, (two-thirds of the Senators present concurring,) That the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of the treaty to settle and define the boundaries between the territories of the United States and the possessions of her Britannic Majesty in North America, for the final suppression of the African slave-trade, and for the giving up of criminals fugitive from justice, in certain cases.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the said resolution.

On the question to agree thereto,

It was determined in the affirmative—yeas 39, nays 9.

Those who voted in the affirmative are—

Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Calhoun, Choate, Clayton, Crafts, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Dayton, Evans, Fulton, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, Kerr, King, Mangum, Merrick, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Porter, Preston, Rives, Sevier, Simmons, Smith of Indiana, Sprague, Tallmadge, Tappan, Walker, White, Woodbridge, Woodbury, Wright, Young.

Those who voted in the negative are—

Messrs. Allen, Bagby, Benton, Buchanan, Conrad, Linn, Smith of Connecticut, Sturgeon, Williams.

So the resolution was agreed to.

Ordered, That the Secretary lay the said resolution before the President of the United States.

TUESDAY, August 23, 1842.

Mr. Crittenden submitted the following resolution:

Resolved by the Senate, That the injunction of secrecy be removed as to the late treaty with Great Britain, and the proceedings of the Senate thereon; except only that this resolution shall not authorize the publication of said treaty, or any amendment proposed, or proceeding relating thereto, or any speech made in the Senate on its consideration and discussion.

After debate, on motion by Mr. Wright,

Ordered, That the said resolution lie on the table.

WEDNESDAY, August 24, 1842.

On motion by Mr. Conrad,

Ordered, That the Secretary of the Senate return to the Department of State the original papers obtained from that department, under the resolution of the 18th instant, relating to the slaves that were taken from the wreck of the schooner Hermosa, and liberated by the British colonial authorities at Nassau.

MONDAY, August 29, 1842.

Mr. Benton submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the injunction of secrecy be forthwith removed from the treaty with Great Britain, the correspondence which accompanied it, and the proceedings thereon, including the speeches and remarks of the Senators.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the said resolution.

On motion by Mr. Preston,

That the said resolution be referred to a select committee to consider and report thereon,

It was determined in the negative.

On motion by Mr. Rives,

That the said resolution be amended by adding thereto the following:

"As soon as the treaty shall have been proclaimed by the President of the United States as having been duly ratified by both parties."

On motion by Mr. Barrow,

Ordered, That the said resolution lie on the table.

Mr. Benton submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to inform the Senate whether any conferences, written or oral, formal or informal, took place between the American negotiator and the late special minister from Great Britain to the United States, in relation to the payment, assumption, or guarantee of the State debts by the United States; and, if so, to communicate the same to the Senate.

TUESDAY, August 30, 1842.

On motion by Mr. Benton,

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution submitted by him yesterday, together with the amendment proposed thereto by Mr. Rives; and the amendment was rejected.

On motion by Mr. Tallmadge,

That the resolution submitted by Mr. Benton lie on the table,

It was determined in the negative—yeas 16, nays 19.

On motion by Mr. Allen,

The yeas and nays being desired by one fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are—

Messrs. Barrow, Bates, Berrien, Calhoun, Clayton, Evans, Graham, Huntington, Miller, Phelps, Porter, Rives, Sevier, Tallmadge, White, Woodbridge.

Those who voted in the negative are—

Messrs. Allen, Archer, Bagby, Bayard, Benton, Buchanan, Crafts, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Fulton, Henderson, King, Linn, Mangum, Merrick, Preston, Smith of Indiana, Tappan, Woodbury.

On motion by Mr. Conrad,

To amend the resolution submitted by Mr. Benton, by striking out all after the word "resolved," and inserting the following:

"That the injunction of secrecy be removed from the proceedings and debates on the treaty with Great Britain recently ratified by this body, as soon as the ratification thereof by the British Government shall have been communicated to the Executive;"

On motion by Mr. Tallmadge,

That the said resolution and proposed amendment lie on the table,

It was determined in the affirmative—yeas 17, nays 15.

On motion by Mr. Benton,

The yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are—

Messrs. Bates, Berrien, Calhoun, Clayton, Crafts, Cuthbert, Evans, Fulton, Graham, Huntington, Merrick, Miller, Phelps, Porter, Rives, Tallmadge, Woodbridge.

Those who voted in the negative are—

Messrs. Allen, Bagby, Bayard, Benton, Buchanan, Crittenden, Henderson, King, Linn, Mangum, Morehead, Smith of Indiana, Tappan, Walker, Woodbury.

Mr. Buchanan submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the injunction of secrecy be removed from the British treaty, the correspondence which accompanied it, and all the proceedings of the Senate thereon, embracing the speeches and remarks of Senators, as soon as the ratifications of the said treaty shall have been exchanged, and it shall have been proclaimed by the President of the United States.

OFFICIAL PAPERS

Connected with the treaty of Washington.

MESSAGE

FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES,

Transmitting the treaty with Great Britain to the Senate of the United States.

TO THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES:

I have the satisfaction to communicate to the Senate the results of the negotiations recently had in this city with the British Minister special and extraordinary.

These results comprise—

1st. A treaty to settle and define the boundaries between the territories of the United States, and the possessions of her Britannic Majesty in North America, for the suppression of the African slave-trade, and the surrender of criminals fugitive from justice in certain cases.

2d. A correspondence on the subject of the interference of the colonial authorities of the British West Indies with American merchant vessels driven by stress of weather, or carried by violence, into the ports of those colonies.

3d. A correspondence upon the subject of the attack and destruction of the steamboat Caroline.

4th. A correspondence on the subject of impressment.

If this treaty shall receive the approbation of the Senate, it will terminate a difference respecting boundary which has long subsisted between the two Governments, has been the subject of several ineffectual attempts at settlement, and has sometimes led to great irritation, not without danger of disturbing the existing peace. Both the United States, and the States more immediately concerned, have entertained no doubt of the validity of the American title to all the territory which has been in dispute; but that title was controverted, and the Government of the United States had agreed to make the dispute a subject of arbitration. One arbitration had been actually had, but had failed to settle the controversy; and it was found, at the commencement of last year, that a correspondence had been in progress between the two Governments for a joint commission, with an ultimate reference to an umpire or arbitrator, with authority to make a final decision. That correspondence, however, had been retarded by various occurrences, and had come to no definite result when the special mission of Lord Ashburton was announced. This movement on the part of England afforded, in the judgment of the Executive, a favorable opportunity for making an attempt to settle this long-existing controversy by some agreement or treaty, without further reference to arbitration. It seemed entirely proper that, if this purpose were entertained, consultation should be had with the authorities of the States of Maine and Massachusetts. Letters, therefore, of which copies are herewith communicated, were addressed to the Governors of those States, suggesting that commissioners should be appointed by each of them, respectively, to repair to this city and confer with the authorities of this Government, on a line, by agreement or compromise, with its equivalents and compensations. This suggestion was met by both States in a spirit of candor and patriotism, and promptly complied with. Four commissioners on the part of Maine, and three on the part of Massachusetts (all persons of distinction and high character) were duly appointed and commissioned, and lost no time in presenting themselves at the seat of Government of the United States. These commissioners have been in correspondence with this Government during the period of the discussions; have enjoyed its confidence and freest communications; have aided the general object with their counsel and advice; and, in the end, have unanimously signified their assent to the line proposed in the treaty.

Ordinarily, it would be no easy task to reconcile and bring together such a variety of interests in a matter in itself difficult and perplexed; but the efforts of the Government in attempting to accomplish this desirable object have been seconded and sustained by a spirit of accommodation and conciliation on the part of the States concerned, to which much of the success of these efforts is to be ascribed.

Connected with the settlement of the line of the Northeastern boundary, so far as it respects the States of Maine and Massachusetts, is the continuation of that line along the highlands to the northwesternmost head of Connecticut river. Which of the sources of that stream is entitled to this character, has been matter of controversy, and is of some interest to the State of New Hampshire. The King of the Netherlands decided the main branch to be the northwesternmost head of the Connecticut. This did not satisfy the claim of New Hampshire. The line agreed to in the present treaty follows the highlands to the head of Hall's stream, and thence down that river, embracing the whole claim of New Hampshire, and establishing her title to 100,000 acres of territory more than she would have had by the decision of the King of the Netherlands.

By the treaty of 1783, the line is to proceed down the Connecticut river to the 45th degree of north latitude, and thence west, by that parallel, till it strikes the St. Lawrence. Recent examinations having ascertained that the line heretofore received as the true line of latitude between those points was erroneous, and that the correction of this error would not only leave, on the British side, a considerable tract of territory heretofore supposed to belong to the States of Vermont and New York, but also Rouse's Point, the site of a military work of the United States; it has been regarded as an object of importance, not only to establish the rights and jurisdiction of those States up to the line to which they have been considered to extend, but also to comprehend Rouse's Point within the territory of the United States. The relinquishment by the British Government of all the territory south of the line heretofore considered to be the true line, has been obtained; and the consideration for this relinquishment is to enure, by the provisions of the treaty, to the States of Maine and Massachusetts.

The line of boundary, then, from the source of the St. Croix to the St. Lawrence, so far as Maine and Massachusetts are concerned, is fixed by their own consent, and for considerations satisfactory to them; the chief of these considerations being the privilege of transporting the lumber and agricultural products grown and raised in Maine, on the waters of the St. John and its tributaries, down that river to the ocean, free from imposition or disability. The importance of this privilege, perpetual in its terms, to a country covered at present by pine forests of great value, and much of it capable hereafter of agricultural improvement, is not a matter upon which the opinion of intelligent men is likely to be divided.

So far as New Hampshire is concerned, the treaty secures all that she requires; and New York and Vermont are quieted to the extent of their claim and occupation. The difference which would be made in the northern boundary of these two States, by correcting the parallel of latitude, may be seen on Tanner's maps, (1836,) new atlas, maps Nos. 6 and 9.

From the intersection of the 45th degree of north latitude with the St. Lawrence, and along that river and the lakes to the water communication between Lake Huron and Lake Superior, the line was definitively agreed on by the commissioners of the two Governments, under the 6th article of the treaty of Ghent. But between this last-mentioned point and the Lake of the Woods, the commissioners acting under the 7th article of that treaty found several matters of disagreement, and therefore made no joint report to their respective Governments. The first of these was Sugar island, or St. George's island, lying in St. Mary's river, or the water communication between Lakes Huron and Superior. By the present treaty, this island is embraced in the territories of the United States. Both from soil and position, it is regarded as of much value.

Another matter of difference was the manner of extending the line from the point at which the commissioners arrived, north of Ile Royale, in Lake Superior, to the Lake of the Woods. The British commissioner insisted on proceeding to Fond du Lac, at the southwest angle of the lake, and thence, by the river St. Louis, to the Rainy Lake. The American commissioner supposed the true course to be, to proceed by way of the Dog river. Attempts were made to compromise this difference, but without success. The details of these proceedings are found at length in the printed separate reports of the commissioners.

From the imperfect knowledge of this remote country at the date of the treaty of peace, some of the descriptions in that treaty do not harmonize with its natural features, as now ascertained. "Long Lake" is nowhere to be found under that name. There is reason for supposing, however, that the sheet of water intended by that name is the estuary at the mouth of Pigeon river. The present treaty, therefore, adopts that estuary and river, and afterwards pursues the usual route, across the height of land by the various portages and small lakes, till the line reaches Rainy Lake; from which the commissioners agreed on the extension of it to its termination, in the northwest angle of the Lake of the Woods. The region of country on and near the shore of the lake, between Pigeon river on the north, and Fond du Lac and the river St. Louis on the south and west, considered valuable as a mineral region, is thus included within the United States. It embraces a territory of four millions of acres, northward of the claim set up by the British commissioner under the treaty of Ghent. From the height of land at the head of Pigeon river, westerly to the Rainy Lake, the country is understood to be of little value, being described by surveyors, and marked on the map, as a region of rock and water.

From the northwest angle of the Lake of the Woods, which is found to be in latitude 45 deg. 23 min. 55 sec. north, existing treaties require the line to be run due south to its intersection with the 45th parallel, and thence along that parallel to the Rocky mountains.

After sundry informal communications with the British minister upon the subject of the claims of the two countries to territory west of the Rocky mountains, so little probability was found to exist of coming to any agreement on that subject at present, that it was not thought expedient to make it one of the subjects of formal negotiation, to be entered upon between this Government and the British minister, as part of his duties under his special mission.

By the treaty of 1783, the line of division along the rivers and lakes, from the place where the 45th parallel of north latitude strikes the St. Lawrence, to the outlet of Lake Superior, is invariably to be drawn through the middle of such waters, and not through the middle of their main channels. Such a line, if extended according to the literal terms of the treaty, would, it is obvious, occasionally intersect islands. The manner in which the commissioners of the two Governments dealt with this difficult subject may be seen in their reports. But where the line, thus following the middle of the river, or watercourse, did not meet with islands, yet it was liable sometimes to leave the only practicable navigable channel altogether on one side. The treaty made no provision for the common use of the waters by the citizens and subjects of both countries.

It has happened, therefore, in a few instances, that the use of the river, in particular places, would be greatly diminished, to one party or the other, if, in fact, there was not a choice in the use of channels and passages. Thus, at the Long Sault, in the St. Lawrence—a dangerous passage, practicable only for boats—the only safe run is between the Long Sault islands and Barnhart's island (all which belong to the United States) on one side, and the American shore on the other. On the other hand, by far the best passage for vessels of any depth of water, from Lake Erie into the Detroit river, is between Bois Blanc, a British island, and the Canadian shore. So again there are several channels or passages, of different degrees of facility and usefulness, between the several islands in the river St. Clair, at or near its entry into the lake of that name. In these three cases, the treaty provides that all the several passages and channels shall be free and open to the use of the citizens and subjects of both parties.

The treaty obligations subsisting between the two countries for the suppression of the African slave-trade, and the complaints made to this Government within the last three or four years, (many of them but too well founded,) of the visitation, seizure, and detention of American vessels on that coast by British cruisers, could not but form a delicate and highly important part of the negotiations which have now been held.

The early and prominent part which the Government of the United States has taken for the abolition of this unlawful and inhuman traffic, is well known. By the tenth article of the treaty of Ghent, it is declared that the traffic in slaves is irreconcileable with the principles of humanity and justice, and that both his Majesty and the United States are desirous of continuing their efforts to promote its entire abolition; and it is thereby agreed that both the contracting parties shall use their best endeavors to accomplish so desirable an object. The Government of the United States has, by law, declared the African slave-trade piracy; and, at its suggestion, other nations have made similar enactments. It has not been wanting in honest and zealous efforts, made in conformity with the wishes of the whole country, to accomplish the entire abolition of the traffic in slaves upon the African coast; but these efforts, and those of other countries directed to the same end, have proved, to a considerable degree, unsuccessful. Treaties are known to have been entered into some years ago between England and France, by which the former power, which usually maintains a large naval force on the African station, was authorized to seize, and bring in for adjudication, vessels found engaged in the slave-trade under the French flag.

It is known that, in December last, a treaty was signed in London by the representatives of England, France, Russia, Prussia, and Austria, having for its professed object a strong and united effort of the five powers to put an end to the traffic. This treaty was not officially communicated to the Government of the United States; but its provisions and stipulations are supposed to be accurately known to the public. It is understood to be not yet ratified on the part of France.

No application or request has been made to this Government to become a party to this treaty; but the course it might take in regard to it has excited no small degree of attention and discussion in Europe, as the principle upon which it is founded, and the stipulations which it contains, have caused warm animadversion and great political excitement.

In my message at the commencement of the present session of Congress, I endeavored to state the principles which this Government supports respecting the right of search and the immunity of flags. Desirous of maintaining those principles fully, at the same time that existing obligations should be fulfilled,

I have thought it most consistent with the honor and dignity of the country that it should execute its own laws, and perform its own obligations, by its own means and its own power. The examination or visitation of the merchant vessels of one nation by the cruisers of another, for any purpose except those known and acknowledged by the law of nations, under whatever restraints or regulations it may take place, may lead to dangerous results. It is far better, by other means, to supersede any supposed necessity, or any motive, for such examination or visit. Interference with a merchant vessel by an armed cruiser is always a delicate proceeding, apt to touch the point of national honor, as well as to affect the interests of individuals. It has been thought, therefore, expedient, not only in accordance with the stipulations of the treaty of Ghent, but at the same time as removing all pretext on the part of others for violating the immunities of the American flag upon the seas, as they exist and are defined by the law of nations, to enter into the articles now submitted to the Senate.

The treaty which I now submit to you proposes no alteration, mitigation, or modification of the rules of the law of nations. It provides simply that each of the two Governments shall maintain, on the coast of Africa, a sufficient squadron to enforce, separately and respectively, the laws, rights, and obligations of the two countries for the suppression of the slave-trade.

Another consideration of great importance has recommended this mode of fulfilling the duties and obligations of the country. Our commerce along the western coast of Africa is extensive, and supposed to be increasing. There is reason to think that, in many cases, those engaged in it have met with interruptions and annoyances, caused by the jealousy and instigation of rivals engaged in the same trade. Many complaints on this subject have reached the Government. A respectable naval force on the coast is the natural resort and security against further occurrences of this kind.

The surrender to justice of persons who, having committed high crimes, seek an asylum in the territories of a neighboring nation, would seem to be an act due to the cause of general justice, and properly belonging to the present state of civilization and intercourse. The British provinces of North America are separated from the States of the Union by a line of several thousand miles; and, along portions of this line, the amount of population on either side is quite considerable, while the passage of the boundary is always easy.

Offenders against the law, on the one side, transfer themselves to the other. Sometimes, with great difficulty, they are brought to justice; but very often they wholly escape. A consciousness of immunity, from the power of avoiding justice in this way, instigates the unprincipled and reckless to the commission of offences; and the peace and good neighborhood of the border are consequently often disturbed.

In the case of offenders fleeing from Canada into the United States, the Governors of States are often applied to for their surrender; and questions of a very embarrassing nature arise from these applications. It has been thought highly important, therefore, to provide for the whole case, by a proper treaty stipulation. The article on the subject in the proposed treaty is carefully confined to such offences as all mankind agree to regard as heinous, and destructive of the security of life and property. In this careful and specific enumeration of crimes, the object has been to exclude all political offences, or criminal charges, arising from wars or intestine commotions. Treason, misprision of treason, libels, desertion from military service, and other offences of similar character, are excluded.

And lest some unforeseen inconvenience or unexpected abuse should arise from the stipulation, rendering its continuance, in the opinion of one or both of the parties, not longer desirable, it is left in the power of either to put an end to it at will.

The destruction of the steamboat Caroline at Schlosser, four or five years ago, occasioned no small degree of excitement at the time, and became the subject of correspondence between the two Governments. That correspondence having been suspended for a considerable period, was renewed in the spring of the last year; but, no satisfactory result having been arrived at, it was thought proper, though the occurrence had ceased to be fresh and recent, not to omit attention to it on the present occasion. It has only been so far discussed, in the correspondence now submitted, as it was accomplished by a violation of the territory of the United States. The letter of the British minister, while he attempts to justify that violation upon the ground of a pressing and overruling necessity—admitting, nevertheless, that, even if justifiable, an apology was due for it, and accompanying this acknowledgment with assurances of the sacred regard of his Government for the inviolability of national territory—has seemed to me sufficient to warrant forbearance from any further remonstrance against what took place, as an aggression, on the soil and territory of the country.

On the subject of the interference of the British authorities in the West Indies, a confident hope is entertained that the correspondence which has taken place, showing the grounds taken by this Government, and the engagements entered into by the British minister, will be found such as to satisfy the just expectation of the people of the United States.

The impressment of seamen from merchant vessels of this country by British cruisers, although not practised in time of peace, (and, therefore, not at present a productive cause of difference and irritation,) has, nevertheless, hitherto been so prominent a topic of controversy, and is so likely to bring on renewed contentions at the first breaking out of an European war, that it has been thought the part of wisdom now to take it into serious and earnest consideration. The letter from the Secretary of State to the British minister explains the ground which the Government has assumed, and the principles which it means to uphold. For the defence of these grounds, and the maintenance of these principles, the most perfect reliance is placed on the intelligence of the American people, and on their firmness and patriotism in whatever touches the honor of the country, or its great and essential interests.

WASHINGTON, August 11, 1842.

CORRESPONDENCE WITH THE BRITISH SPECIAL MISSION.

NORTHEASTERN AND NORTHWESTERN BOUNDARY.

WASHINGTON, June 13, 1842.

SIR: On considering the most effectual mode of proceeding to arrive at an amicable and satisfactory termination of the long-continued controversy respecting the Northeastern boundary between the British colony of New Brunswick and the State of Maine, I believe that I may confidently conclude, from what has passed in the preliminary conferences which I have had the honor of holding with you, that we concur in the opinion, that no advantage would be gained by reverting to the interminable discussion on the general grounds on which each party considers their claims respectively to rest. In the course of the many years that this discussion has lasted, every argument, on either side, is apparently exhausted, and that without any approach to an agreement. The present attempt, therefore, of a settlement, must rest, for its success, not on the renewal of a controversy, but on proceeding on the presumption that, all means of a reciprocal conviction having failed as also the experiment of calling in the aid of a friendly arbiter and umpire, there remains only the alternative of a compromise for the solution of this otherwise apparently insurmountable difficulty; unless, indeed, it were determined to try a second arbitration, attended by its delay, trouble, and expense, in defiance of past experience as to the probability of any more satisfactory results.

It is undoubtedly true, that, should our present attempt unfortunately fail, there might remain no other alternative but a second reference; yet when I consider all the difficulty and uncertainty attending it, I trust that all parties interested will come to the conclusion, that the very intricate details connected with the case must be better known and judged by our two Governments than any diligence can make them to be by any third party, and that a sincere candid disposition to give reciprocally fair weight to the arguments on either side is likely to lead us to a more satisfactory settlement than an engagement to abide by the uncertain award of a less competent tribunal. The very friendly and cordial reception given by you, sir, as well as by all the authorities of your Government, to the assurance that my mission here, by my Sovereign, has been determined by an unfeigned desire to settle this and all other questions of difference between us, on principles of conciliation and justice, forbid me to anticipate the possibility of the failure of our endeavors applied with sincerity to this purpose.

With this view of the case, therefore, although not unprepared to enter into the general argument, I abstain from so doing from the conviction that an amicable settlement of this vexed question, so generally desired, will be thereby best promoted. But, at the same time, some opinions have been industriously emitted throughout this controversy, and in some instances by persons in authority, of a description so much calculated to mislead the public mind, that I think it may be of service to offer a few observations.

I do not, of course, complain of the earnest adherence of partisans on either side to the general arguments on which their case is supposed to rest; but a position has been taken, and facts have been repeatedly stated, which I am sure the authorities of the Federal Government will be abundantly able to contradict, but which have evidently given rise to much public misapprehension. It is maintained that the whole of this controversy about the boundary began in 1814; that up to that period the line as claimed by Maine was undisputed by Great Britain; and that the claim was avowedly founded on motives of interest, to obtain the means of conveniently connecting the British provinces. I confine these remarks to the refuting this imputation; and I should, indeed, not have entered upon controversy, even on this, if it did not appear to me to involve, in some degree, a question of national sincerity and good faith.

The assertion is founded on the discussions which preceded the treaty of peace signed at Ghent in 1814. It is perfectly true that a proposal was submitted by the British plenipotentiaries for the revision of the boundary line on the Northeastern frontier, and that it was founded on the position that it was desired to secure the communication between the provinces, the precise delimitation of which was at that time imperfectly known. The American plenipotentiaries, in their first communication from Ghent to the Secretary of State, admit that the British ministers expressly disclaimed any intention of acquiring an increase of territory, and that they proposed the revision for the purpose of preventing uncertainty and dispute—a purpose sufficiently justified by subsequent events. Again, in their note of the 4th of September, 1814, the British ministers remind those from America that the boundary had never been ascertained, and that the line claimed by America, which interrupted the communication between Halifax and Quebec, never could have been in the contemplation of the parties to the treaty of peace of 1783. The same view of the case will be found to pervade all the communications between the plenipotentiaries of the two countries at Ghent. There was no attempt to press any cession of territory on the ground of policy or expediency; but, although the precise geography of the country was then imperfectly known, it was notorious at the time that different opinions existed as to the boundary likely to result from continuing the north line from the head of the river St. Croix. This appears to have been so clearly known and admitted by the American plenipotentiaries, that they, in submitting to the conference the project of a treaty, offer a preamble to their 4th article, in these words: "Whereas, neither that part of the highlands lying due north from the source of the river St. Croix, and designated in the former treaty of peace between the two powers, as the northwest angle of Nova Scotia, nor the northwesternmost head of the Connecticut river, has yet been ascertained," &c. It should here be observed that these are the words proposed—not by the British, but by the American negotiators; and that they were finally adopted by both in the fifth article of the treaty.

To close my observations upon what passed on this subject at Ghent, I would draw your attention to the letter of Mr. Gallatin, one of the American plenipotentiaries, to Mr. Secretary Monroe, of the 25th of December, 1814. He offers the following conjecture as to what might probably be the arguments of Great Britain against the lines set up by America: "They hope that the river which empties into the Bay des Chaleurs, in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, has its source so far west as to intervene between the headwaters of the river St. John and those of the streams emptying into the river St. Lawrence; so that the line north from the source of the river St. Croix will first strike the heights of land which divide the waters emptying into the Atlantic ocean (river St. John) from those emptying into the Gulf of St. Lawrence, (river des Chaleurs,) and afterward the heights of land which divide the waters emptying into the Gulf of St. Lawrence (river des Chaleurs) from those emptying into the river St. Lawrence; but that the said line never can, in the words of the treaty, strike any spot of land actually dividing the waters emptying into the Atlantic ocean, from those which fall into the river St. Lawrence."

So obvious an argument in opposition to the line claimed by America could not escape the known sagacity of Mr. Gallatin. I state it, not for the purpose of discussing its merit, but to show that, at Ghent, not only the fact was well known that this boundary was a matter in dispute, but that the arguments respecting it had then been weighed by the gentleman so eminent in its subsequent discussion. Indeed, the fact that the American ministers made this disputed question a matter for reference, by a treaty afterward ratified by the President and Senate, must, in every candid mind, be sufficient proof that it was generally considered to be involved in sufficient doubt to entitle it to such a mode of solution. It cannot, possibly, be supposed that the President and Senate would have admitted, by treaty, doubts respecting this boundary, if they had been heard of for the first time through the pretensions of the British plenipotentiaries at Ghent.

If the argument or assertions which I am now noticing, and to which I studiously confine myself, had not come from authority, I should owe some apology for these observations. The history of this unfortunate controversy is too well known to you, sir, and stands but too voluminously recorded in your department, to make them necessary for your own information.

The repeated discussions between the two countries, and the repeated projects for settlement which have occupied every successive administration of the United States, sufficiently prove how unfounded is the assertion that doubts and difficulties respecting this boundary had their first origin in the year 1814. It is true that down to that time, and, indeed, to a later period, the local features of the country were little known, and the different arguments had, in consequence, not assumed any definite form; but sufficient was known to both parties to satisfy them of the impossibility of tracing strictly the boundary prescribed by the treaty of peace of 1783.

I would refer, in proof of this, simply to American authorities, and those of the very first order.

In the year 1802, Mr. Madison, at that time Secretary of State for the United States, in his instructions to Mr. Rufus King, observed that the difficulty in fixing the northwest angle of Nova Scotia "arises from a reference, in the treaty of 1783, to highlands which it is now found have no definite existence." And he suggests the appointment of a commission, to be jointly appointed, "to determine on a point most proper to be substituted for the description in article II of the treaty of 1783." Again: Mr. President Jefferson, in a message to Congress, on the 17th October, 1803, stated that "a further knowledge of the ground in the northeastern and northwestern angles of the United States has evinced that the boundaries established by the treaty of Paris, between the British territories and ours, in those points, were too imperfectly described to be susceptible of execution."

These opinions of two most distinguished American statesmen gave rise to a convention of boundary, made in London by Mr. Rufus King and Lord Hawkesbury, which, from other circumstances, which it is not necessary to refer to, was not ratified by the Senate.

I might further refer you on this subject to the report of Judge Sullivan, who acted as commissioner of the United States for settling the controversy with Great Britain, respecting the true river St. Croix, who says, "the boundary between Nova Scotia and Canada was described by the King's proclamation in the same mode of expression as that used in the treaty of peace. Commissioners who were appointed to settle that line have traversed the country in vain to find the highlands designated as the boundary."

With these known facts, how can it possibly be maintained that doubts about the boundary arose for the first time in the year 1814?

I need not pursue this subject further. Indeed, it would have been useless to treat of it at all, with any person having before him the records of the diplomatic history of the two countries for the last half a century. My object in adverting to it is, to correct an error, arising, I am ready to believe, not from any intention to misrepresent, but from want of information, and which seemed to be sufficiently circulated to make some refutation useful toward promoting the desired friendly and equitable settlement of this question.

We believe the position maintained by us on the subject of this boundary to be founded in justice and equity; and we deny that we have been determined in our pretensions by policy and expedience. I might, perhaps, fairly admit that those last-mentioned considerations have prompted, in some measure, our perseverance in maintaining them. The territory in controversy is (for that portion of it at least which is likely to come to Great Britain by any amicable settlement) as worthless for any purposes of habitation or cultivation as probably any tract of equal size on the habitable globe, and if it were not for the obvious circumstance of its connecting the British North American provinces, I believe I might venture to say that, whatever might have been the merit of our case, we should long since have given up the controversy, and willingly have made the sacrifice to the wishes of a country with which it is so much our interest, as it is our desire, to maintain the most perfect harmony and good will.

I trust that this sentiment must be manifest in my unreserved communication with you on this and all other subjects connected with my mission. If I have failed in this respect, I shall have ill obeyed the instructions of my Government and the earnest dictates of my personal inclination. Permit me, sir, to avail myself of this, my first opportunity of formally addressing you, to assure you unfeignedly of my most distinguished consideration.

ASHBURTON.

Hon. DANIEL WEBSTER.

Mr. Webster to Lord Ashburton.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, 17th June, 1842.

Lord Ashburton having been charged by the Queen's Government with full powers to negotiate and settle all matters in discussion between the United States and England; and having, on his arrival at Washington, announced that, in relation to the question of the Northeastern boundary of the United States, he was authorized to treat for a conventional line, or line by agreement, on such terms and conditions, and with such mutual considerations and equivalents, as might be thought just and equitable; and that he was ready to enter upon a negotiation for such conventional line, so soon as this Government should say that it was authorized and ready on its part to commence such negotiation,—the undersigned, Secretary of State of the United States, has now the honor to acquaint his lordship, by direction of the President, that the undersigned is ready, on behalf of the Government of the United States, and duly authorized, to proceed to the consideration of such conventional line, or line by agreement; and will be happy to have an interview on that subject, at his lordship's convenience.

The undersigned avails himself of this occasion to tender to Lord Ashburton assurances of his distinguished consideration.

DANIEL WEBSTER.

Lord ASHBURTON, &c., &c., &c.

Lord Ashburton to Mr. Webster.

WASHINGTON, June 17, 1842.

The undersigned, plenipotentiary of her Britannic Majesty on an extraordinary and special mission to the United States of America, has the honor of acknowledging, with much satisfaction, the communication received this day from Mr. Webster, Secretary of State of the United States, that he is ready, on behalf of the United States, and duly authorized, in relation to the question of the Northeastern boundary of the United States, to proceed to the consideration of a conventional line, or line by agreement, on such terms and conditions, and with such mutual considerations and equivalents, as might be thought just and equitable. And, in reply to Mr. Webster's invitation to the undersigned to fix some time for their first conference upon this subject, he begs to propose to call on Mr. Webster, at the Department of State, to-morrow, at 12 o'clock, for this purpose, should that time be perfectly convenient to Mr. Webster.

The undersigned avails himself of this opportunity to assure Mr. Webster of his distinguished consideration.

ASHBURTON.

Hon. DANIEL WEBSTER, &c., &c., &c.

Mr. Webster to Lord Ashburton.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, June 17, 1842.

The Secretary of State will have great pleasure in seeing Lord Ashburton at twelve o'clock to-morrow, as proposed by him.

Lord ASHBURTON, &c., &c., &c.

WASHINGTON, 21st June, 1842.

SIR: The letter you did me the honor of addressing me the 17th instant, informed me that you were now prepared and authorized to enter with me into discussion of that portion of the differences between our two countries which relates to the Northeastern boundary; and we had, the following day, our first formal conference for this purpose, with a view to consider, in the first instance, the best mode of proceeding to arrive at what is so much desired by all parties—an amicable, and, at the same time, equitable settlement of a controversy, which, with the best intentions, the authorities of the two countries, for nearly half a century, have in vain endeavored to effect.

The result of this conference has been, that I have been invited by you to state, generally, my views of this case, and of the expectations of my Government; and although I am aware that, in the ordinary practice of diplomatic intercourse, I should expose myself to some disadvantage by so doing, I nevertheless do not hesitate to comply; premising, only, that the following observations are to be considered merely as memoranda for discussion, and not as formal propositions, to have any binding effect, should our negotiations have the unfortunate fate of the many which have preceded it, of ending in disappointment.

I believe you are sufficiently aware of the circumstances which induced me personally to undertake this mission. If the part which, during a long life, I have taken in public affairs, is marked by any particular character, it has been by an earnest, persevering desire to maintain peace, and to promote harmony between our two countries. My exertions were unavailingly employed to prevent the last unfortunate war, and have since been unremitting in watching any passing clouds which might at any time forebode its renewal. On the accession to power of the present ministers in England, perceiving the same wise and honorable spirit to prevail with them, I could not resist the temptation and the hope of being of some service to my country and to our common race, at a time of life when no other cause could have had sufficient interest to draw me from a retirement better suited to my age and to my inclinations.

I trust, sir, that you will have perceived, in the course of my hitherto informal communications with you, that I approach my duties generally without any of those devices and manœuvres which are supposed (I believe ignorantly) to be the useful tools of ordinary diplomacy. With a person of your penetration, they would avail as little as they would with the intelligent public of the two great enlightened countries of whose interests we are treating. I know no other mode of acting than open, plain-dealing, and I therefore disregard, willingly, all the disadvantage of complying with the invitation given me, to be the first to speak on this question of the Eastern boundary. It is already agreed that we abstain from a continued discussion of the arguments by which the lines of the two countries are reciprocally maintained; and I have so well observed this rule, that I have not even communicated to you a volume of additional controversial matter which I brought with me, and much of which would, if controversy were our object, be of no inconsiderable weight and importance. It would be in the event only of the failure of this negotiation—which I will not anticipate—that we should be again driven into the labyrinth from which it is our purpose to escape; and that, failing to interpret strictly the words of the treaty, we should be obliged to search again into cotemporaneous occurrences and opinions for principles of construction which might shed light on the actual intentions of the parties.

Our success must, on the contrary, depend on the reciprocal admission or presumption that the royal arbiter was so far right when he came to the conclusion which others had come to before him, that the treaty of 1783 was not executable according to its strict expression, and that the case was therefore one for agreement by compromise. The only point upon which I thought it my duty to enter upon anything like controversy, is that referred to in my letter of the 13th instant; and I did so to rescue my Government and myself from an imputation of unworthy motives, and the charge that they had set up a claim which they knew to be unfounded, from mere considerations of policy or convenience. The assertions of persons in my position, on subjects connected with their diplomatic duties, are naturally received by the world with some caution; but I trust you will believe me when I assure you that I should not be the person to come here on any such errand. I do not pretend, nor have I ever thought, the claim of Great Britain with respect to this boundary, any more than the claim of America, to be unattended with difficulties. Those claims have been considered by impartial men of high authority, and unquestioned ability, to be equally so attended; and therefore it is that this is a question for a compromise, and it is this compromise which it has become our duty to endeavor to accomplish. I will only here add the most solemn assurance, (which I would not lightly make,) that, after a long and careful consideration of all the arguments and inferences, direct and circumstantial, bearing on the whole of this truly difficult question, it is my settled conviction that it was the intention of the parties to the treaty of peace of 1783, however imperfectly those intentions may have been executed, to leave to Great Britain, by their description of boundaries, the whole of the waters of the river St. John.

The length of these preliminary observations requires, perhaps, some apology; but I now proceed to comply with your application to me to state the principles and conditions on which, it appears to me, that this compromise, which it is agreed we should attempt, should be founded.

A new boundary is in fact to be traced between the State of Maine and the province of New Brunswick. In doing this, reference must be had to the extent and value of the territory in dispute; but, as a general principle, we cannot do better than keep in mind the intention of the framers of the first treaty of peace in 1783, as expressed in the preamble to the provisional articles in the following words: "Whereas reciprocal advantages and mutual convenience are found by experience to form the only permanent foundation of peace and friendship between States," &c. I have on a former occasion explained the reasons which have induced the British Government to maintain their rights in this controversy beyond any apparent value in the object in dispute, to be the establishing a good boundary between our two countries, so as to prevent collision and dispute, and an unobstructed communication and connexion of our colonies with each other. Further, it is desired to retain under the jurisdiction of each Government respectively, such inhabitants as have for a length of time been so living, and to whom a transfer of allegiance might be painful or distressing.

These are shortly the objects we have in view, and which we must now see to reconcile to a practical division of the territory in dispute. Great Britain has no wish of aggrandizement for any general purpose of increased dominion, as you must be satisfied by the liberality with which I have professed myself ready to treat questions of boundaries in other quarters where no considerations of particular convenience or fitness occur. I might further prove this by calling your attention to the fact, that of the land likely to come to us by any practical settlement, nine-tenths parts of it are, from its position and quality, wholly worthless. It can support no population, it grows even little timber of value, and can be of no service but as a boundary, (though, from its desert nature) a useful boundary for two distinct Governments.

In considering on the map a division of the territory in question, this remarkable circumstance must be kept in mind—that a division of acres by their number would be a very unequal division of their value. The Southern portion of this territory, the valley of the Aroostook, is represented to be one of the most beautiful and most fertile tracts of land in this part of the continent; capable of the highest state of cultivation, and covered with fine timber; while the Northern portion, with the exception of that small part comprised within the Madawaska settlement, is of the miserable description I have stated. It would be no exaggeration to say, that one acre on the Aroostook would be of much more value than ten acres north of the St. John. There would be, therefore, no equality in making a division of acre for acre.

But although I remind you of this circumstance, I do not call on you to act upon it. On the contrary, I am willing that you should have the advantage in this settlement, both in the quantity and the quality of this land. All I wish is to call this fact in proof of my assertion, that the object of Great Britain was simply to claim that which was essential to her, and would form a convenient boundary, and to leave all the more material advantages of this bargain to the State of Maine.

I now come to the more immediate application of these principles to a definite line of boundary; and looking at the map with reference to the sole object of Great Britain as already described, the line of the St. John from where the north line from the St. Croix strikes it, up to some one of its sources, seems evidently to suit both parties, with the exception which I shall presently mention. This line throws the waste and barren tract to Great Britain, and the rich and valuable lands to Maine; but it makes a good boundary, one which avoids collision and probable dispute; and, for the reasons stated, we should be satisfied with it, if it were not for the peculiar circumstances of a settlement formed on both sides of the St. John, from the mouth of the Madawaska up to that of the Fish river.

The history and circumstances of this settlement are well known to you. It was originally formed from the French establishments in Acadia, and has been uninterruptedly under French or British dominion, and never under any other laws. The inhabitants have professed great apprehension of being surrendered by Great Britain, and have lately sent an earnest petition to the Queen, deprecating that being done. Further, this settlement forms one united community, all connected together, and living some on one, and some on the other side of the river, which forms a sort of high road between them. It seems self-evident that no more inconvenient line of boundary could well be drawn than one which divides in two an existing municipality, inconvenient as well to the inhabitants themselves, as to the authorities under which they are to live. There would be evident hardship (I might say cruelty) in separating this now happy and contented village, to say nothing of the bickerings and probable collisions likely to arise from taking in this spot the precise line of the river, which would under other circumstances satisfy us. Indeed, I should consider that such a separation of these industrious settlers, by placing them under separate laws and governments, a most harsh proceeding; and that we should thereby abandon the great object we should have in view—of the happiness and convenience of the people, and the fixing a boundary the least likely to occasion future strife.

I dwell on this circumstance at some length, in justification of the necessity I am under of departing, to this inconsiderable extent, from the marked line of the river St. John. What line should be taken to cover this difficulty, I shall have to consider with you; but I cannot in any case abandon the obvious interests of these people. It will be seen, by an inspection of the map, that it is not possible to meet this difficulty by making over to Maine the northern portion of this settlement, as that would be giving up by Great Britain the immediately adjoining communications with Canada, which it is her principal object to preserve.

These observations dispose of those parts of this question which immediately concern the State of Maine; but it may be well at the same time to state my views respecting the adjoining boundary of the States of New Hampshire, Vermont, and New York; because they make part of the reference to the King of the Netherlands, and were, indeed, the only part of the subject in dispute upon which a distinct decision was given.

The question here at issue between the two countries was as to the correct determination of the parallel of latitude, and the true source of the Connecticut river. Upon both these points decisions were pronounced in favor of Great Britain; and I might add, that the case of America, as matter of right, was but feebly and doubtingly supported by her own authorities. I am, nevertheless, disposed to surrender the whole of this case, if we should succeed in settling, as proposed, the boundary of Maine. There is a point or two in this line of boundary where I may have to consider, with the assistance of the surveyors acquainted with the localities, the convenience of the resident settlers; as, also, what line may best suit the immediate country at the head of the Connecticut river; but, substantially, the Government of America shall be satisfied, and this point be yielded to them.

This concession, considered with reference to the value of the land ceded, which is generally reported to be fertile, and contains a position at Rouse's Point much coveted in the course of the controversy, would, under ordinary circumstances, be considered of considerable importance. The concession will, however, be made by Great Britain without reluctance, not only to mark the liberal and conciliatory spirit by which it is desired to distinguish these negotiations, but because the case is, in some respects, analogous to that of the Madawaska settlement, before considered. It is believed that the settlers on the narrow strip, which would be transferred to Great Britain by rectifying the 45th parallel of latitude, which was formerly incorrectly laid down, are principally from the United States; and that their opinions and habits incline them to give a preference to that form of government under which, before the discovery of the error in question, they supposed themselves to be living. It cannot be desired by her Majesty to acquire any addition of territory under such circumstances, whatever may be the weight of her rights; but it will be observed that the same argument applies almost exactly to the Madawaska settlement, and justifies the reservation I am there obliged to make. In these days, the convenience and happiness of the people to be governed will ever be the chief guide in transactions of this description between such Governments as those of Great Britain and the United States.

Before quitting this subject, I would observe that it is rumored that Major Graham, in his late survey in Maine, reports some deviation from the true north of the line from the head of the St. Croix toward the St. John. I would here also propose to abide by the old line long established, and from which the deviation by Major Graham is, I am told, inconsiderable, without at all doubting the accuracy and good faith of that very distinguished officer.

In stating the important concessions I am prepared to make on a final settlement of these boundaries, I am sensible that concessions to one State of this Union are not always to be made available for the satisfaction of any other; but you are aware that I am treating with the United States, and that for a long line of important boundaries; and that I could not presume to enter on the question how this settlement might operate on, or be in any way compensated to the different States of the Confederacy. I should, however, add my unfeigned belief that what I have proposed will appear reasonable with reference to the interests of the State of Maine, considered singly. That the proposition, taken as a whole, will be satisfactory to the country at large, I can entertain no doubt.

I abstain from noticing here the boundaries further west, which I am prepared to consider and to settle, because they seem to form part of a case which it will be more convenient to treat separately.

In the course of these discussions, much anxiety has been expressed that Maine should be assured of some means of communication by the St. John, more especially for the conveyance of her lumber. This subject I am very willing to consider, being sensible of the great importance of it to that State, and that the friendly and peaceful relations between neighboring countries cannot be better secured than by reciprocally providing for all their wants and interests. Lumber must for many years be the principal produce of the extensive valley of the Aroostook and of the southern borders of the St. John; and it is evident that this article of trade, being worth anything, must mainly depend upon its having access to the sea through that river. It is further evident, that there can be no such access under any arrangement otherwise than by the consent of the province of New Brunswick. It is my wish to seek an early opportunity of considering, with some person well acquainted with the commerce of that country, what can be done to give it the greatest possible freedom and extent, without trenching too much on the fiscal regulations of the two countries. But, in the mean time, in order to meet at once the urgent wants and wishes of Maine in this respect, I would engage that, on the final settlement of these differences, all lumber and produce of the forest of the tributary waters of the St. John shall be received freely without duty, and dealt with in every respect like the same articles of New Brunswick. I cannot now say positively whether I may be able to go further; but this seems to me what is principally required. Suggestions have at times been thrown out, of making the port and river of St. John free to the two countries; but I think you will be sensible that this could not be done without some reciprocity for the trade of St. John in ports of the United States; and that, in endeavoring to regulate this, we should be embarking in an intricate question, much and often discussed between the two countries. It cannot also fail to occur to you, that joint rights in the same harbors and waters must be a fruitful source of dissension, and that it behooves us to be careful not to sow the seeds of future differences in the settlement of those of our own day.

I have now stated, as I was desired to do, my views of the terms on which it appears to me that this settlement may be made. It must be sufficiently evident that I have not treated the subject in the ordinary form of a bargain, where the party making the proposal leaves himself something to give up. The case would not admit of this, even if I could bring myself so to act. It would have been useless for me to ask what I know could not be yielded; and I can unfeignedly say that, even if your vigilance did not forbid me to expect to gain any undue advantage over you, I should have no wish to do so. The treaty we have to make will be subjected to the scrutiny of a jealous and criticising public; and it would ill answer its main purpose of producing and perpetuating harmony and good will, if its provisions were not considered by good and reasonable men to make a just and equitable settlement of this long-continued controversy.

Permit me, sir, to conclude with the assurance of my distinguished consideration,

ASHBURTON.

Hon. DANIEL WEBSTER,
&c., &c., &c.,

Mr. Webster to Lord Ashburton.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, July 8, 1842.

MY LORD: Your notes of the 13th and 21st of June were duly received.

In the first of these you correctly say that, in our conferences on the boundary question, we have both been of opinion that no advantage would be gained by resorting at this time to the discussion at length of the grounds on which each party considers its claim of right to rest. At the same time, you deem it expedient, nevertheless, to offer some observations calculated, in your judgment, to repel a supposed allegation, or suggestion, that this controversy only began in 1814; that, up to that period, the American claim was undisputed; and that the English claim, as now set forth, is founded merely in motives of interest. Nothing is more natural than that your Lordship should desire to repel an imputation which would impeach the sincerity and good faith of your Government, and all the weight which justice and candor require is given to your Lordship's observations in this respect. It is not my purpose, nor do I conceive it pertinent to the occasion, to go into any consideration of the facts and reasonings presented by you, to show the good faith and sincerity of England in the claim asserted by her. Any such discussion would be a departure from the question of right now subsisting between the two Governments, and would be more especially unfit for an occasion in which the parties are approaching each other in a friendly spirit, with the hope of terminating the controversy by agreement. Following your Lordship's example, however, I must be permitted to say that few questions have ever arisen under this Government in regard to which a stronger or more general conviction was felt that the country was in the right, than this question of the Northeastern boundary. To say nothing of the sentiments of the Governments and people of the States more directly interested, whose opinions may be supposed capable of bias, both Houses of Congress, after full and repeated consideration, have affirmed the validity of the American claim, by a unanimity experienced on very few other subjects; and the general judgment of the whole people seems to be the same way. Abstaining from all historical facts, all contemporaneous expositions, and all external arguments and circumstances, I will venture to present to your Lordship a very condensed view of the reasons which produce in this country the conviction that a boundary line may be ascertained, run, and delineated with precision, under and according to the words of the stipulation in the treaty of 1783; that no doubt can be raised by any part of that stipulation, which other parts of it do not remove or explain; and that a line so run would include all that the United States claim. This view is presented by a series of short propositions.

1. The northwest angle of Nova Scotia is the thing to be sought for and found.

2. That angle is to be ascertained by running a line due north from the source of the St. Croix river till that line reaches the highlands; and where such north line intersects the highlands, there is the angle; and thence the line is to run along the said highlands; which said highlands divide those rivers which empty themselves into the river St. Lawrence from those that fall into the Atlantic ocean. The angle required, therefore, is an angle made by the intersection of a due-north line with highlands, from one slope of which the rivers empty themselves into the river St. Lawrence, and from the other into the Atlantic ocean.

3. Supposing it to be matter of doubt whether the St. John and the Ristigouch are rivers falling into the Atlantic ocean, in the sense of the treaty, then the rule of just interpretation is, that if one element or one part in the description be uncertain, it is to be explained by others which are certain, if there be such others. Now, there is no doubt as to the rivers which fall into the St. Lawrence. They are certain; and to their sources the north line is to run, since at their sources the highlands required by the treaty do certainly exist. And departing, for a moment, from the rule just prescribed to myself, I will remind your Lordship that the joint commissioners and agents of the two Governments in 1817, in giving the surveyors instructions for finding these highlands, directed them, in terms, to proceed upon a due-north line "till they should arrive at some one of the streams connected with the river St. Lawrence;" and then to explore the highlands from that point to the northwesternmost head of Connecticut river. It is indisputable that a line run according to these instructions, thus given by the commissioners and agents of both Governments, would give to the United States all that they have at any time claimed.

4. It is certain that, by the treaty, the eastern boundary of the United States, from the head of the St. Croix, is to be a due-north and south line. And it is equally certain that this line is to run north till it reaches highlands, from whose northern watershed the rivers flow into the river St. Lawrence.

5. These two things being—one mathematically, and the other physically—certain in themselves, and capable of being precisely marked and delineated, explain or control the uncertainty, if there be uncertainty, in the other part or element of the description.

6. The British argument, assuming that the Bay of Fundy, and more especially the Bay of Chaleurs, are not the Atlantic ocean, within the meaning of the treaty, insists that the rivers flowing into these bays are not, therefore, in the sense of the treaty, rivers falling into the Atlantic; and therefore the highlands to which the United States claim have not that southern or eastern watershed which the treaty calls for; and as it is agreed, nevertheless, that we must somewhere find highlands, and go to them, whose northern waters run into the St. Lawrence, the conclusion is, that the different parts of the description in the treaty do not cohere, and that, therefore, the treaty cannot be executed.

7. Our answer to this, as is obvious from what has already been said, is twofold.

First. What may be doubtful in itself, may be made certain by other things which are certain; and inasmuch as the treaty does certainly demand a due-north line, and does certainly demand the extension of that line to highlands from whose northern sides the rivers flow into the river St. Lawrence, thence two clear requirements make it plain that the parties to the treaty considered, in fact, the rivers flowing from the south or east of the said highlands to be rivers falling into the Atlantic ocean; because they have placed the St. Lawrence rivers and the Atlantic rivers in contradistinction to each other, as rivers running in opposite directions, but with their sources in the same highlands. Rivers fed from these highland fountains, running north or northwest, are rivers emptying themselves into the St. Lawrence; and rivers arising from the same fountains, and running in an opposite direction, seem to be as clearly meant to be designated by the character of Atlantic rivers. And, as strongly corroborating this view of the subject, allow me to call your Lordship's attention to two facts.

1. The coast of the Atlantic ocean, from Penobscot river northeasterly, and the western shore of the Bay of Fundy, (which is but a continuation of the coast, and is in a line with it,) is very nearly parallel to the course of the river St. Lawrence through the same latitudes. This is obvious from the map.

2. The rivers which, from their sources in the same ridge, flow respectively into the St. Lawrence and into the Bay of Fundy, and even into the Bay of Chaleurs, run with remarkable uniformity in directions almost exactly opposite, as if hastening away from a common origin to their different destinations by the shortest course. The only considerable exception to this, is the northern sweep of the upper part of the St. John; but the smaller streams flowing into this part of that river from the west still strictly obey the general rule.

Now if, from a certain general line on the face of the country, or as delineated on the map, rivers are found flowing away in opposite directions, however strongly it may be asserted that the mountains or eminences are but isolated elevations, it is nevertheless absolutely certain that such a line does in fact define a ridge of highlands which turns the waters both ways.

And, as the commissioners in 1783 had the map before them; as they saw the parallelism of the seacoast and the course of the St. Lawrence; as they saw rivers rising from a common line, and running some north or northwest, the others south or southeast; and as they speak of some of these rivers as emptying themselves into the river St. Lawrence, and of the others falling into the Atlantic ocean; and as they make no third class,—is there a reasonable doubt in which class they intended to comprehend all the rivers running in a direction from the St. Lawrence, whether falling immediately, or only ultimately, into the Atlantic ocean?

If there be nothing incoherent or inconsequential in this chain of remarks, it will satisfy your Lordship, I trust, that it is not without reason that American opinion has settled firmly in the conviction of the rights of the American side of the question; and I forbear from going into the consideration of the mass of other arguments and proofs, for the same reasons which restrain your Lordship from entering into an extended discussion of the question, as well as because your Lordship will have an opportunity of perusing a paper addressed to me by the commissioners of Maine, which strongly presents the subject on other grounds and in other lights.

I am now to consider your Lordship's note of the 21st June. Before entering upon this, I have the President's instructions to say that he fully appreciates the motives which induced your Lordship, personally, to undertake your present mission; that he is quite aware that your public life has been distinguished by efforts to maintain peace and harmony between the two countries; that he quite well recollects that your exertions were employed to prevent the late war, and that he doubts not the sincerity of your declaration that nothing could have drawn you from your retirement, and induced you to engage in your present undertaking, but the hope of being of service to your country, and to our common race. And I have the utmost pleasure, my Lord, in acknowledging the frankness, candor, and plain dealing, which have characterized your official intercourse with this Government; nor am I permitted or inclined to entertain any doubt of your Lordship's entire conviction, as expressed by yourself, as to the merits of this controversy and the difficulties of the case. The question before us is, whether these confident opinions, on both sides, of the rightful nature and just strength of our respective claims, will permit us, while a desire to preserve harmony, and a disposition to yield liberally to mutual convenience, so strongly incite us, to come together and to unite on a line by agreement.

It appears to be your Lordship's opinion that the line of the St. John, from the point where the north line from the St. Croix strikes that river, up to some one of its sources, evidently suits both parties—with an exception, however, of that part of the Madawaska settlement which is on the south side of the St. John, which you propose should be included within the British territory. That, as a line by agreement, the St. John for some distance upwards from its intersection by the line running north from the St. Croix, would be a very convenient boundary for the two parties, is readily admitted; but it is a very important question how far up, and to which of the sources of this river, this line should extend. Above Madawaska the course of the river turns to the south, and, stretching away towards the sources of the Penobscot, leaves far to the north the line of communication between New Brunswick and Canada. That line departs from the St. John altogether near Madawaska, and, keeping principally upon the left or north bank of the Madawaska, and proceeding by way of the Temiscouata lake, reaches the St. Lawrence at the mouth of the river du Loup.

There are, then, two important subjects for consideration.

First. Whether the United States can agree to cede, relinquish, or cease to claim, any part of the territory west of the north line from the St. Croix and south of the St. John. And I think it but candid to say, at once, that we see insurmountable objections to admitting the line to come south of the river. Your Lordship's observations upon the propriety of preserving the unity of the Madawaska settlement are, in a great measure, just, and altogether founded, I doubt not, in entirely good motives. They savor of humanity and a kind regard to the interests and feelings of individuals. But the difficulties seem insuperable. The river, as your Lordship remarks, seems a natural boundary, and, in this part of it, to run in a convenient direction. It is a line always clear and indisputable. If we depart from it, where shall we find another boundary equally natural, equally clear, and conforming to the same general course? A departure from the line of the river, moreover, would open new questions about equivalents, which it would probably be found impracticable to settle. If your Lordship were at liberty, (as I understand you not to be,) to cede the whole or a part of the territory, commonly called the strip, lying east of the north line, and west of the St. John, considerations might be found in such a cession, possibly for some new demarcation west of the north line and south of the river; but, in the present posture of things, I cannot hold out the expectation to your Lordship that anything south of the river can be yielded.

And, perhaps, the inconvenience to the settlers on the southern bank, of making the river the boundary, are less considerable than your Lordship supposes. These settlers are scattered along a considerable extent, very likely soon to connect themselves with whomsoever may come to live near them; and though of different origin, and some difference of religion, not likely, on the whole, to be greatly dissimilar from other borderers occupying the neighboring territory, their rights of property would, of course, be all preserved, both of inheritance and alienation; and if some of them should choose to retain the social and political relations under which they now are, their removal, for that purpose, to the north bank, drawing after it no loss of property, or of means of subsistence, would not be a great hardship. Your Lordship suggests the inconvenience of dividing a municipality by a line of national boundary; and certainly there is force in the observation; but if, departing from the river, we were to establish, to the south of it, an artificial line upon the land, there might be points on such line at which people would live in numbers on both sides; and a more mathematical line might thus divide villages, while it divided nations. The experience of the world, and our own experience, show the propriety of making rivers boundaries whenever their courses suit the general object; for the same reason that, in other cases to which they are applicable, mountain ranges, or ridges of highlands, are adopted for the same purpose; these last being, perhaps, still more convenient lines of division than rivers, being equally clear and prominent objects, and the population of neighboring countries bordering on a mountain line of separation being usually thin and inconsiderable on either side. Rivers and inland waters constitute the boundary between the United States and the territories of her Majesty for some thousands of miles westward from the place where the 45th degree of north latitude intersects the St. Lawrence; and along this line, though occasional irregularities and outbreaks have taken place, (always by the agency and instigation of agitators and lawless men, friends of neither country,) yet it is clear that no better demarcation of limits could be made. And at the northeast, along the space through which the St. Croix constitutes the line of separation, controversies and conflicts are not heard of; but similarity of language, character, and pursuits, and mutual respect for the rights of each other, preserve the general peace.

Upon the whole, my Lord, feeling that there may be inconvenience, and perhaps a small degree of hardship, I yet cannot admit that there is any cruelty in separating the Madawaska settlers south of the St. John, so far as political relations are concerned, from their neighbors on the north of that river. In the present state of society and of peace which exists between the two countries, the severance of political relations needs not to disturb social and family intercourse; while high considerations, affecting both the present and the future, seem to me to require that, following natural indications, we adhere to the St. John, in this part of its course, as the line of division.

The next question is, how far upward this boundary ought to be observed, and along which of its branches. This question would be easily settled, if what may be called the main branch of the river, in this part of it, differing from the general character of rivers in this region of country, did not make a sudden turn. But if we consider the main branch of the St. John—that which has been recently usually so denominated—your Lordship observes that, near the mouth of the Madawaska, it turns almost at right angles, and pushes its sources toward those of the Penobscot. Contiguity and compactness of territory can hardly be preserved by following a stream which makes not occasional windings, but at once so great a deflection from its previous course. The Madawaska is one of its branches, or principal sources, and, as the map shows, is very much a continuance of the line of the principal river from the Great Falls upward. The natural course would, therefore, seem to be to continue along this branch.

We understand, and, indeed, collect from your Lordship's note, that, with whatever opinion of her right to the disputed territory, England, in asserting it, has principally in view to maintain, on her own soil, her accustomed line of communication between Canada and New Brunswick. We acknowledge the general justice and propriety of this object; and agree at once that, with suitable equivalents, a conventional line ought to be such as to secure it to England. The question, therefore, simply is, what line will secure it?

The common communication between the provinces follows the course of the St. John from the Great Falls to the mouth of the Madawaska, and then, not turning away to the south with the course of the main stream, identifies itself with that of the Madawaska, going along with it to the Temiscouata lakes, thence along those lakes, and so across the highlands, to streams running into the St. Lawrence. And this line of communication we are willing to agree shall hereafter be within acknowledged British territory, upon such conditions and considerations as may be assented to. The Madawaska and the forementioned lakes might conveniently constitute the boundary. But I believe it is true that, in some part of the distance, above the mouth of the Madawaska, it has been found convenient to establish the course of communication on the south bank of that river. This consideration may be important enough to justify a departure from what would otherwise be desirable, and the running of the line at some distance south of the Madawaska, observing natural monuments where it may be practicable, and thus leaving the whole valley of the Madawaska on the British side.

The United States, therefore, upon the adjustment of proper equivalents, would not object to a line of boundary which should begin at the middle of the main channel of the river St. John, where that river is intersected by a due-north line extended from the source of the St. Croix; thence proceeding westerly, by the middle of the main channel of that river, to a point three miles westerly of the mouth of the Madawaska; thence by a straight line to the outlet of Long Lake; thence westerly by a direct line, to the point where the river St. Francis empties itself into the lake called Pohenagomook; thence continuing in the same direct line to the highlands which divide the waters falling into the river du Loup from those which fall into the river St. Francis. Having thus arrived at the highlands, I shall be ready to confer on the correct manner of following them to the northwesternmost head of the Connecticut river.

Such a line as has been now described would secure to England a free intercourse between Canada and New Brunswick; and, with the navigation of the St. John yielded to the United States, would appear to meet the wants of all parties. Your Lordship's proposition in regard to the navigation is received as just, and as constituting, so far as it may go, a natural equivalent. Probably the use of the river for the transportation of the products of the forest, grown on the American side of the line, would be equally advantageous to both parties; and, therefore, in granting it, no sacrifice of British interest would be incurred. A conviction of this, together with their confidence in the validity of their own claim, is very likely to lead the two States immediately concerned to consider their relinquishment of the lands north of the line much in the light of a mere cession. It need not be denied that, to secure this privilege, and to have a right to enjoy it, free from tax, toll, or other liability or inability, is an object of considerable importance to the people of Maine.

Your Lordship intimates that, as a part of the general arrangement of boundaries, England would be willing to surrender to the United States Rouse's Point, and all the territory heretofore supposed to be within the boundaries of New Hampshire, Vermont, and New York, but which a correct ascertainment of the forty-fifth parallel of north latitude shows to be included within the British line. This concession is, no doubt, of some value. If made, its benefits would enure partly to these three States, and partly to the United States, and none of it to the particular interests of Maine and Massachusetts. If regarded, therefore, as a part of the equivalent for the manner of adjusting the Northeastern boundary, these two last-mentioned States would, perhaps, expect that the value, if it could be ascertained, should be paid to them. On this point further consideration may be necessary.

If, in other respects, we should be able to agree on a boundary, the points which you refer to, connected with the ascertainment of the head of the Connecticut, will be attended to; and Captain Talcott, who made the exploration in that quarter, will be ready to communicate the result of his observations.

I have the honor to be, with distinguished consideration, your obedient servant,

DANL. WEBSTER.

LORD ASHBURTON, &c., &c., &c.

Lord Ashburton to Mr. Webster.

WASHINGTON, July 11, 1842.

SIR: I lose no time in acknowledging the receipt of the note you did me the honor of addressing me on the 8th inst.; and I beg, in the first place, to say that I am duly sensible of the assurance you give me that the President has been pleased to appreciate the motives which induced my present mission, and am much flattered by your recognition of the candor and frankness which have hitherto marked our intercourse.

I had hoped that we had escaped, by mutual consent, from a return to the endless and fruitless argument on the general question of the rights of our respective Governments in the matter of the Northeastern boundary.

It seemed to have been decided by so many high and competent authorities that the precise geographical point, so long looked for, was not to be found, that it necessarily followed that any hope of settlement must rest upon an amicable compromise.

The arrival here of commissioners from Maine and Massachusetts, and the admitted disposition of the two Governments, have given the public a very general expectation that this compromise might at last be effected; and I hope you will excuse my expressing my regret that the note now before me, and the paper from the gentlemen from Maine, addressed to you, which accompanied it, should have contained so much of a renewal of the old controversy, and should not have been confined to the simple question whether we could or could not agree to terms of settlement. If the observations contained in my note of the 13th ultimo have given rise to these consequences, I much regret it; and I would now pass over all these more than useless discussions, and proceed at once to notice the proposals you make, if I were not apprehensive that my so doing might be construed into some want of respect for the parties from whom these observations have proceeded.

I will, however, endeavor to bring within a narrow compass what I have to say on the subject; and the more so, because, with all deference to you, sir, I may add, that there is little in these arguments that is new, or that has not been often advanced and refuted during the many past years of controversy.

I should except from this want of novelty the position, to me entirely new, advanced by the commissioners from Maine—that the northwest angle of Nova Scotia, (which is, as you express it, "the thing to be sought for and found,") was at the head of the Madawaska river; which river, it is maintained by a long argument, supported by authorities and maps, was always considered as the real St. John; and this is stated to justify the opinion expressed by the old Congress, in 1779, that this northwest angle was at the source of the St. John.

Giving all possible consideration to this apparently new discovery, I cannot say that it appears well founded. Looking at Mitchell's map, (the use of which by the negotiators of the peace of 1783 has been always so much relied upon on the part of America,) there is nothing more clearly marked than the great distinct channel of the upper St. John; and it seems hardly possible that the negotiators or the Congress should have made the supposed mistake.

But, supposing this hypothesis were well founded, the Temisconata lake is, then, now to be this long lost angle of Nova Scotia. What becomes, then, of the point so long contended for by Maine, between the Metis and one of the tributaries of the Ristagouche? These points must be about fifty miles apart. Both cannot be true; and if it be maintained (as I rather collect it to be, from the paper of the Maine commissioners) that the point at the Metis is the true boundary, as being the point stricken by the north line, though the other be the true northwest angle of Nova Scotia, there is at least an end of the whole argument, resting upon this northwest angle being, as stated by you, "the thing to be sought for and found."

If this new discovery leads us to no other inference, we can hardly fail to derive from it the conviction that all the ingenuity applied to unravel this mystery leaves us equally in the dark; and that it is not without reason that it has been decided by so many persons, after careful examination, that this boundary is not susceptible of settlement according to the precise words of the treaty.

This decision has been come to by Mr. Madison, in 1802; by Mr. Jefferson, in 1803; by Judge Sullivan, about the same time; by the arbiter, in 1831; and it has been acted upon by nearly every Secretary of State of the United States during the controversy, from that time to this; for although, in a case in dispute, each party, during the dispute, endeavors to hold his own, I am not aware that any Secretary of State, or any President of the United States, has ever treated this subject otherwise than as one attended by that degree of uncertainty that it could only be solved by an arbiter, or by a compromise. I would appeal to your candor, sir, to say whether, at this time, and under these circumstances, it is fair to speak of this disputed territory as belonging indisputably to one party, and to be yielded by way of concession, and for equivalents, to the other. Any convention I may sign must be for a division of that which is in doubt and dispute. With any arrangements between the State of Maine and the General Government, I have nothing to do; and if (which God forbid!) our endeavors at an amicable compromise should at last fail, I must hold that Great Britain retains her right, at least equal to that of the United States, to every part of the territory in dispute, until, by a renewed reference, or by the skill of some more fortunate negotiator, this difference may be brought to a close.

I have now only to add a few observations upon the arguments contained in your own note.

Some stress is laid upon the fact that the joint commissioners of the two Governments in 1817 directed the surveyors to run the north line from the St. Croix until it met waters running into the St. Lawrence. The lines to be run were to ascertain the geographical facts of the case. No proceeding could be more proper. The claims of the two parties varied; and it was natural that, in the first instance, a line should be run north to the extent claimed by either party; where that line would reach, and what highlands or streams it might strike, was unknown; so much so, that Mr. Gallatin, in his letter from Ghent, mentioned in my note of the 13th ultimo, expressed his doubts on this subject. His prediction turned out to be true. The point where the line strikes the Metis was a point not fulfilling the words of the treaty. It did not divide the waters as desired, unless the bay of Chaleurs and the gulf of St. Lawrence are considered to answer the description of the Atlantic ocean. Mr. Gallatin was sensible of this, and intimates that, if this fact created doubt, the lands about the Ristagouche might be given up. But he forgets that, in giving up this territory, he gives up his argument; for he maintains, in opposition to the British line of boundary, that it does not continuously and in all its parts divide the waters as required by the treaty. The American line was in this respect equally deficient; and it is useless, therefore, here to consider whether it would have been preferable to the British line, if it had divided the waters of the St. Lawrence from those of the St. John. To make even a plausible case for the American line, both the St. John and the Ristagouche must be held to be rivers emptying into the Atlantic ocean. The royal arbiter says it would be hazardous so to class them. I believe that, whatever argument might be made in the case of the St. John, connected with the distinctions with which it was mentioned in the treaty, to consider the Ristagouche as flowing into the Atlantic ocean would be more than hazardous—it would be most absurd.

At all events, I would submit to you that no inference could be drawn from the commissioners in 1817 having ordered a north line to be run; the same commissioners, after drawing the line, having disagreed as to any conclusions from it.

I am rather surprised that an inspection of the map should lead us to such different views of the course of the rivers and of the coast, as stated by you. I find that the upper St. John and the Ristagouche, so far from cutting at right angles the parallel lines of the coast and the St. Lawrence, as you say, run in their main course nearly parallel with them. I am not aware that the fact is important, although it seems connected with your argument.

My inspection of these maps, and my examination of the documents, lead me to a very strong conviction that the highlands contemplated by the negotiators of the treaty were the only highlands then known to them at the head of the Penobscot, Kennebec, and the rivers west of the St. Croix; and that they did not precisely know how the north line from the St. Croix would strike them; and if it were not my wish to shorten this discussion, I believe a very good argument might be drawn from the words of the treaty in proof of this. In the negotiations with Mr. Livingston, and afterwards with Mr. McLane, this view seemed to prevail; and, as you are aware, there were proposals to search for these highlands to the west, where, alone, I believe they will be found to answer perfectly the description of the treaty. If this question should unfortunately go to a further reference, I should by no means despair of finding some confirmation of this view of the case.

I shall now, sir, close what I have to say on the controversial part of this question. I should not have treated of it at all, but from respect to the gentlemen from Maine, whose arguments you conveyed to me; and I shall certainly not renew it, unless called upon by you to do so. Our immediate business is with the compromise of what is not otherwise to be settled; and argument and controversy, far from assisting to that end, have more generally a tendency to irritate and excite.

Referring, then, to our more immediate subject of a line by agreement, I deeply regret, on reading your observations and proposals, that we are yet so far asunder. I always thought this part of our duty better performed by conference than by correspondence; unless, indeed, we had the misfortune not to be able ultimately to agree; in which case, it would certainly be necessary that our two countries should see clearly on paper how nearly we had approached to each other, and on whom the blame at last rested of leaving unsettled a question involving such serious consequences. I would still recommend this course of personal discussion and conference; but, in the meantime, I proceed to notice the proposals and observations contained in your note.

It is sufficiently explained, in my plan for a settlement, why I was anxious not to divide in two parts, by any new line of boundary, the Madawaska settlements; and I am sorry to say that the information I have since received, both as to local circumstances and the anxiety of the people themselves, tends strongly to confirm my impressions. At the same time, you will have seen that I was sensible that some good reason should be assigned why we should not be satisfied with what you justly term the otherwise perfect boundary of the St. John. In your reply, you recognise the difficulties of the case, and do justice to our motives; but you state distinctly, on the part of your Government, that you can consent to no line which should bring us over the St. John, without some equivalent of territory to be found out of the limits of that part which is in dispute; and you refer more particularly to a certain narrow strip lying between the north line and the river. This strip I have no power to give up; and I beg to add, that the refusal of my Government is founded simply on their objection to dispose arbitrarily of the persons and property of her Majesty's subjects living by preference under her authority—an objection which, you are sensible, applies with peculiar force to the inhabitants of this part of New Brunswick.

I had hoped that the other equivalents which I had offered, combined with the sense entertained by the Government of the United States of the pressing importance of the case on the ground of humanity, would have been sufficient for the purpose I so anxiously desired; but, perceiving from your note, as well as from personal conversation, that concession on this point is insisted upon, I might be disposed to consider whether my anxious desire to arrive at a friendly settlement would not justify me in yielding, however reluctantly, if the latter part of your proposal did not, if finally persevered in, forbid all hope of any settlement whatever.

The boundary you propose, supposing the British territory not to come over the St. John, is to run from the north side of that river, three miles above its junction with the Madawaska, over an arbitrary line, which my map does not exactly permit me to follow, until it reaches somewhere the St. Francis. I need not examine this line in its precise details, because I am obliged frankly to state that it is inadmissible. I think I might, sir, fairly appeal to your candid judgment to say whether this is a proposition of conciliation—whether, after all antecedent discussions on this subject, it could be reasonably expected that, whatever might be the anxiety of my Government for a friendly settlement, I could be found with power to accede to such terms. I need not observe to you that this would give to Great Britain less than the award of the arbiter, while at the same time she would be called upon to give up what the arbiter awarded to her; and, if I do not mistake you, the floatage of the lumber of Maine down the St. John is also expected to be surrendered.

I must beg to say that I am quite at a loss to account for such a proposal. Your own principle of maintaining the great river as the best boundary is abandoned; an arbitrary line is drawn which nobody ever suggested before; and I can only suppose this course to be dictated by that general assumption that, notwithstanding all former admissions and decisions to the contrary, this territory, said to be in dispute, in truth, belongs to one party, to be doled out as a favor to the other—an assumption which cannot for a moment be admitted, and which you, sir, with the records of your office before you, will hardly maintain.

The position in which this negotiation now stands, seems to prove what I have before ventured to advance—that it would have a better chance of success by conference than by correspondence; at all events, that we should sooner arrive at ascertaining what we can or cannot do. Slow, unnecessarily slow, our progress has hitherto been; and the public seem, somehow or other, to have become informed that there are differences. I hope, when we come to discuss them, that they will prove less serious than they are supposed to be; but it is very desirable that doubts and distrusts should be set at rest, and that public credit and the transactions of commerce should suffer the least possible disturbance. For although, should this negotiation unfortunately fail, it will be our duty immediately to place it in some new course of further reference, it is not to be disguised that such a result must be productive of considerable public anxiety and disappointment.

What I have said with respect to the case of the Madawaska settlements, will, I trust, sufficiently prove my disposition to approach such a discussion with the true spirit of conciliation; and I trust you will permit me to express a hope that it will be met with a corresponding feeling.

Before concluding, I wish to add a few words respecting the line of the St. John to one of its sources, and the navigation for certain purposes of that river. It may be true that the district between the St. John and the highlands west of the St. Francis may be of some extent; but your own surveyors will confirm to you that it is of very little value either for cultivation or timber. Is it reasonable that, in the division of an object in dispute, its intrinsic value should be wholly disregarded, and its size or extent be alone considered?

I would further suggest for your consideration, whether, supposing the division by the King of the Netherlands to be admitted to satisfy fairly the equity of the case between the parties, what is proposed to be added by Great Britain, viz. the strip on the 45th parallel of latitude, and the use of the navigation of the St. John, be not an ample compensation for what we ask in return, viz. that barren strip above the upper St. John, which is wanted for no other purpose than as a boundary; for which purpose it is admitted on all sides to be most convenient.

The right to use the St. John for floating down the lumber of Maine on the same terms as the river is used by the Queen's subjects, is now treated as a matter of light importance. This is not uncommon when a concession of any kind is about to be yielded; but I beg to remind you that this was not formerly so considered. It has been repeatedly solicited, and invariably refused; and no minister of Great Britain has before been permitted to connect this concession with the settlement of the boundary. It is considered by my Government as a very important concession. I am sure that it must be considered by all persons in Maine connected with the lumber trade, as not only valuable, but indispensable; and I am compelled to add, that I am empowered to allow this privilege only in the event of a settlement of the boundary on satisfactory terms. It is said, in the memorandum of the Maine commissioners, that this conceded navigation will be as useful to the town of St. John as to the lumberers of Maine; but it will not escape you that, even if this be so, it is a concession necessary to give any value whatever to so bulky an article as lumber, which, being not otherwise disposable, would bear any reasonable toll which the provincial authorities of New Brunswick might think it expedient to levy upon it. Further, it should not be forgotten that the timber, once at the mouth of the St. John, will have the privilege of reaching the British as well as other markets; and, lastly, that it is a very different thing to hold a privilege of this important description by right, or by mere sufferance, to be granted or withheld at pleasure.

I have to apologize for entering into these details in treating of the great question with which we are occupied, but they seemed called for by observations contained in the paper you sent me.

I beg, sir, you will be assured of my unfeigned and distinguished consideration.

ASHBURTON.

Hon. Daniel Webster, &c., &c., &c.

Lord Ashburton to Mr. Webster.

Washington, July 16, 1842.

Sir: There is a further question of disputed boundary between Great Britain and the United States, called the Northwest boundary, about which we have had some conferences; and I now proceed to state the terms which I am ready to agree to for the settlement of this difference. As the principal object in dispute is to be given up by Great Britain, I trust, sir, that you will here again recognise the spirit of friendly conciliation which has guided my Government in disposing of these questions.

I have already sufficiently discussed with you the boundaries between her Majesty's provinces and the United States, from the monument at the head of the river St. Croix to the monument on the river St. Lawrence, near the village of St. Regis.

The commissioners under the sixth article of the treaty of Ghent succeeded in continuing this boundary from St. Regis, through the St. Lawrence and the great Northern lakes, up to a point in the channel between Lake Huron and Lake Superior.

A further continuation of this boundary, from this point, through Lake Superior, to the Lake of the Woods, was confided to the same commissioners, under the seventh article of the treaty of Ghent; but they were, unfortunately, unable to agree, and have consequently left this portion of the boundary undetermined. Its final settlement has been much desired by both Governments, and urgently pressed by communications from Mr. Secretary Forsyth to Mr. Fox, in 1839 and 1840.

What I have now to propose cannot, I feel assured, be otherwise than satisfactory for this purpose.

The commissioners who failed in their endeavors to make this settlement differed on two points:

First, as to the appropriation of an island called St. George's island, lying in the water communication between Lake Huron and Lake Superior; and,

Secondly, as to the boundary through the water communications from Lake Superior to the Lake of the Woods.

The first point I am ready to give up to you, and you are, no doubt, aware that it is the only object of any real value in this controversy. The island of St. George's is reported to contain 25,920 acres of very fertile land; but, the other things connected with these boundaries being satisfactorily arranged, a line shall be drawn so as to throw this island within the limits of the United States.

In considering the second point, it really appears of little importance to either party how the line be determined through the wild country between Lake Superior and the Lake of the Woods, but it is important that some line should be fixed and known.

The American commissioner asked for the line from Lake Superior, up the river Kamanastiguia, to the lake called Dog lake, which he supposed to be the same as that called Long lake in the treaties; thence through Sturgeon lake to the Lac la Pluie, to that point where the two lines assumed by the commissioners again meet.

The British commissioner, on the other hand, contended for a line from the southwestern extremity, at a point called le Fond du Lac, to the middle of the mouth of the estuary or lake of St. Louis river; thence up that river, through Vermilion river, to Lac la Pluie.

Attempts were made to compromise these differences; but they failed, apparently more from neither party being willing to give up the island of St. George's, than from much importance being attached to any other part of the case.

Upon the line from Lake Superior to the Lake of the Woods, both commissioners agreed to abandon their respective claims, and to adopt a middle course, for which the American commissioner admitted that there was some ground of preference. This was from Pigeon river, a point between Kamanastiguia and the Fond du Lac; and although there were differences as to the precise point near the mouth of Pigeon river, where the line should begin, neither party seemed to have attached much importance to this part of the subject.

I would propose that the line be taken from a point about six miles south of Pigeon river, where the grand portage commences on the lake, and continued along the line of said portage, alternately by land and water, to Lac la Pluie—the existing route by land and by water remaining common to both parties. This line has the advantage of being known, and attended with no doubt or uncertainty in running it.

In making the important concession, on this boundary, of the Isle of St. George, I must attach a condition to it of accommodation, which experience has proved to be necessary in the navigation of the great waters which bound the two countries—an accommodation which can, I apprehend, be no possible inconvenience to either. This was asked by the British commissioner, in the course of the attempts of compromise above alluded to; but nothing was done, because he was not then prepared, as I am now, to yield the property and sovereignty of St. George's island.

The first of these two cases is at the head of Lake St. Clair, where the river of that name empties into it from Lake Huron. It is represented, that the channel bordering the United States coast in this part is not only the best for navigation, but, with some winds, is the only serviceable passage. I do not know that, under such circumstances, the passage of a British vessel would be refused; but, on a final settlement of boundaries, it is desirable to stipulate for what the commissioners would probably have settled, had the facts been known to them.

The other case, of nearly the same description, occurs on the St. Lawrence, some miles above the boundary at St. Regis. In distributing the islands of the river by the commissioners, Barnhart's island and the Long Sault islands were assigned to America. This part of the river has very formidable rapids; and the only safe passage is on the southern or American side, between those islands and the main land. We want a clause in our present treaty to say that for a short distance, viz: from the upper end of upper Long Sault island to the lower end of Barnhart's island, the several channels of the river shall be used in common by the boatmen of the two countries.

I am not aware that these very reasonable demands are likely to meet with any objection; especially where the United States will have surrendered to them all that is essential in the boundary I have now to propose to you.

I beg you will be assured, sir, of my unfeigned and distinguished consideration.

ASHBURTON.

Hon. Daniel Webster,
&c., &c., &c.

Mr. Webster to Lord Ashburton.

Department of State,
Washington, July 27, 1842.

My Lord: I have now to propose to your Lordship a line of division, embracing the disputed portions of the boundary between the United States and the British provinces of New Brunswick and the Canadas, with its considerations and equivalents, such as conforms, I believe, in substance, to the result of the many conferences and discussions which have taken place between us.

The acknowledged territories of the United States and England join upon each other from the Atlantic ocean to the eastern foot of the Rocky mountains—a distance of more than three thousand miles. From the ocean to the source of the St. Croix, the line of division has been ascertained and fixed by agreement; from the source of the St. Croix to a point near St. Regis, on the river St. Lawrence, it may be considered as unsettled, or controverted; from this last-mentioned point, along the St. Lawrence, and through the lakes, it is settled, until it reaches the water communication between Lake Huron and Lake Superior. At this point the commissioners under the 7th article of the treaty of Ghent found a subject of disagreement which they could not overcome, in deciding up which branch or channel the line should proceed, till it should reach a point in the middle of St. Mary's river, about one mile above St. George's, or Sugar island.

From the middle of the water communication between the two lakes, at the point last mentioned, the commissioners extended the line through the remaining part of that water communication, and across Lake Superior, to a point north of Ile Royale; but they could not agree in what direction the line should run from this last-mentioned point, nor where it should leave Lake Superior, nor how it should be extended to the Rainy Lake, or Lac la Pluie. From this last-mentioned lake, they agreed on the line to the northwesternmost point of the Lake of the Woods, which they found to be in latitude 49 deg. 23 min. 55 sec. The line extends, according to existing treaties, due south from this point to the 49th parallel of north latitude, and by that parallel to the Rocky mountains.

Not being able to agree upon the whole line, the commissioners under the 7th article did not make any joint report to their respective Governments. So far as they agreed on any part of the line, that part has been considered settled; but it may be well to give validity to these portions of the line by a treaty.

To complete the boundary line, therefore, and to remove all doubts and disputes, it is necessary for the two Governments to come to an agreement on three points:

1st. What shall be the line on the northeastern and northern limits of the United States, from the St. Croix to the St. Lawrence. This is by far the most important and difficult of the subjects, and involves the principal questions of equivalents and compensations.

2d. What shall be the course of the boundary from the point where the commissioners under the 6th article of the treaty of Ghent terminated their labors—to wit: a point in the Neebish channel, near Muddy lake, in the water communication between Lake Huron and Lake Superior, to a point in the middle of St. Mary's river, one mile above Sugar island. This question is important, as it involves the ownership of that island.

3d. What shall be the line from the point north of Ile Royale, in Lake Superior, to which the commissioners of the two Governments arrived, by agreement, to the Rainy Lake; and also to confirm those parts of the line to which the said commissioners agreed.

Besides agreeing upon the line of division through these controverted portions of the boundary, you have suggested also, as the proposed settlement proceeds upon the ground of compromise and equivalents, that boats belonging to her Majesty's subjects may pass the falls of the Long Sault in the St. Lawrence, on either side of the Long Sault islands; and that the passage between the islands lying at or near the junction of the river St. Clair, with the lake of that name, shall be severally free and open to the vessels of both countries. There appears no reasonable objection to what is requested in these particulars; and on the part of the United States it is desirable that their vessels, proceeding from Lake Erie into the Detroit river, should have the privilege of passing between Bois Blanc, an island belonging to England, and the Canadian shore—the deeper and better channel being on that side.

The line, then, now proposed to be agreed to, may be thus described:

Beginning at the monument at the source of the river St. Croix, as designated and agreed to by the commissioners under the fifth article of the treaty of 1794, between the Governments of the United States and Great Britain; thence, north, following the exploring line run and marked by the surveyors of the two Governments in the years 1817 and 1818, under the fifth article of the treaty of Ghent, to its intersection with the river St. John, and to the middle of the channel thereof; thence, up the middle of the main channel of the said river St. John, to the mouth of the river St. Francis; thence, up the middle of the channel of the said river St. Francis, and of the lakes through which it flows, to the outlet of the Lake Pohenagamook; thence, southwesterly, in a straight line, to a point on the northwest branch of the river St. John, which point shall be ten miles distant from the main branch of the St. John, in a straight line, and in the nearest direction; but if the said point shall be found to be less than seven miles from the nearest point of the summit or crest of the highlands that divide those rivers which empty themselves into the river St. Lawrence from those which fall into the river St. John, then the said point shall be made to recede down the said river to a point seven miles, in a straight line, from the said summit or crest; thence, in a straight line, in a course about south eight degrees west, to the point where the parallel of latitude of 46 deg. 25 min. north intersects the southwest branch of the St. John; thence, southerly, by the said branch, to the source thereof in the highlands at the Metjarmette portage; thence, down along the said highlands which divide the waters which empty themselves into the river St. Lawrence from those which fall into the Atlantic ocean, to the head of Hall's stream; thence, down the middle of said stream, till the line thus run intersects the old line of boundary surveyed and marked by Valentine and Collins previously to the year 1774 as the forty-fifth degree of north latitude, and which has been known and understood to be the line of actual division between the States of New York and Vermont, on one side, and the British province of Canada on the other; and from said point of intersection, west, along the said dividing line, as heretofore known and understood, to the Iroquois or St. Lawrence river; and from the place where the joint commissioners terminated their labors, under the sixth article of the treaty of Ghent, to wit: at a point in the Neebish channel, near Muddy lake, the line shall run into and along the ship-channel between St. Joseph's and St. Tammany islands, to the division of the channel at or near the head of St. Joseph's island; thence, turning eastwardly and northwardly, around the lower end of St. George's, or Sugar island, and following the middle of the channel which divides St. George's from St. Joseph's island; thence, up the east Neebish channel, nearest to St. George's island, through the middle of Lake George; thence, west of Jonas island, into St. Mary's river, to a point in the middle of that river, about one mile above St. George's, or Sugar island, so as to appropriate and assign the said island to the United States; thence, adopting the line traced on the maps by the commissioners, through the river St. Mary and Lake Superior, to a point north of Ile Royale, in said lake, one hundred yards to the north and east of Ile Chapeau, which last-mentioned island lies near the northeastern point of Ile Royale, where the line marked by the commissioners terminates; and from the last-mentioned point, southwesterly, through the middle of the sound between Ile Royale and the northwestern main land, to the mouth of Pigeon river; and up the said river, to and through the north and south Fowl lakes, to the lakes of the height of land between Lake Superior and the Lake of the Woods; thence, along the water communication, to Lake Saisaginaga, and through that lake; thence, to and through Cypress lake, Lac du Bois Blanc, Lac la Croix, Little Vermillion lake, and Lake Namecan, and through the several smaller lakes, straits, or streams, connecting the lakes here mentioned to that point in Lac la Pluie, or Rainy Lake, at the Chaudiere falls, from which the commissioners traced the line, to the most northwestern point of the Lake of the Woods; thence, along the said line, to the said most northwestern point, being in latitude 49 deg. 23 min. 55 sec. north, and in longitude 95 deg. 14 min. 38 sec. west from the observatory at Greenwich; thence, according to existing treaties, the line extends due south to its intersection with the forty-ninth parallel of north latitude, and along that parallel to the Rocky mountains. It being understood that all the water communications, and all the usual portages along the line from Lake Superior to the Lake of the Woods, and also Grand portage, from the shore of Lake Superior to the Lake of the Woods, and also Grand portage, from the shore of Lake Superior to the Pigeon river, as now actually used, shall be free and open to the use of the subjects and citizens of both countries.

It is desirable to follow the description and the exact line of the original treaty as far as practicable. There is reason to think that "Long lake," mentioned in the treaty of 1783, meant merely the estuary of the Pigeon river, as no lake called "Long lake," or any other water strictly conforming to the idea of a lake, is found in that quarter. This opinion is strengthened by the fact that the words of the treaty would seem to imply that the water intended as "Long lake" was immediately joining Lake Superior. In one respect, an exact compliance with the words of the treaty is not practicable. There is no continuous water communication between Lake Superior and the Lake of the Woods, as the Lake of the Woods is known to discharge its waters through the Red river of the north into Hudson's Bay. The dividing height or ridge between the eastern sources of the tributaries of the Lake of the Woods, and the western sources of Pigeon river, appears, by authentic maps, to be distant about forty miles from the mouth of Pigeon river, on the shore of Lake Superior.

It is not improbable that, in the imperfection of knowledge which then existed of those remote countries, and perhaps misled by Mitchell's map, the negotiators of the treaty of 1783 supposed the Lake of the Woods to discharge its waters into Lake Superior. The broken and difficult nature of the water communication from Lake Superior to the Lake of the Woods renders numerous portages necessary; and it is right that these water communications and these portages should make a common highway, where necessary, for the use of the subjects and citizens of both Governments.

When the proposed line shall be properly described in the treaty, the grant by England of the right to use the waters of the river St. John for the purpose of transporting to the mouth of that river all the timber and agricultural products raised in Maine, on the waters of the St. John, or any of its tributaries, without subjection to any discriminating toll, duty, or disability, is to be inserted. Provision should also be made for quieting and confirming the titles of all persons having claims to lands on either side of the line, whether such titles be perfect or inchoate only, and to the same extent in which they would have been confirmed by their respective Governments had no change taken place. What has been agreed to, also, in respect to the common use of certain passages in the rivers and lakes, as already stated, must be made matter of regular stipulation.

Your Lordship is also informed, by the correspondence which formerly took place between the two Governments, that there is a fund arising from the sale of timber, concerning which fund an understanding was had some years ago. It will be expedient to provide by the treaty that this arrangement shall be carried into effect.

A proper article will be necessary to provide for the creation of a commission to run and mark some parts of the line between Maine and the British provinces.

These several objects appear to me to embrace all respecting the boundary line and its equivalents, which the treaty needs to contain, as matters of stipulation between the United States and England.

I have the honor to be, with high consideration, your Lordship's most obedient servant.

DANIEL WEBSTER.

Lord ASHBURTON, &c., &c., &c.

Lord Ashburton to Mr. Webster.

WASHINGTON, July 29, 1842.

SIR: I have attentively considered the statements contained in the letter you did me the honor of addressing me on the 27th of this month, of the terms agreed to for the settlement of boundaries between her Majesty's provinces and the United States; being the final result of the many conferences we have had on this subject. This settlement appears substantially correct in all its parts; and we may now proceed, without further delay, to draw up the treaty. Several of the articles for this purpose are already prepared and agreed, and our most convenient course will be to take and consider them singly. I would beg leave to recommend that, as we have excellent charts of the country through which the boundary, which failed of being settled by the commissioners under the seventh article of the treaty of Ghent, is partially marked, it would be advisable to make good the delineation on those charts, which would spare to both parties the unnecessary expense of new commissioners and a new survey. In this case, the only commission required would be to run the line on the boundary of Maine.

The stipulations for the greater facility of the navigation of the river St. Lawrence, and of two passages between the upper lakes, appear evidently desirable for general accommodation; and I cannot refuse the reciprocal claim made by you to render common the passage from Lake Erie into the Detroit river. This must be done by declaring the several passages in those parts free to both parties.

I should remark, also, that the free use of the navigation of the Long Sault passage, on the St. Lawrence, must be extended to below Barnhart's island, for the purpose of clearing those rapids.

I beg leave to repeat to you, sir, the assurances of my most distinguished consideration.

ASHBURTON.

Hon. DANIEL WEBSTER, &c., &c., &c.

Lord Ashburton to Mr. Webster.

WASHINGTON, Aug. 9, 1842.

SIR: It appears desirable that some explanation between us should be recorded by correspondence respecting the fifth article of the treaty signed by us this day, for the settlement of boundaries between Great Britain and the United States.

By that article of the treaty, it is stipulated that certain payments shall be made by the Government of the United States to the States of Maine and Massachusetts. It has of course been understood that my negotiations have been with the Government of the United States; and the introduction of terms of agreement between the General Government and the States would have been irregular and inadmissible, if it had not been deemed expedient to bring the whole of these transactions within the purview of the treaty. There may not be wanting analogous cases to justify this proceeding; but it seems proper that I should have confirmed by you, that my Government incurs no responsibility for these engagements, of the precise nature and object of which I am uninformed, nor have I considered it necessary to make inquiry concerning them.

I beg, sir, to renew to you the assurances of my high consideration.

ASHBURTON.

Hon. DANIEL WEBSTER, &c., &c., &c.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, August 9, 1842.

MY LORD: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your note of the 9th of August, with respect to the object and intention of the fifth article of the treaty. What you say in regard to that subject is quite correct. It purports to contain no stipulation on the part of Great Britain; nor is any responsibility supposed to be incurred by it, on the part of your Government.

I renew, my Lord, the assurances of my distinguished consideration.

DANIEL WEBSTER.

CORRESPONDENCE WITH STATE AUTHORITIES.

NORTH EASTERN BOUNDARY.

Secretary of State of Massachusetts to the President.

COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS,
Secretary's Department, March 18, 1842.

SIR: By direction of his excellency the Governor, I have the honor to transmit to you an official copy of certain resolutions passed at the late session of the Legislature of this State.

With the highest respect,
Your obedient servant,
JOHN P. BIGELOW,
Secretary of the Commonwealth.

President of the United States.

COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS.

IN THE YEAR ONE THOUSAND EIGHT HUNDRED AND FORTY-TWO.

Resolves concerning the Northeastern boundary of the United States.

Resolved, That the boundary line between the State of Maine and the British province of New Brunswick is so clearly defined by the treaty of 1783, that the terms of the treaty can neither be misapprehended, nor afford any support to the unjust pretensions of Great Britain.

Resolved, That this Commonwealth, as a joint proprietor with the State of Maine of the territory alleged to be in dispute, has an interest in all negotiations respecting the same,—which demands her watchful attention, that her rights and interest may be preserved unimpaired and unchanged without her assent.

Resolved, That the Governor, with the advice and consent of the Council, be authorized and requested, from time to time, to adopt such measures, to secure the rights and interests of the Commonwealth in said territory, and to produce an honorable and satisfactory adjustment, as the emergency may demand.

Resolved, That no compromise which concedes any territory west of the treaty line of 1783 can be constitutionally made without the assent of Maine and Massachusetts; and that, as they are co-proprietors of the soil, this Commonwealth will cheerfully co-operate with Maine in support of their mutual interests and rights.

Resolved, That the Governor be requested to transmit a copy of these resolutions to the President of the United States, and to the Governor of the State of Maine.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
March 3, 1842.
Passed: SAMUEL H. WALLEY.
Speaker pro tem.

IN SENATE, March 3, 1842.
Passed: JOSIAH QUINCY, Jr.
President.

Approved, March 3d, 1842.

Secretary of the Commonwealth.

*Mr. Webster to Gov. Fairfield.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, 11th April, 1842.

Your excellency is aware that, previous to March, 1841, a negotiation had been going on for some time between the Secretary of State of the United States, under the direction of the President, and the British minister accredited to this Government, having for its object the creation of a joint commission for settling the controversy respecting the Northeastern boundary of the United States, with a provision for an ultimate reference to arbitrators, to be appointed by some of the sovereigns of Europe, in case an arbitration should become necessary. On the leading features of a convention for this purpose, the two Governments were agreed; but, on several matters of detail, the parties differed, and appear to have been interchanging their respective views and opinions, projects and counter-projects, without coming to a final arrangement, down to August, 1840. Various causes, not now necessary to be explained, arrested the progress of the negotiation at that time, and no considerable advance has since been made in it.

It seems to have been understood on both sides, that, one arbitration having failed, it was the duty of the two parties to proceed to institute another, according to the spirit of the treaty of Ghent and other treaties; and the President has felt it to be his duty, unless some new course should be proposed, to cause the negotiation to be resumed, and pressed to its conclusion. But I have now to inform your excellency that Lord Ashburton, a minister plenipotentiary and special, has arrived at the seat of Government of the United States, charged with full powers from his sovereign to negotiate and settle the different matters in discussion between the two Governments. I have further to state to you, that he has officially announced to this department that, in regard to the boundary question, he has authority to treat for a conventional line, or line by agreement, on such terms and conditions, and with such mutual considerations and equivalents, as may be thought just and equitable; and that he is ready to enter on a negotiation for such conventional line, so soon as this Government shall say that it is authorized and ready, on its part, to commence such negotiation.

Under these circumstances, the President has felt it to be his duty to call the serious attention of the Governments of Maine and Massachusetts to the subject, and to submit to those Governments the propriety of their co-operation, to a certain extent, and in a certain form, in an endeavor to terminate a controversy already of so long duration, and which seems very likely to be still considerably further protracted before the desired end of a final adjustment shall be attained, unless a shorter course of arriving at that end be adopted than such as has heretofore been pursued, and as the two Governments are still pursuing.

Yet, without the concurrence of the two States whose rights are more immediately concerned, (both having an interest in the soil, and one of them in the jurisdiction and government,) the duty of this Government will be to adopt no new course, but, in compliance with treaty stipulations, and in furtherance of what has already been done, to hasten the pending negotiations as fast as possible.

But the President thinks it a highly desirable object to prevent the delays necessarily incident to any settlement of the question by these means. Such delays are great and unavoidable. It has been found that an exploration and examination of the several lines constitute a work of three years. The existing commission for making such exploration, under the authority of the United States, has been occupied two summers, and a very considerable portion of the work remains still to be done. If a joint commission should be appointed, and should go through the same work, and the commissioners should disagree, (as is very possible,) and an arbitration on that account become indispensable, the arbitrators might find it necessary to make an exploration and survey themselves, or cause the same to be done by others of their own appointment. If to these causes, operating to postpone the final decision, be added the time necessary to appoint arbitrators, and for their preparation to leave Europe for the service, and the various retarding incidents always attending such operations, seven or eight years constitute, perhaps, the shortest period within which we can look for a final result. In the meantime, great expenses have been incurred, and further expenses cannot be avoided. It is well known that the controversy has brought heavy charges upon Maine herself, to the remuneration or proper settlement of which she cannot be expected to be indifferent. The exploration by the Government of the United States has already cost a hundred thousand dollars, and the charge of another summer's work is in prospect. These facts may be sufficient to form a probable estimate of the whole expense likely to be incurred before the controversy can be settled by arbitration; and our experience admonishes us that even another arbitration might possibly fail.

The opinion of this Government upon the justice and validity of the American claim has been expressed at so many times, and in so many forms, that a repetition of that opinion is not necessary. But the subject is a subject in dispute. The Government has agreed to make it matter of reference and arbitration; and it must fulfil that agreement, unless another mode for settling the controversy should be resorted to, with the hope of producing a speedier decision. The President proposes, then, that the Governments of Maine and Massachusetts should severally appoint a commissioner or commissioners, empowered to confer with the authorities of this Government upon a conventional line, or line by agreement, with its terms, conditions, considerations, and equivalents, with an understanding that no such line will be agreed upon without the assent of such commissioners.

This mode of proceeding, or some other which shall express assent beforehand, seems indispensable, if any negotiation for a conventional line is to be had; since, if happily a treaty should be the result of the negotiation, it can only be submitted to the Senate of the United States for ratification.

It is a subject of deep and sincere regret to the President, that the British plenipotentiary did not arrive in the country and make known his powers in time to have made this communication before the annual session of the Legislatures of the two States had been brought to a close. He perceives and laments the inconvenience which may be experienced from reassembling those Legislatures. But the British mission is a special one; it does not supersede the resident mission of the British Government at Washington, and its stay in the United States is not expected to be long. In addition to these considerations, it is to be suggested that more than four months of the session of Congress have already passed; and it is highly desirable, if any treaty for a conventional line should be agreed on, it should be concluded before the session shall terminate, not only because of the necessity of the ratification of the Senate, but also because it is not impossible that measures may be thought advisable, or become important, which can only be accomplished by the authority of both Houses.

These considerations, in addition to the importance of the subject, and a firm conviction in the mind of the President that the interests of both countries, as well as the interests of the two States more immediately concerned, require a prompt effort to bring this dispute to an end, constrain him to express an earnest hope that your excellency will convene the Legislature of Maine, and submit the subject to its grave and candid deliberation.

I am, &c.,
DANIEL WEBSTER.

His Excellency JOHN FAIRFIELD,
Governor of Maine.

Governor Davis to Mr. Webster.

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
Worcester, Mass., April 17, 1842.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the reception of your official communication announcing the arrival of Lord Ashburton, as a special envoy from her Majesty the Queen of the United Kingdoms, vested with full authority to adjust, by a conventional line, the Northeastern boundary of the United States. It will be highly satisfactory to the people of this Commonwealth to learn that no attempt is to be made to establish a line by compromise, without their assent; but if such a line can be agreed upon for a satisfactory equivalent, which should leave all the parties interested at peace, and terminate the controversy, I have no doubt it would meet with the approbation of the people of this State. No opinion can, with safety, be formed upon any such proposition, till it is submitted in its details, and fully understood. That the parties may all have full opportunity to act with deliberation, the desire of the President is, that the Legislatures of Massachusetts and Maine should be assembled, to make suitable provisions for the appointment of commissioners to take charge of their respective interests at Washington, during the negotiation between the United States and Great Britain.

Anticipating the contingency which has occurred, I invited the attention of the Legislature to the subject while in session, and suggested the expediency of legislation which should provide for it. In pursuance of that suggestion, certain joint resolutions were passed and approved, which have been forwarded to the President, which appear to me to confer all the authority necessary, and were undoubtedly designed by the Legislature to meet this emergency. This wise provision will, I trust, supersede all occasion for reassembling the Legislature, as the Governor and Council have authority to act in the matter in any way that the interests and honor of the Commonwealth demand. There will be a meeting of the Council, by appointment, on the 25th of May, which, if Maine can only move after legislation is had, will be sufficiently seasonable for all practicable purposes, when the subject will be laid before them, and there can be little doubt that they will acquiesce in the propriety of sending a commissioner to represent the State in a matter of such decided importance.

If this movement on the part of Great Britain is indicative, as it seems to me it is, of a settled purpose to close the controversy, and she is prepared to give satisfactory equivalents for the concession of territory sufficient to answer her purposes, then the division of such an equivalent or equivalents between Maine and Massachusetts will become an important question; but it should in no particular be left for future discussion or decision, by Congress or any other body, but should be definitively adjusted in the general arrangement, that each State may know the exact measure of its rights.

You will learn, also, from these resolutions, the disposition of the State to bring this question to an issue, in any manner consistent with her honor, interest, and dignity. The opinions conveyed in them, as far as I know, were unanimous, and indicate the tone of public sentiment. The people of Massachusetts are not disposed to yield anything to unjust pretension. Not a particle of doubt is entertained, by any one, that the treaty line of 1783 may be as certainly identified as Mar's Hill; and the northwest angle of Nova Scotia as certainly established by the description in the treaty, as the meridian of Quebec. We all feel that no doubt can exist that there are highlands which divide the waters that flow into the St. Lawrence and the sea; and that a line due north can be run from the monument to the dividing summit. These are matters that no one can feel any hesitation about, and hence there is but one opinion in Massachusetts. While, therefore, we cannot listen to a claim upon what we know to be our own, we can, in the spirit of peace and accommodation, yield something to the convenience of a neighbor, by agreement. This is, without shade of coloring, the sentiment of Massachusetts. She will, on honorable terms, concede something to the convenience and necessity of Great Britain; but nothing—not a rood of barren heath or rock—to unfounded claims. If an earlier day than the 25th of May shall prove desirable, the Council can be summoned.

I have the honor to be your obedient servant,
JOHN DAVIS.

To the SECRETARY OF STATE.

Mr. Webster to Gov. Davis.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, April 16, 1842.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt, from your Excellency, of certain resolves concerning the Northeastern boundary of the United States, passed by the Legislature of Massachusetts on the 31 day of March last.

As those resolves appear to recognise the propriety of endeavoring to fix upon a line by compromise, with the assent of Maine and Massachusetts; and as they authorize your Excellency, with advice of Council, to adopt such measures to secure the rights and interests of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts as the emergency may demand, it appears to me that they are a sufficient warrant for such proceedings as you may see fit to adopt, in order to gain the assent of the Commonwealth to any line of boundary which may be just and equitable, and upon which the parties may be likely to agree. If your Excellency should take this view of the subject, a call of the Legislature would of course be unnecessary.

I have the honor to be, &c.,
DANIEL WEBSTER.

His Excellency JOHN DAVIS,
Governor of Massachusetts.

Gov. Davis to Mr. Webster.

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
Worcester, April 27, 1842.

SIR: Since I last addressed you, I have received your favor of the 16th instant, by which it appears the resolutions of the Legislature of this Commonwealth have reached you. These resolves, respecting the Northeastern boundary, were adopted to meet the contingency which has occurred, and to avoid any necessity for reassembling the Legislature on this account. As soon as it became certain that a special envoy was to be despatched hither by the Queen of the United Kingdoms, it was apparent to me that he would be authorized to propose a conventional line, as this is manifestly the only alternative short of acceding to the treaty line of 1783. When the subject was brought to the attention of the Legislature, it seemed to entertain similar views, and with great harmony of opinion provided, as well as the state of things, which was then wholly conjectural, would enable them.

The Council will meet on the 25th of May for the regular despatch of business, when their attention will be invited to the expediency of consenting to the appointment of an agent or agents to represent the State.

I have the honor to be,
Your obedient servant,
J. DAVIS.

The SECRETARY OF STATE for the United States.

The Governor of Maine to the President.

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
Augusta, May 27, 1842.

SIR: I have the honor to enclose a copy of preamble and resolutions adopted by the Legislature of this State, relating to the subject of the northern and northeastern boundaries of Maine; and also to inform you that the Hon. Edward Kavanagh, Hon. Edward Kent, Hon. William H. Preble, and Hon. John Otis, have been elected commissioners under said resolves.

Most respectfully,
Your obedient servant,
JOHN FAIRFIELD.

President of the United States, Washington.

STATE OF MAINE.

The joint select committee of both houses of the Legislature, to which was referred the Governor's message of the 18th instant, with the accompanying communication from the Secretary of State of the United States, have had the same under consideration, and ask leave to report the following preamble and resolutions.

EDWARD KAVANAGH, Chairman.

COMMITTEE ROOM, 20th May, 1842.

Resolves in relation to the Northeastern boundary of this State.

Whereas the preceding Legislatures of this State, in conformity with the well-settled conviction of all the people thereof, and with incontrovertible evidence before them on the subject, have uniformly declared that the boundary of Maine, on its Northern and Northeastern frontiers, as designated in the treaty of 1783, can be laid down and fixed according to the terms of that treaty; and that such line embraces all the territory over which this State claims property, sovereignty, and jurisdiction; and the Executive and Congress of the United States having recognised the validity of that claim in its full extent, this Legislature renews such declarations in the most solemn manner: and

Whereas, for a series of years, every attempt to adjust the vexed question in regard to the establishment of said boundary having proved ineffectual, it has been represented to the Government of this State that the minister plenipotentiary and special of her Britannic Majesty at Washington, has officially announced to the Government of the United States that he has authority to treat for a conventional line, or line by agreement, on such terms and conditions, and with such considerations and equivalents, as may be thought just and equitable; and that he is ready to enter upon a negotiation for such conventional line as soon as the Government of the United States shall say that it is authorized and ready, on its part, to commence such negotiation: and

Whereas the Government of the United States, not possessing the constitutional power to conclude any such negotiation without the assent of Maine, has invited the Government of this State to cooperate to a certain extent, and in a certain form, in an endeavor to terminate a controversy of so long duration:

Now, considering the premises, and believing that the people of this State, after having already manifested a forbearance honorable to their character, under long-continued violations of their rights by a foreign nation; and, though not disposed to yield to unfounded pretensions, are still willing, in regard to the proposal now made to the General Government to give additional evidence to their fellow-citizens, throughout the United States, of their desire to preserve the peace of this Union, by taking measures to discuss and conclude, if possible, the subject in controversy in a manner that will secure the honor and interests of the State, this Legislature adopts the following resolutions—with the understanding, however, that in the event of a failure in such endeavor towards an arrangement, no proceedings thereunder shall be so construed as to prejudice in any manner the rights of the State as they have been herein asserted to exist:

Resolved, That there shall be chosen, by ballot, in convention of both branches of the Legislature, four persons, who are hereby constituted and appointed commissioners, on the part of this State, to repair to the seat of Government of the United States, and to confer with the authorities of that Government touching a conventional line, or line by agreement, between the State of Maine and the British provinces, having regard to the line designated by the treaty of 1783, as uniformly claimed by this State, and to the declarations and views expressed in the foregoing preamble, and to give the assent of this State to any such conventional line, with such terms, conditions, considerations, and equivalents, as they shall deem consistent with the honor and interests of the State; with the understanding that no such line be agreed upon without the unanimous assent of such commissioners.

Resolved, That this State cannot regard the relinquishment by the British Government of any claim heretofore advanced by it to territory included within the limits of the line of this State as designated by the treaty of 1783, and uniformly claimed by Maine, as a consideration or equivalent within the meaning of these resolutions.

Resolved, That the said commissioners be furnished by the Governor with evidence of their appointment, under the seal of the State.

Resolved, That the Governor, by and with the advice and consent of the Council, have power to fill any vacancy that may occur in said commission, by death, resignation, or otherwise.

Resolved, That the said commissioners make return of their doings herein to the Governor, to be by him presented to the Legislature at its next session.

STATE OF MAINE.

SECRETARY'S OFFICE, AUGUSTA,
May 26, 1842.

I hereby certify that the foregoing is a true copy of the original preamble and resolutions deposited in this office.

Attest: PHILIP C. JOHNSON,
Secretary of State.

The Maine Commissioners to Mr. Webster.

FULLER'S HOTEL, WASHINGTON,
June 12, 1842.

The commissioners of Maine, on the subject of the Northeastern boundary, present their respectful compliments to the honorable Mr. Webster, Secretary of State of the United States, and beg leave to inform him that they are now in this city, ready to enter upon the business intrusted to them. They also avail themselves of the occasion to request him to name the time and place when and where it would suit the convenience of the Secretary of State to receive them.

Mr. Webster to the Maine Commissioners.

PRESIDENT'S SQUARE, June 12, 1842.

Mr. Webster has the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the note of the commissioners of Maine, announcing their arrival, and their readiness to enter on the business of their appointment.

MR. W. will have great pleasure in receiving the commissioners at the Department of State, on Monday, at 1 o'clock.

WASHINGTON, June 13, 1842.

SIR: The undersigned, commissioners appointed by the State of Massachusetts to confer with the Government of the United States upon a conventional line to be established on our Northeastern boundary, are ready to proceed in the execution of their commission whenever the Secretary may signify his wish to meet them. Our colleague (Mr. Allen) will probably be here to-morrow.

We have the honor to remain, with the highest respect, your obedient servants,

ABBOTT LAWRENCE,
JOHN MILLS.

HON. DANIEL WEBSTER, Secretary of State.

Mr. Webster to the Commissioners of Massachusetts.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, June 13, 1842.

The undersigned has the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the communication addressed to him this day by Messrs. Lawrence and Mills, commissioners of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts. He will be happy to see these gentlemen at this department at ½ past 1 o'clock, p. m., to-day.

DANIEL WEBSTER.

Messrs. LAWRENCE and MILLS,
Commissioners of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts.

The Maine Commissioners to Mr. Webster.

WASHINGTON, June 29, 1842.

SIR: The undersigned, commissioners of Maine, have given to the letter of Lord Ashburton, addressed to you, under date of the 21st instant, and by you communicated to them, all the consideration which the importance of the subject of which it treats, the views it expresses, and the proposition it submits to you, demand.

There are passages in his Lordship's communication, the exact extent of the meaning of which the undersigned are not quite sure that they fully understand.

In speaking of the inhabitants on the south side of the St. John, in the Madawaska settlement, he says: "I cannot, in any case, abandon the obvious interest of these people." Again, in speaking of the proposition submitted by him, he remarks: "I have not treated the subject in the ordinary form of a bargain, where the party making the proposal leaves himself something to give up. The case would not admit of this, even if I could bring myself so to act."

If his Lordship's meaning is, that the proposed boundary, by agreement or conventional line, between the State of Maine and the Province of New Brunswick, must, at all events, be established on the south side of the St. John, extending from the due-north line to Fish river, and at a distance back from the river, so as to include the Madawaska settlement, and that the adoption of such a line is a sine qua non on the part of the British Government, the commissioners on the part of the State of Maine feel it their duty as distinctly to say that any attempt at an amicable adjustment of the controversy respecting the Northeastern boundary on that basis, with the consent of Maine, would be entirely fruitless.

The people of Maine have a deep settled conviction and the fullest confidence in the justice of their claim, to its utmost extent; yet, being appealed to as a constituent member of the American Union, and called upon, as such, to yield something in a spirit of patriotism for the common good, and to listen, in a spirit of peace, of accommodation, and good neighborhood, to propositions for an amicable settlement of the existing controversy, they have cheerfully and promptly responded to the appeal. Her Governor and Legislature, in good faith, immediately adopted the measures necessary on her part, with a view to relinquish to Great Britain such portion of territory and jurisdiction as might be needed by her for her accommodation, on such terms and for such equivalents as might be mutually satisfactory. Beyond this, nothing more was supposed to be expected or desired. During the negotiations at Ghent, the British commissioners, in a communication to the American commissioners, dated October 8, 1814, distinctly avow that the British Government never required all that portion of Massachusetts intervening between the province of New Brunswick and Quebec should be ceded to Great Britain, but only that small portion of unsettled country which intercepts the communication between Halifax and Quebec. So his Lordship, in his communication, admits that the reasons which have induced the British Government to maintain their rights ("claim") in this controversy are, "the establishing a good boundary between our two countries so as to prevent collisions and dispute, and an unobstructed communication and connexion of our colonies with each other." Again: looking, as he says, on the map, for such a boundary, "with reference to the sole object of Great Britain as already described, the line of the St. John, from where the north line from the St. Croix strikes it, up to some one of its sources, seems evidently to suit both parties," &c. Indeed, the portion of territory which Great Britain needs for her accommodation is so perfectly obvious, that no material difference of opinion, it is believed, has ever been expressed on the subject. It is that portion which lies north of the St. John and east of the Madawaska rivers, with a strip of convenient width on the west side of the latter river, and of the lake from which it issues.

Sent here, then, under this state of things, and with these views, by the Legislature of Maine, in a spirit of peace and conciliation, her commissioners were surprised and pained to be repelled as it were, in the outset, by such a proposition as his Lordship has submitted to you. On carefully analyzing it, it will be seen that, in addition to all the territory needed by Great Britain for her accommodation, as stated and admitted by her own authorities and agents, it requires that Maine should further yield a valuable territory, of more than fifty miles in extent, lying along the south side of the St. John, extending from the due-north line westerly to Fish river, and so back from the river St. John, as it is understood, to the Eagle lakes, and probably to the Little Madawaska and Aroostook. Speaking of this branch of the proposition, his Lordship treats it merely as "departing to this inconsiderable extent from the marked line of the river St. John." His Lordship does not state how much further up the river he contemplates going. His language implies that the distance to Fish river, although over fifty miles, is only an inconsiderable part of the whole extent contemplated. This part of the proposition, then, would seem to imply a relinquishment also, on the part of Maine, of a large portion of her territory north of the St. John and west of the Madawaska rivers. In this view of the case, it is due to the Governor, and Legislature, and people of Maine, to say that they had not expected such a proposition. If they had, nothing is hazarded in saying no commissioners would have been sent here to receive and consider it. And, in this state of things, it becomes a bounden duty, on the part of the undersigned, to say to you, that if the yielding and relinquishing, on the part of the State of Maine, of any portion of territory, however small, on the south side of the St. John, be with her Britannic Majesty's Government a sine qua non to an amicable settlement of the boundary of Maine, the mission of the commissioners of Maine is ended. They came not to throw obstacles in the way to the successful accomplishment of the great work you have on hand—that of consolidating an honorable peace between two great nations; but, on the contrary, they came prepared to yield much, to sacrifice much, on the part of Maine, to the peace of the Union and the interest of her sister States. If the hopes of the people of Maine and of the United States are to be disappointed, it is believed the fault lies not at the door of the Governor or Legislature of Maine, or of her commissioners.

At the date of the earliest maps of that country, the river now called the Madawaska had not acquired a distinctive name; and consequently the source of that river was regarded as one of the sources, if not the principal source, of the St. John. On looking at the map, it will at once be seen that the general course of the St. John and Madawaska, from the mouth of the former to the source of the latter, are one and the same. As connected with this fact, we find that at least five different maps, published in London in the years 1765, 1769, 1771, 1774, and 1775, place the northwest angle of Nova Scotia on the highlands at the source of that branch of the St. John, then without distinctive appellation, but now known as the Madawaska.

One of these five is specially quoted in the report of the committee of Congress of the 16th August, 1782, so often referred to in this controversy. In no map of a date prior to the treaty of 1783, it is believed, is the northwest angle of Nova Scotia placed on the highlands at the source of any branch whatever of the St. John, but the Madawaska. Hence the proposition of the American commissioners, in 1782, in discussing the subject of the boundaries of the United States, to begin at the northwest angle of Nova Scotia, on the highlands at the source of the St. John. Respect for the distinguished men who negotiated the treaty of peace of 1783, would induce the undersigned to renew the proposition, so far as regards adopting the Madawaska as a boundary, were it not that, being prepared to yield all that is needed for the accommodation of Great Britain, they are aware that a strip on the west side of that river is necessary to that object. The particular map quoted in the report above mentioned is that of Emanuel Bowen, geographer to the King, published in 1775, in which the Penobscot, and a line drawn from one of its sources, crossing the St. John, to the source of that branch now called the Madawaska, are distinctly laid down as the western boundary of Nova Scotia. So in all the maps which place the northwest angle of Nova Scotia on the highlands at the source of the St. John, those highlands and that source are on the north side of the Walloostook, which is now known to be the main branch of the St. John. The inference or assumption, then, that it was not the intention of the commissioners who negotiated the treaty of peace that any portion of the valley or waters of the St. John should be included within the limits of the United States, because the American negotiators of that treaty proposed the northwest angle of Nova Scotia, on the highlands at the source of the St. John, as the place of beginning, in establishing the boundaries of the United States, is, it is believed, wholly unwarranted. The fact, on the contrary, as it seems to the undersigned, disproves any such intention or supposition on the part of the American commissioners.

The British commissaries, Messrs. Mildmay and De Cosne, in their reply of the 23d of January, 1753, to the French commissaries, say: "We have sufficiently proved, first, that Acadia (Nova Scotia) has had an inland limit from the earliest times; and, secondly, that that limit has ever been the river St. Lawrence." At that time, then, the British Government contended that the northwest angle of Nova Scotia was formed by the river St. Lawrence, as one line, and a line drawn north from the St. Croix to the St. Lawrence as the other; and this is in conformity with the position assigned to it on Mitchell's map and some others. By the grant to Sir William Alexander, the northwest angle of Nova Scotia was also placed at the river St. Lawrence, although its precise locality on that river is not determined by the language of the grant.

The French commissaries, on their part, contended that the limits of Canada extended on the south side of the St. Lawrence, so as to embrace the territory watered by the rivers that emptied themselves into the river St. Lawrence. "Les pays dont les eaux vont se rendre dans le fleuve St. Laurent." The commissions granted to the Governors of Canada, and all the public documents issued by the authority of the French Government, fully sustain their position. There is no ground, say they, for entertaining a doubt that all the commissions granted by the King, for the government of Canada, were conceived in the same terms. In the splendid Universal Atlas, published at Paris by De Vaugondy & Son, in 1757, there is a map dated 1755, and referred to expressly by the author, who was geographer to the King, as illustrating the dispute between France and Great Britain, in regard to the boundaries of their respective territories. On this map, the dividing ridge, or highlands, is placed where the United States have ever contended it is only to be found; and what is deserving of notice is, that the northwest angle of Nova Scotia is there placed on those highlands, at the head of the lake there called Metaousta; the line separating Nova Scotia from New England being drawn through the centre of that lake, to the source of the St. Croix. The disputes above referred to having led to a war between France and Great Britain, France finally ceded to Great Britain, in February, 1763, Canada, and abandoned all claim to Nova Scotia and the whole territory in controversy between the two powers. On the 7th of October, 1763, his Britannic Majesty issued his proclamation, defining the southern boundary of Canada, or the province of Quebec, and establishing it where the French had always contended it was. Immediately afterward, he also defined and established the western limit of Nova Scotia; alleging, by way of justification of certain pretensions which had been put forward in opposition to Massachusetts, in regard to the Penobscot as a boundary, that, although he might have removed the line as far west as the Penobscot, yet he would limit himself at the St. Croix. Accordingly, the western boundary of Nova Scotia was, in November, 1763, defined and established as follows: "By a line," &c., "across the entrance of the Bay of Fundy, to the mouth of the river St. Croix, by the said river to its source, and by a line drawn due north from thence to the southern boundary of our province of Quebec." The northwest angle of Nova Scotia was, by these two documents, established in November, 1763, and defined to be the angle formed by the line last described, and the line which "passes along the highlands which divide the rivers that empty themselves into the said river St. Lawrence, from those which fall into the sea, and also along the north coast of the Bay des Chaleurs." We now see wherefore it was that the distinguished men who negotiated the treaty of peace were so particular in describing the precise position, and giving so exact a definition of the northwest angle of Nova Scotia, mentioned in the treaty. They distinctly and explicitly state that motive to be, that "all disputes which might arise in future, on the subject of the boundaries of the United States, may be prevented." Their starting bound, or point of departure, is the northwest angle of Nova Scotia. Here the question presents itself—what northwest angle? They describe it, not that northwest angle which in several maps is laid down on the highlands, at the Madawaska source of the St. John; not that northwest angle on the southern bank of the river St. Lawrence, laid down on Mitchell's map, and so strenuously contended for by the British Government and British commissaries in their dispute with France; not that northwest angle on the river St. Lawrence, described in the charter or grant by King James to Sir William Alexander; but the northwest angle of Nova Scotia, defined and established in November, 1763, "to wit: that angle which is formed by a line drawn due north from the source of St. Croix river, to the highlands," &c.; and, further, that there might be no ground for reviving the old pretension in regard to the Penobscot, or any other western river, being intended as the St. Croix, the river St. Croix intended in the treaty is declared to have its mouth in the Bay of Fundy. Nor is there any pretence of any doubt or question having been raised, until long after the treaty of peace, as to what highlands were intended in the proclamation of 1763 as constituting the southern boundary of Quebec. So far from it, the Parliament of Great Britain, in 1774, passed the Quebec act, which was one of the grievances complained of by the colonies, and which confirmed the boundaries, so far as the matter under consideration is concerned, defined and established by that proclamation. Of these two public acts, the American commissioners were not ignorant nor misinformed. They are both expressly referred to and mentioned in the report of August 16, 1782, already mentioned. To find these highlands, the statesman and jurist, who has no other object in view than to expound the treaty according to its terms and provisions, uninfluenced by any secret bias or preconceived theory, will, it is believed, begin, not at the mouth or source of the St. Croix, but on the bank of the river St. Lawrence, at a point north of the source of the river St. Croix; and, following the due-north line (so called) southward, he will find no difficulty in discovering the line of the "Versants," from which issue the rivers that empty themselves into the river St. Lawrence. The whole and exclusive object and intent of the proclamation of 1763, so far as relates to this matter of boundary in that section of country, was not in any way to affect or alter the limits of jurisdiction over the territory lying south of that line of "Versants," but only to cut off from Nova Scotia and Massachusetts that portion of territory which was watered by the rivers which empty themselves into the river St. Lawrence. Accordingly, the due-north line or boundary between Nova Scotia and Massachusetts is described as extending "from the source of the St. Croix to the southern boundary of our province of Quebec."

The commissioners of Maine do not consider themselves as sent here to argue the question of right in regard to the conflicting claims to the disputed territory, nor to listen to an argument in opposition to the claim of Maine. Their mission contemplated a far different and more conciliatory object. They have, however, felt themselves compelled, in justice to Maine, to reply to two positions assumed by Lord Ashburton—the soundness of which, with great deference and respect for his Lordship, they cannot admit: First. That "it was the intention of the parties to the treaty of peace of 1783 to leave to Great Britain, by their description of boundaries, the whole waters of the river St. John." Secondly. "That the treaty of 1783 was not executable according to its strict expression. His Lordship also speaks of "a volume of additional controversial matter, which he has not communicated, but which he has brought with him, and much of which would be of no inconsiderable weight and importance, if controversy were our object." Among the matter referred to in that volume, the undersigned believe they have reason to conjecture, will be found a map entitled "North America, with the New Discoveries," by William Faden, geographer to the King, published in the year 1785. That map—a copy of which is now before the undersigned, communicated by you—extends the British possessions so as to include the waters of the St. John, and dispenses with the due-north line of the treaty altogether. The map referred to is a small one, of small pretensions. It is, however, somewhat remarkable, that the same William Faden published, in 1783, a map, prepared with great care, entitled "The United States of North America, with the British and Spanish territories, according to the treaty," in which he lays down the boundary of Quebec according to the act of 1774, and the boundary of the United States in precise accordance with the American claim. He was not at that time geographer to the King. It is well known that difficulties, very soon after the treaty of peace, began to spring up between the United States and Great Britain, which became more and more exasperated, until the conclusion of the treaty negotiated by Mr. Jay. During that period, the boundary of the United States became more restricted on more British maps than the one published by Mr. Faden. How far the new light let in upon him by the feeling of the times and his new position enlightened the mind of Mr. Faden in making his new discoveries, it is neither our duty nor our disposition to discuss. Mr. Faden and others were only imitating, in this particular, what had been done some thirty years before, during the controversy between France and Great Britain; and again in the subsequent one between the Crown and Massachusetts, when the officers of the Crown were endeavoring to reclaim the territory east of the Penobscot.

As they have been assured that Lord Ashburton is restrained by his instructions from yielding the island of Grand Manan, or any of the islands in Passamaquoddy bay, or even any portion of the narrow strip of territory which lies between the due-north line from the source of the St. Croix and the St. John river, above Eel river, so called, as an equivalent for any portion of the territory claimed by Maine as within her boundaries, her commissioners, on their part, feel themselves constrained to say that the portion of territory within the limits of Maine, as claimed by her, which they are prepared, in a spirit of peace and good neighborhood, to yield for the accommodation of Great Britain, must be restrained and confined to such portion only, and in such reasonable extent, as is necessary to secure to Great Britain "an unobstructed communication and connexion of her colonies with each other." It appears, by his communication to you, that his Lordship proposes to yield the disputed territory claimed by New Hampshire, at the source of the Connecticut river; the strip of disputed territory at the head of Vermont, in the possession of that State, north of the forty fifth parallel of latitude; and the strip of disputed territory, embracing Rouse's point, on Lake Champlain, north of the same parallel, in the possession of the State of New York; notwithstanding these have been decided by the arbiter to belong of right to Great Britain.

Now, the undersigned are fully aware of the importance of having all these difficulties in regard to boundaries amicably adjusted, and that it is highly desirable to the United States to have them so adjusted, and to the particular States interested to be confirmed and quieted in their respective limits and possessions. But it cannot have escaped your attention, that all this is proposed to be done partly at the expense of Massachusetts, but principally at the expense of Maine. The only thing in the nature of an equivalent offered to Maine and Massachusetts, relates to a concession, by Great Britain, of the right of transporting the produce of the forest without duty down the St. John. It is not the intention of the undersigned to depreciate or underrate the value of such a concession; but it is contended that it is a privilege as desirable to New Brunswick as it is to Maine and Massachusetts. It is to the territory of Maine, watered by the St. John and its tributary streams, that the city of St. John's must look for the principal material to maintain her external commerce—for her means to pay for the supplies she receives from the mother country. The unobstructed navigation of the St. John, for the transportation of the products of the forest, free of toll or duty of any kind whatever, would be a concession mutually advantageous to Maine and Massachusetts on the one part, and to Great Britain and New Brunswick on the other; but, being mutually advantageous, it ought not, perhaps, to be treated exactly in the character of an equivalent. Yielding, however, to the force of the considerations which have been referred to—considerations which affect materially the interests of Maine and Massachusetts as members of the Union—and assuming it for granted, and as a condition, that the United States themselves will furnish to the two States such an equivalent as, in justice and equity, they ought to do, the undersigned, with the assent and concurrence of the commissioners of Massachusetts, propose the following as a conventional line, or line by agreement, between the United States and the State of Maine on the one part, and Great Britain and the territories of her Britannic Majesty on the other part, viz: Beginning at the middle of the main channel of the river St. John, where the due-north line from the source of the river St. Croix crosses the St. John; thence westerly, by the middle of the main channel of the St. John, to a point three miles westerly of the mouth of the river Madawaska; thence, by a straight line, to the outlet of Long Lake; thence westerly, by a direct line, to the point where the river St. Francis empties itself into Lake Pohenagamook; thence, continuing in the same direct line, to the highlands which divide the waters emptying themselves into the river Du Loup from those which empty themselves into the river St. Francis.

In proposing this line, the following reasons have presented themselves to the undersigned for adopting it as a conventional line, or line by agreement, in preference to any other:

1st. It yields to Great Britain all she needs to secure to her "an unobstructed communication and connexion of her colonies with each other;" and, connected with the unobstructed and free navigation of the St. John, seems to meet the legitimate wants of all parties.

2d. The most natural boundary from the due, north line to the highlands of the treaty would be the St. John and the Madawaska to its source, as first proposed by the American commissioners who negotiated the peace of 1783. But as that boundary, taken in its whole extent, would cut off the communication between the British colonies at the Grand portage, the line here proposed removes that difficulty. At or near the point where the proposed line leaves the St. John, which, from the due-north line from the St. Croix, pursues a northwesterly course upward, the river suddenly turns, and trends for a distance of about five miles nearly south, and thence for its whole course upward to its source trends southerly of west. To pursue the line of the St. John further west than the point indicated, which is about three miles above the mouth of the Madawaska, would be to adopt an angular line projecting itself into the American territory. The outlet of Long Lake is proposed as a natural and permanent bound, which cannot be mistaken; and for the same reason, the inlet of Lake Pohenagamook is also proposed; and the line being continued to the highlands, removes all possible ground of misapprehension and controversy.

3d. As Great Britain has restrained her minister plenipotentiary from granting any territorial equivalent, to be incorporated into the territorial limits of Maine, any further concession of territory on the part of Maine could hardly, it is apprehended, be expected from her.

In making the proposition above submitted on their part, in connexion with a concession on the part of Great Britain of the unobstructed navigation of the St. John, and all its branches and tributaries which, in any part, flow from the territory of the United States, for the transportation of the lumber and products of the forest, free of toll or duty, the undersigned had supposed it quite possible that they had misapprehended the meaning intended to be conveyed by the expression of Lord Ashburton, where he speaks of "some one of the sources of the St. John." But they have now just learned (informally) that the expression was used by him advisedly, meaning thereby some one of the sources of that river situated in the vicinity of the sources of the Penobscot and Chaudiere. His proposition, therefore, extends to a yielding, on the part of Maine, of the whole territory on the north side of the St. John, from the due-north line to its source; and this, too, without any territorial equivalent to Maine. With this explanation, the language of Lord Ashburton in calling the southern border of the St. John, from the due-north line to the mouth of Fish river, an "inconsiderable extent," is more readily understood. To this part of the proposition there is only one reply. Whatever may be the solicitude of the undersigned that the difficulties which have arisen in regard to the boundaries of Maine may be amicably and definitively arranged, the proposition, as now explained and understood, cannot be acceded to.

In making the offer they have submitted, the undersigned are sensible their proposition involves a sacrifice of no inconsiderable portion of the just claims and expectations of Maine. It is made in the spirit of peace—of conciliation. It is made to satisfy her sister States that Maine is not pertinacious or unreasonable, but is desirous of peace, and ready to make large sacrifices for the general good.

Before closing this communication, the undersigned feel it their duty, by way of explanation to state their views in regard to the French settlers at Madawaska. In any treaty which may be made with Great Britain, affecting these people, the grants which have been made to them by New Brunswick may and ought to be confirmed in fee simple, with such provision in regard to the possessory rights acquired by other actual settlers there, as may be just and equitable; and, also, the right may be reserved to the settlers on both banks of the river to elect, within some reasonable period, and determine of which Government the individuals signifying their election will remain, or become citizens or subjects. If, then, they should have any preference, they will have it in their power, on mature consideration and reflection, to decide for themselves, and act accordingly. The hard lot and sufferings of these people, and of their fathers, give them a claim to our sympathies. The atrocious cruelties practised upon their ancestors are matters of history; the appalling details of them are among their traditions. The fathers and the mothers have taught them to their children. When fleeing from their oppressors, in 1785, they settled down in the wilderness, at Madawaska; they believed and understood themselves to be within the limits and jurisdiction of the United States—a people of whom France had been the friend and ally in the war which had just terminated in their independence, and who was still the friend and ally of France in peace. Their history since that period had lost little of its interest. Too few in number, too weak in resources, too remote to expect or receive aid, they have submitted to whatever master assumed authority over them. With a knowledge of their history, and the wrongs they and their ancestors have suffered, it will be difficult for the people of Maine to bring themselves into the belief that these people are opposed to living under the mild and gentle sway of our free institutions. It will be equally difficult for the people of Maine to satisfy themselves that it is only from a lively and disinterested sympathy for these poor Frenchmen, that the Government of Great Britain is so solicitous to retain possession of the south bank of the St. John, extending from the due-north line, more than fifty miles, up to Fish river. On the best consideration they have been able to give to this subject, the undersigned can see nothing in the condition or circumstances of these settlers which would justify them in abandoning the very obvious and only natural boundary, to adopt one that must be altogether arbitrary.

The undersigned avail themselves of this occasion to tender to Mr. Webster, Secretary of State, assurances of their distinguished consideration and respect.

[CONFIDENTIAL.]

Mr. Webster to the Commissioners of Maine and Massachusetts.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, 12th July, 1842.

GENTLEMEN: I place in your hands a note received yesterday from Lord Ashburton; it would have been transmitted sooner, but I was not able to read it myself until this morning.

I shall have the honor of inviting a conference with you at an early opportunity, being very desirous of making progress in the business in which we are engaged, and satisfied that the various parties in interest are as well prepared now to come to a decision as they are likely to be at any time hereafter.

I have the honor, &c.,
DANIEL WEBSTER.

The Hon. COMMISSIONERS
Of Maine and Massachusetts.

Mr. Webster to the Maine Commissioners.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, July 15, 1842.

GENTLEMEN: You have had an opportunity of reading Lord Ashburton's note to me of the 11th of July. Since that date, I have had full and frequent conferences with him respecting the Eastern boundary, and believe I understand what is practicable to be done on that subject, so far as he is concerned. In these conferences, he has made no positive or binding proposition—thinking, perhaps, it would be more desirable, under present circumstances, that such proposition should proceed from the side of the United States. I have reason to believe, however, that he would agree to a line of boundary between the United States and the British provinces of Canada and New Brunswick, such as is described in a paper accompanying this, (marked B,) and identified by my signature.

In establishing the line between the monument and the St. John, it is thought necessary to adhere to that run and marked by the surveyors of the two Governments in 1817 and 1818. There is no doubt that the line recently run by Major Graham is more entirely correct; but, being an ex parte line, there would be objections to agreeing to it without examination, and thus another survey would become necessary. Grants and settlements, also, have been made, in conformity with the former line, and its errors are so inconsiderable that it is not thought that their correction is a sufficient object to disturb these settlements. Similar considerations have had great weight in adjusting the line in other parts of it.

The territory in dispute between the two countries contains 12,027 square miles, equal to 7,697,280 acres.

By the line described in the accompanying paper, there will be assigned to the United States 7,015 square miles, equal to 4,489,600 acres; and to England 5,012 square miles, equal to 3,207,680 acres.

By the award of the King of the Netherlands, there was assigned to the United States 7,908 square miles—5,061,120 acres; to England 4,119 square miles—2,636,160 acres.

The territory proposed to be relinquished to England, south of the line of the King of the Netherlands, is, as you will see, the mountain range from the upper part of the St. Francis river to the meeting of the two contested lines of boundary, at the Metjarmette portage, in the highlands, near the source of the St. John. This mountain tract contains 893 square miles—equal to 571,520 acres. It is supposed to be of no value for cultivation or settlement. On this point you will see, herewith, a letter from Captain Talcott, who has been occupied two summers in exploring the line of the highlands, and is intimately acquainted with the territory. The line leaves to the United States, between the base of the hills and the left bank of the St. John, and lying along upon the river, a territory of 657,280 acres, embracing, without doubt, all the valuable land south of the St. Francis, and west of the St. John. Of the general division of the territory, it is believed it may be safely said that, while the portion remaining with the United States is in quantity seven-twelfths, in value it is at least four-fifths of the whole.

Nor is it supposed that the possession of the mountain region is of any importance in connexion with the defence of the country, or any military operations. It lies below all the accustomed practicable passages for troops into and out of Lower Canada; that is to say, the Chaudière, Lake Champlain, and the Richelieu, and the St. Lawrence. If an army with its materiel could possibly pass into Canada over these mountains, it would only find itself on the banks of the St. Lawrence, below Quebec; and, on the other hand, it is not conceivable that an invading enemy from Lower Canada would attempt a passage in this direction, leaving the Chaudière on one hand, and the route by Madawaska on the other.

If this line should be agreed to on the part of the United States, I suppose that the British Minister would, as an equivalent, stipulate, first, for the use of the river St. John, for the conveyance of the timber growing on any of its branches to tide water, free from discriminating tolls, impositions, or inabilities of any kind; the timber enjoying all the privileges of British colonial timber. All opinions concur that this privilege of navigation must greatly enhance the value of the territory and the timber growing thereon, and prove exceedingly useful to the people of Maine. Second, that Rouse's Point, in Lake Champlain, and the lands heretofore supposed to be within the limits of New Hampshire, Vermont, and New York, but which a correct ascertainment of the 45th parallel of latitude shows to be in Canada, should be surrendered to the United States.

It is probable, also, that the disputed line of boundary in Lake Superior might be so adjusted as to leave a disputed island within the United States.

These cessions on the part of England would enure partly to the benefit of the States of New Hampshire, Vermont, and New York, but principally to the United States. The consideration on the part of England for making them, would be the manner agreed upon for adjusting the Eastern boundary. The price of the cession, therefore, whatever it might be, would, in fairness, belong to the two States interested in the manner of that adjustment.

Under the influence of these considerations, I am authorized to say that, if the commissioners of the two States assent to the line as described in the accompanying paper, the United States will undertake to pay to these States the sum of two hundred and fifty thousand dollars, to be divided between them in equal moieties; and, also, to undertake for the settlement and payment of the expenses incurred by those States for the maintenance of the civil posse; and, also, for a survey which it was found necessary to make.

The line suggested, with the compensations and equivalents which have been stated, is now submitted for your consideration. That it is all which might have been hoped for, looking to the strength of the American claim, can hardly be said. But, as the settlement of a controversy of such duration is a matter of high importance; as equivalents of undoubted value are offered; as longer postponement and delay would lead to further inconvenience, and to the incurring of further expenses; and as no better occasion—or, perhaps, any other occasion—for settling the boundary by agreement, or on the principle of equivalents, is ever likely to present itself, the Government of the United States hopes that the commissioners of the two States will find it to be consistent with their duty to assent to the line proposed, and to the terms and conditions attending the proposition.

The President has felt the deepest anxiety for an amicable settlement of the question, in a manner honorable to the country, and such as should preserve the rights and interests of the States concerned. From the moment of the announcement of Lord Ashburton's mission, he has sedulously endeavored to pursue a course the most respectful towards the States, and the most useful to their interests, as well as the most becoming to the character and dignity of the Government. He will be happy if the result shall be such as shall satisfy Maine and Massachusetts, as well as the rest of the country. With these sentiments on the part of the President, and with the conviction that no more advantageous arrangement can be made, the sub-

Beginning at the monument at the source of the river St. Croix, as designated by the commissioners under the fifth article of the treaty of 1794, between the Governments of the United States and Great Britain; thence, north, following the exploring line run and marked by the surveyors of the two Governments in the years 1817 and 1818, under the fifth article of the treaty of Ghent, to its intersection with the river St. John, and to the middle of the channel thereof; thence, up the middle of the main channel of the said river St. John, to the mouth of the river St. Francis; thence, up the middle of the channel of the said river St. Francis, and of the lakes through which it flows, to the outlet of the lake Pohenagamook; thence, southwesterly, in a straight line, to a point on the northwest branch of the river St. John, which point shall be ten miles distant from the main branch of the St. John, in a straight line, and in the nearest direction; but if the said point shall be found to be less than seven miles from the nearest point of the summit or crest of the highlands that divide those rivers which empty themselves into the river St. Lawrence from those which fall into the Atlantic ocean, then the said point shall be made to recede down the said river to a point seven miles in a straight line from the said summit or crest; thence, in a straight line, in a course about south eight degrees west, to the point where the parallel of latitude of 46 deg. 25 min. intersects the southwest branch of the St. John; thence, southerly, by the said branch, to the source thereof, in the highlands at the Metjarmette portage; thence, down along the said highlands, to the head of Hall's stream; thence, down the middle of said stream, till the line thus run intersects the old line of boundary surveyed and marked by Valentine and Collins, previously to the year 1774, as the 45th degree of latitude, and which has been known and understood to be the line of actual division between the States of New York and Vermont on one side, and the British province of Canada on the other; and from said point of intersection, west, along the said dividing line, as heretofore known and understood, to the Iroquois or St. Lawrence river.

WASHINGTON, 14th July, 1842.

SIR: The territory within the lines mentioned by you contains eight hundred and ninety-three square miles, equal to five hundred and seventy-one thousand five hundred and twenty acres. It is a long and narrow tract upon the mountains or highlands, the distance from Lake Pohenagamook to the Metjarmette portage being one hundred and ten miles. The territory is barren, and without timber of value; and I should estimate that nineteen parts out of twenty are unfit for cultivation. Along 80 miles of this territory, the highlands throw up into irregular eminences of different heights, and, though observing a general northeast and southwest direction, are not brought well into line. Some of the elevations are over three thousand feet above the sea.

The formation is primitive siliceous rock, with slate resting upon it, around the basis. Between the eminences are morasses and swamps, throughout which beds of moss, of luxuriant growth, rest on and cover the rocks and earth beneath. The growth is such as is usual in mountain regions on this continent, in high latitudes. On some of the ridges and eminences, birch and maple are found; on others, spruce and fir; and in the swamps, spruce intermixed with cedar; but the wood, everywhere, is insignificant, and of stinted growth. It will readily be seen, therefore, that, for cultivation, or as capable of furnishing the means of human subsistence, the lands are of no value.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

A. TALCOTT, Commissioner.

Hon. DANIEL WEBSTER, Secretary of State.

The Maine Commissioners to Mr. Webster.

WASHINGTON, July 16, 1842.

SIR: We learn from the letter addressed to you by Lord Ashburton, dated the 11th instant, and by you communicated to the commissioners of Maine and Massachusetts, that the line proposed by us as a conventional line, with the assent and concurrence of the commissioners of Massachusetts, in our note to you of the 29th ultimo, is inadmissible. His Lordship even expresses himself as being "quite at a loss to account for such a proposal;" and appeals to your candid judgment to say "whether this is a proposition of conciliation," and whether it could reasonably be expected that, whatever might be the anxiety of his Government for a friendly settlement, he could be found with power to accede to such terms. That public, to which his Lordship more than once alludes in both his letters, will have it in their power to judge which proposition, on the whole, under all the circumstances of the case, is best entitled to the character of conciliatory—his Lordship's or ours. To you, sir, the commissioners must be permitted to insist that they did intend and consider their offer as a proposition of conciliation, however it may appear to Lord Ashburton. It is predicated upon the basis of yielding to Great Britain all she needs, and more than she needs, for the natural, convenient, and "unobstructed communication and connexion of her colonies with each other." A desire on her part to obtain which, is believed to be at the bottom of this controversy; and the necessity of securing which, even his Lordship seems to admit has been the main reason of her continuing to persist in it. The royal arbiter, as his Lordship is pleased to call him, clearly understood this, and governed himself accordingly. He recommended the yielding, on the part of the United States, of this portion of territory, coupling it at the same time with the yielding, on the part of Great Britain, to the United States, of Rouse's Point, on Lake Champlain, and the fort there erected, with its kilometrical radius, and so much of the territory adjacent as might be necessary to include it. The existence of such a place and its fortifications had not been even alluded to in the American statements nor by the American agents. The British agents could not suffer such a fact to pass unnoticed. They studiously informed the royal arbiter in their first statement, and took care to advert to it again in their second, that there was "a certain point called Rouse's Point, where there happened to be an important American fort, which had been erected not long before, at considerable expense, as a defence for that frontier." Thus admonished of the fact, the royal arbiter readily availed himself of it, and placed the value and convenience of this supposed important military position and fortification to the account of the United States, as an offset for the territory in Maine needed for the convenience of Great Britain, and for "the unobstructed communication and connexion of her colonies with each other;" supposing, without doubt, that in so doing he was promoting the interests, and objects, and convenience of both nations. When, therefore, Lord Ashburton bases his proposition on the supposition that "the division by the King of the Netherlands satisfied fairly the equity of the case between the parties," and restrains that monarch's views to an equitable division of the territory in dispute in Maine only, he overlooks, as it appears to us, the fact that both matters were before his Majesty's mind at one and the same time; and that, as in the one instance he recommended that a certain portion of territory should be yielded by the United States to Great Britain for her accommodation, so, in the other, he recommended that a certain other portion of territory, belonging of right to Great Britain, in his opinion, should be yielded by Great Britain to the United States, for their supposed accommodation and security. It is true that Rouse's Point had formerly been considered as of great importance as a military position, and that the United States had expended very large sums of money in erecting fortifications there. The royal arbiter, therefore, acting under the influence of the ex parte information so gratuitously furnished him, might well attach to Rouse's Point and its fortifications an inflated importance; and, taking the whole relations and interests of the parties before him into consideration, might regard his recommendation as satisfying fairly the equity of the case between the parties. But, however this may be, it is certain that what would be an equitable division of the territory in dispute was never submitted to the King of the Netherlands at all by the United States; that no evidence upon that point was placed before him by the United States; nor were the United States or their agents ever heard or consulted on that point by him. Against the adoption of his recommendation in this respect, the State of Maine has ever solemnly protested; and the Senate of the United States, who alone had the constitutional power to adopt and ratify it, rejected it with great unanimity. The recommendation of the royal arbiter, therefore, given under such circumstances, can in no way affect the rights of the parties in interest, and is in fact entitled to no more consideration and respect than that of any other gentleman of equal intelligence and information under the same circumstances. We feel it our duty, therefore, to say to you that the hypothesis assumed by Lord Ashburton, that the portion of disputed territory cut off from Maine by the line recommended by the King of the Netherlands should be yielded to Great Britain without any equivalent whatever, cannot be, and in our opinion ought not for a moment to be, admitted or acquiesced in by the commissioners of Maine.

Among the objections made by Lord Ashburton to the line proposed by us, drawn from the bend of the St. John, three miles above the mouth of the Madawaska, to the outlet of Long lake, one is, that it is an arbitrary line, which nobody ever suggested before; and that it would give to Great Britain less than the award of the arbiter. All this is true. But the line proposed by us is a straight line, like that from the source of the St. Croix, drawn from one well-known natural monument to another well-known natural monument, within convenient distances of each other, and about which there could be no mistake or dispute. It yields also all, and more than all, that is needed by Great Britain for the unobstructed communication and connexion of her colonies with each other; and, as suggested by us in our note of the 29th ult., was proposed, rather than the channel of the Madawaska, solely for that reason and on that account; and what does Great Britain want of more? If the true character of that territory be of the description—"the miserable description"—stated by his Lordship in his note of the 21st ult., why should he feel it to be an objection that the line proposed by us would give to Great Britain less than the award of the arbiter, when it gives her enough to answer all her purposes? Beyond the designated bend of the St. John, the course of that river is such as to make with the St. Francis an acute angle—thereby forming between them a wedge of territory inserting itself, for its whole length, according to that award, into the territory of the United States. Again, at the mouth of the Turtle river, (so called,) a few miles above the designated bend of the St. John, there is a small settlement of Americans holding their lands under grants from Maine and Massachusetts. Again: the river St. Francis is one whose course is exceedingly crooked, having many sharp bends; so that, while the distance by the river and lakes from the Grand Portage to the mouth of the St. Francis is estimated by the assistant geologist of Massachusetts (who followed it down its whole length) at not less than eighty-five miles, the distance from the one point to the other in a straight line is only about forty miles. Moreover, the line recommended by the King of the Netherlands, without any knowledge of the topography of the country, is believed to be impracticable, on account of there being, in fact, no such stream emptying into the lake as, in his recommendation, he supposes to exist. And we will add, that, however miserable his Lordship may consider the territory there to be, we regard it as of much value, inasmuch as it is well known to be covered with a fine growth of timber—equal, it is said, to any to be found on the disputed territory.

In connexion with these considerations, we wish to add a few words on the subject of the right to float down our timber on the St John, since his Lordship has made it a special subject of comment. Great changes, as his Lordship well knows, are brought about in the state of things by the mere course of time. The timber of New Brunswick suitable for the British market has nearly all disappeared. While they had a supply of their own, the right of carrying down our lumber was most strenuously and pertinaciously resisted, as Lord Ashburton himself states. A very large quantity of the most valuable lumber is situated on the bank of the Alagash, above the falls of that river. By first throwing a dam across the Alagash, and then, with a common pickaxe and spade, digging a channel across the British highlands, our enterprising lumbermen have found the means of turning the valuable timber of the Alagash down the river Penobscot. More than six million feet of this lumber were sawed in the mills of the Penobscot the last season. How far the change in the disposition of the British cabinet, which his Lordship speaks of, has been effected by these and the like considerations, it is not our purpose to inquire; nor do we mean to be understood as undervaluing this change of policy. Our object has been to show that Great Britain, in making the proposition, is pursuing her own objects, and promoting her own interests, and not making any sacrifice, by way of an equivalent for concessions on our part. It will not have escaped your recollection that the river St. John is not a river navigable from the sea, in the ordinary acceptation of that expression. There is a ledge running across the mouth of that river, of such a character that, owing to the very high tides in the Bay of Fundy, there is a fall of about twenty feet out at low water, and a fall of some four feet in at high water. It is only about forty five minutes in a tide that you can pass in or out of the river at all; and, even during that short period, the passage is a difficult and dangerous one. So, again, there is a fall of about forty feet on the Aroostook before you reach the American territory; and a fall also on the St. John itself of eighty feet, before you reach the State of Maine, as you follow up the river. The boasted free navigation of the St. John and its tributaries, from the disputed territory, may well be illustrated by the free navigation of the Potomac to this city from the valley of the Shenandoah. When, therefore, as commissioners of Maine, we consented to accept, as an equivalent from Great Britain for the territory proposed to be yielded to her for her convenience and accommodation, the free navigation of the St. John for the floating down of our lumber, we did consider ourselves, under all the circumstances of the case, as having proposed all that a liberal spirit of conciliation could require us to do. And it will not be deemed improper by you if we here advert to the fact that we cannot regard the relinquishment by the British Government of any claim heretofore advanced by it to territory within the limits of Maine, as asserted by her, as a consideration or equivalent for the yielding, on our part, to Great Britain, of any other portion of the same territory. On this point, the declarations of the Legislature of Maine are explicit, and we are bound to respect them.

By his Lordship's note of the 11th instant, we learn that he withdraws that part of his proposition which relates to a cession of territory on the south side of the St. John. Even with this restriction of his proposition, the adoption of the St. John as a boundary from the line drawn due north from the source of the St. Croix, at its intersection with the St. John, to a source of that river in the vicinity of the sources of the Penobscot and Metjarmette, would yield to Great Britain nearly four millions of acres, and more than one-half of the whole territory to which she has ever pretended to set up a claim. Nor is this all. His Lordship further proposes to abide by the exploring line (so called) run and marked in 1817, from the monument at the source of the St. Croix—a line which interferes with, and cuts off, a portion of the grants made long before by Massachusetts. This line is well known not to be the true line—never was run as such, nor pretended so to be. It takes, however, from Maine a strip of territory which is nearly a mile wide where it crosses the St. John, and which diminishes in width till it reaches the monument. His Lordship's proposition contemplates the adoption and establishment of that exploring line as the true boundary. It does not fall within our province to consider the value of those shreds and patches which his Lordship proposes to yield to the United States as an equivalent. In New Hampshire, he consents to take the true northwest source of Connecticut river, instead of the northeast source, as being the source intended in the treaty of 1783. In Vermont, he will abide by the old line, which was run, marked, and solemnly established nearly seventy years ago. In New York, he will abide by the same old line, the effect of rectifying it being merely to give to New York a small angular strip on the west, and Great Britain a small angular strip on the east. These small tracts and parings shaved from the States just named, and the right of floating down the St. John the products of the forest, as already explained, constitute alone the sum and magnitude of the equivalent offered by his Lordship for the whole territory of Maine on the north side of the St. John. Whether such a proposition has pre-eminent claims over the one we have made, to be regarded as a "proposition of conciliation," we leave to that public to which his Lordship is pleased so often to refer.

Lord Ashburton has been led into an error, (unintentional, no doubt, on his part) if he supposes that, in submitting to you what we apprehend to be the reason why the precise and peculiar phraseology used in the treaty of 1783, respecting the northwest angle of Nova Scotia, was adopted by the distinguished men who framed it, our object was to revive and enter upon a controversy, which, for the present, at least, should be permitted to rest in peace. His Lordship, in his letter to you of the 21st ultimo, had assumed it as a fact, and as the ground upon which the negotiation for an amicable settlement was to proceed, that the language and phraseology of the treaty of 1783 was such, "that the treaty itself was not executable according to its strict expression." We, on our part, could make no such "admission," nor acquiesce in any such "presumption," nor by our silence even be supposed, for a moment, to proceed in the negotiation on any such ground or hypothesis; nor could we suffer to pass without observation the declaration of a settled conviction on the part of the minister of Great Britain, made under such circumstances, and with such bearings, "that it was the intention of the parties to the treaty of 1783 to leave to Great Britain the whole waters of the St. John." If his Lordship would have avoided the introduction of any remarks bearing on these points on our part, it seems to us that he himself should have avoided giving occasion for them. It is not a little remarkable, that the very dispute which the sagacious men who framed the treaty endeavored, by their studied and select phraseology and terms to guard against, should have arisen, notwithstanding all their care and precaution.

We have already shown, in our letter to you of the 29th ultimo, that the members of the Continental Congress and the framers of the treaty of 1783 well knew of the existence and prescriptions of the proclamation of 1763, and the provisions of the Quebec act of 1774. They also well knew that the northwest angle of Nova Scotia, and the northeast angle of Massachusetts (Maine) were adjacent angles.

They knew that the jurisdiction of Massachusetts and Nova Scotia extended back from the Atlantic ocean to the southern boundary of the province of Quebec; and they well knew that the southern boundary of the province of Quebec, both by the proclamation of 1763 and the Quebec act of 1774, was the north side of the bay des Chaleurs and the line of the highlands, lying on the south side of the St. Lawrence, in which the rivers that empty themselves into the river St. Lawrence, on that side, take their rise. When, however, they came to inquire whereabouts was the line that separated Massachusetts from Nova Scotia, they were at a loss. Accordingly, both in the instructions drawn up and sanctioned in 1779, and in the report and doings of the Congress in August, 1782, it was proposed that the eastern boundary should be "a line to be settled and adjusted between that part of the State of Massachusetts Bay, formerly called the province of Maine, and the colony of Nova Scotia, according to their respective rights." The Committee of Congress, in their report of 16th August, 1782, after suggesting several vague and unsatisfactory reasons for considering the St. John as the true boundary, add: "We are obliged to urge probabilities;" "but we wish that the Northeastern boundary of Massachusetts may be left to future discussion, when other evidences may be obtained, which the war has removed from us." Mr. Adams, in his answer to an interrogatory propounded to him 15th August, 1797, says, speaking of the negotiations at Paris: "Documents from the public offices in England were brought over and laid before us." Again: "The ultimate agreement was to adhere to the charter of Massachusetts Bay, and St. Croix river mentioned in it, which was supposed to be delineated on Mitchell's map." The charter of Massachusetts Bay, here referred to, originally embraced Nova Scotia also; but Nova Scotia having been erected into a separate province, the limits and jurisdiction of Massachusetts were curtailed and restricted to the western boundary, and that bounday was the river St. Croix.

To remove all doubts in regard to the limit or boundary between Nova Scotia and Massachusetts Bay, the King of Great Britain, on the 21st day of November, 1763, established and defined it as follows, viz: "To the westward, although our said Province (Nova Scotia) hath anciently extended, and doth of right extend, as far as the river Pentagonet, or Penobscot, it shall be bounded by a line drawn from Cape Sable across the entrance of the bay of Fundy, to the mouth of the river St. Croix, by the said river to its source, and by a line drawn due north from thence to the southern boundary of our colony of Quebec;" that is to say, to the line of the highlands from whose northern declivity issue the streams that form the rivers which empty themselves into the river St. Lawrence on its south side. Instead, therefore, of leaving the eastern boundary of Massachusetts to future discussion, as proposed provisionally in the instructions of Congress of 1779, and by the committee in 1782, in order to get "other evidences," the commissioners at Paris, having the documents before them, and to prevent all disputes which might in future arise on the subject of boundaries, at once ingrafted into the treaty the boundary prescribed by the document of 21st November, 1763, already quoted, as the boundary between Nova Scotia and the United States. Hence, also, in connexion with the facts stated in our communication, in respect to the uncertainty that had existed in regard to the true position of the northwest angle of Nova Scotia, the peculiar care and abundant caution with which they specified and defined which of all of those places or positions where the northwest angle of Nova Scotia had been supposed to be situated, was the place or position of the northwest angle of Nova Scotia, intended by the framers of the treaty. We do not assume to say that any other and different view of these facts is most absurd; but we will venture to say, with the most entire respect for Lord Ashburton, that, in our opinion, an argument drawn from notorious and well-authenticated facts, such as these, whether it be an old or a new discovery, is deserving of more careful examination and more consideration than his Lordship seems to have bestowed upon it.

There is one other view, presented with much confidence in his Lordship's letter, which we cannot permit to pass unnoticed; we mean the expression of his belief that "to consider the Ristigouche as flowing into the Atlantic ocean would be more than hazardous—it would be most absurd."

The southern boundary of the colony of Quebec is declared by the proclamation of 1763 to be "a line which passes along the highlands which divide the rivers that empty themselves into the said river St. Lawrence from those which fall into the sea, and also along the north coast of the Bay des Chaleurs and the coast of the gulf of St. Lawrence," &c. The place of the mouth of the river St. Lawrence, in contradistinction to the gulf of St. Lawrence, is a point established beyond all dispute. It is at the west end of the island of Anticosti. The river Ristigouche, which empties itself through the Bay des Chaleurs into the gulf of St. Lawrence, is, by the proclamation, classed and considered as one of "the rivers which empty themselves into the sea," notwithstanding the bay des Chaleurs and the gulf of St. Lawrence are both named by their distinctive appellations in the same sentence. In another part of the same instrument, the governors are inhibited from passing any patents for any lands beyond the heads of any of "the rivers which fall into the Atlantic ocean from the west and northwest." And in another clause it is said: "Our will and pleasure, as aforesaid, [is,] to reserve all the lands and territories lying to the westward of the sources of the rivers which fall into the sea from the west and northwest as aforesaid." Here the words "sea" and "Atlantic ocean" are used indiscriminately; the one being substituted for the other, in reference to the rivers which flow from the west and northwest—the river Ristigouche being one of these rivers. This, also, is in accordance with the view entertained and expressed in his argument in 1797 by the British agent; who, in speaking of the province of Quebec, says that, by the proclamation of 7th October, 1763, it is "bounded on the south by the highlands which divide the rivers that empty themselves into the river St. Lawrence from those which fall into the sea, or Atlantic ocean." So, in the commission to Guy Carleton of 27th of December, 1774, the Ristigouche is again classed and considered as a river falling into the sea; and what is more striking, in the same sentence in which it speaks of the islands of Madelaine, in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, it speaks of "the river St. John, which discharges itself into the sea nearly opposite the west end of the island of Anticosti." After the passage of the Quebec act, and prior to the treaty of 1783, the southern boundary of the province of Quebec was described as being "a line from the bay of Chaleurs along the highlands which divide the rivers that empty themselves into the river St. Lawrence from those which fall into the sea, to a point in forty-five degrees of northern latitude on the eastern bank of the river Connecticut," &c.

Again: after the treaty of 1783, the southern boundary of the province of Quebec is described as "a line from the bay of Chaleurs along the highlands which divide the rivers that empty themselves into the river St. Lawrence from those which fall into the Atlantic ocean, to the northwesternmost head of Connecticut river," &c. But the point of beginning being the same, and the point at the Connecticut substantially the same, that point after the treaty being only placed further north, and the rivers taking their rise in the northern declivity being described in the same identical words, the inference appears irresistible that the highlands referred to are one and the same; and that the rivers taking their rise in the southern declivity, and described before the treaty as falling into the sea, and after the treaty as falling into the Atlantic ocean, are one and the same rivers; the words sea and Atlantic ocean being used indiscriminately, and the one substituted for the other, as had already been done before, in the proclamation of 1763. The only difference in the description of the boundary of the province of Quebec, and that of the treaty of 1783, is, that the boundary of the province of Quebec begins at the bay of Chaleurs, whereas that of the treaty begins at a point farther west. Hence it plainly appears that, under the classification of rivers with reference to these highlands, as made by the proclamation of 1763, and recognised in the treaty of 1783, the river Ristigouche was then classed and considered as a river which falls into the sea, or Atlantic ocean, in contradistinction to the rivers which empty themselves into the river St. Lawrence. We are, therefore, wholly unable to perceive wherein consists the great absurdity at the present day, in expounding the language of the treaty of 1783, of considering the river Ristigouche as a river which falls into the Atlantic ocean, unless it be that, by so doing, you interfere with the claims and pretensions of Great Britain.

There is one other portion of his Lordship's note, in which he attributes certain opinions to Mr. Sullivan, Mr. Madison, Mr. Jefferson, Mr. Gallatin, and others, which we would have wished to notice, in order to show how much his Lordship has been disposed to make out of a very little; but the further discussion of this subject we have considered as productive of little good, and hardly falling within our province. We have now only to repeat, what we as distinctly stated in our note of the 29th ult. that his Lordship's proposition, as now modified—namely, that Maine should yield to Great Britain all the territory north of the St. John—cannot be acceded to on our part.

With great respect and consideration, we have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servants.

WM. P. PREBLE,
EDWARD KAVANAGH,
EDWARD KENT,
JOHN OTIS.

Commissioners of Massachusetts to Mr. Webster.

WASHINGTON, July 20, 1842.

SIR: We have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your communication of the 15th of July, addressed to us as commissioners of Massachusetts, authorized to act in her behalf in the settlement of the controversy concerning the Northeastern boundary of the United States. The proposal therein presented for our assent, in behalf of the Government we represent, to the establishment of the conventional boundary indicated in your communication, and upon the terms and equivalents therein set forth, has received our careful consideration, and, without further delay, we submit the following reply:

After the many interviews which we have had the pleasure to hold with you, during the progress of the negotiation which is drawing to its close, it is unnecessary for us to express our full concurrence in the sentiment, that the line suggested, with its compensations and equivalents, is not all which might have been hoped for, in view of the strength of the American claim to the territory in dispute. But, inasmuch as in the progress of a negotiation, conducted with great deliberation, every proposition has been put forth, which any party, in whatever manner and to whatever extent it may be interested, has been disposed to submit for consideration and adoption, and the ultimate point has been reached, at which negotiation must result in a compact, or the interruption of further effort for its accomplishment, we proceed to discharge the remaining duty which is devolved upon us.

We are fully aware of the importance of the act that we are called upon to perform. It is not less than the relinquishment, by the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, of territory which she has always claimed to be a part of her possessions, and to which she believes she has a clear and indisputable title. So strong is the conviction of the right of Massachusetts and Maine to the undisturbed enjoyment of the land constituting what is called the disputed territory, by force of the treaty which terminated the war of the Revolution, that she would prefer an appeal to the same arbitrament by which the acknowledgment of her right was originally obtained, to a surrender, without just equivalents, of any portion of that territory. Still, she is aware that the Government and people of the United States desire to preserve peace and friendly relations with other nations, so long as they can be maintained with honor, by concessions which, not a just policy alone, but that which is liberal and magnanimous, may require. She partakes of the common spirit, and its influence pervades all her action, throughout this negotiation.

There are other considerations of weight in the decision of this question. Though the title of Massachusetts to the lands in dispute is believed to be perfect, it is not to be overlooked that they have been the subject of controversy through many years; that attempts, by negotiation, and through the intervention of an umpire, have been unsuccessfully made to extinguish a conflicting claim; and that the nations which are now seeking by renewed negotiation to put a period to the protracted strife, while desiring peace, have been brought to the verge of destructive war, through dissentions incident to a disputed boundary. Should this negotiation fail of a successful issue, the alternative offered is a renewed submission of our rights to the determination of others. Past experience enforces the belief that other years must elapse, and great inconvenience be felt, before a decision can be obtained; and the same monitor suggests the obvious truth, that however the title of Massachusetts and Maine, and of the United States, may be firmly established in justice, it is not equally certain that it would be confirmed by the tribunal, from whose decision, whatever it might be, no appeal could honorably be taken.

But the considerations which most powerfully impel the State of Massachusetts to acquiesce in the terms of a treaty, that your communication indicates, are, the known desire of the people of the United States for a speedy settlement of the vexed question of the boundary, and the request of the General Government, expressed through its constitutional organs, that Massachusetts would yield her consent to an arrangement which that Government deems to be reasonable. The State we have the honor to represent would be slow to disappoint the hopes of the nation, and reluctant to reject terms which the Government of the United States urges her to accept, as being compatible, in the estimation of that Government, with the interests of the State, and essential to the complete adjustment of the difficulties which the security of national peace demands.

Whether the national boundary suggested by you be suitable or unsuitable—whether the compensations that Great Britain offers to the United States, for the territory conceded to her, be adequate or inadequate—and whether the treaty which shall be effected shall be honorable to the country, or incompatible with its rights and dignity, are questions, not for Massachusetts, but for the General Government, upon its responsibility to the whole country, to decide. It is for the State to determine for what equivalents she will relinquish to the United States her interest in certain lands in the disputed territory, so that they may be made available to the Government of the United States in the establishment of the Northeastern boundary, and in a general settlement of all matters in controversy between Great Britain and the United States. In this view of the subject, and with the understanding that by the words "the nearest point of the highlands," in your description of the proposed line of boundary, is meant the nearest point of the crest of the highlands; that the right to the free navigation of the river St. John shall include the right to the free transportation thereupon of all products of the soil, as well as of the forest; and that the pecuniary compensation to be paid by the Federal Government to the State of Massachusetts shall be increased to the sum of one hundred and fifty thousand dollars—the State of Massachusetts, through her commissioners, hereby relinquishes to the United States her interest in the lands which will be excluded from the dominion of the United States by the establishment of the boundary aforesaid.

We have the honor to be, with great respect, your obedient servants,

ABBOTT LAWRENCE,
JOHN MILLS,
CHARLES ALLEN.

Hon. DANIEL WEBSTER,
Secretary of State.

The Maine Commissioners to Mr. Webster.

WASHINGTON, July 22, 1842.

SIR: The undersigned, commissioners of the State of Maine on the subject of the Northeastern boundary, have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your note addressed to them, under date of the 15th inst., with enclosures therein referred to. The proposition first submitted by the special minister of Great Britain, on the subject of the boundary, having been disagreed to; and the proposition made on the part of the United States, with the assent of the commissioners of Maine and Massachusetts, having been rejected as inadmissible, coupled with an expression of surprise that it should have been made; and Lord Ashburton, in the same communication, having intimated a preference for conference, rather than correspondence, and having omitted in his note to make any new proposition, except a qualified withdrawal of a part of his former one; we learn from your note that you "have had full and frequent conferences with him respecting the Northeastern boundary," and that you "believe you understand what is practicable to be done on that subject, so far as he (Lord Ashburton) is concerned." We also learn that "in these conferences he has made no positive or binding proposition; thinking, perhaps, it would be more desirable under present circumstances, that such a proposition should proceed from the side of the United States;" but that you have reason to believe that he would agree to a line of boundary such as is described in the paper accompanying your note, (marked B;) and, also, that you entertain the conviction "that no more advantageous arrangement can be made;" and, with this conviction, you refer the subject to the grave deliberation of the commissioners.

Regarding this as substantially a proposition on the part of the United States, with the knowledge and assent of Great Britain, and as the one most favorable to us which, under any circumstances, the latter Government would either offer or accept, the undersigned have not failed to bestow upon it the grave deliberation and consideration which its nature and importance, and their own responsible position, demand. If the result of that deliberation should not fully justify the expressed hopes, or meet the expectations and views of the Government of the United States, we beg you to be assured that such failure will be the result of their firm convictions of duty to the State they represent, and will not arise from any want of an anxious desire on their part to bring the controversy to an amicable, just, and honorable termination. In coming to this consideration, they have not been unmindful that the State of Maine, with the firmest conviction of her absolute right to the whole territory drawn into controversy, and sustained, as she has been, by the unanimous concurrence of her sister States, and of the Government of the Union, repeatedly expressed and cordially given; and without a wavering doubt as to the perfect practicability of marking the treaty line upon the face of the earth, according to her claim, has yet, at all times, manifested a spirit of forbearance and patience under what she could not but deem unfounded pretensions, and unwarrantable delays, and irritating encroachments. In the midst of all the provocations to resistance, and to the assertion and maintenance of her extreme rights, she has never forgotten that she is a member of the Union; and she has endeavored to deserve the respect, sympathy, and co-operation of her sister States, by pursuing a course equally removed from pusillanimity and rashness, and by maintaining her difficult position in a spirit that would forbear much for peace, but would yield nothing through fear. At all times, and under all circumstances, she has been ready and anxious to bring the controversy to a close, upon terms honorable and equitable, and to unite in any proper scheme to effect that object. In this spirit, and with these convictions, Maine instantly and cheerfully acceded to the proposal of the General Government, made through you, to appoint commissioners.

That no obstacle might be interposed to the successful issue of this negotiation, her Legislature gave to her commissioners ample and unlimited powers, which, but for the presumed necessity of the case, her people would be slow to yield to any functionaries. Her commissioners, thus appointed and thus empowered, assumed the duties imposed upon them in the spirit and with the views of the Government and people of Maine. They came to the negotiation with a firm conviction of her rights, but with a disposition and determination to meet a conciliatory proposition for a conventional line in a similar spirit, and to yield, for any reasonable equivalent, all that they presumed would be asked or desired by the other party. They, with the other citizens of Maine, were not unapprized of the fact, so often alluded to in our former communications, that England had long been anxious to obtain the undisputed possession of that portion of the territory which would enable her to maintain a direct and uninterrupted communication between her provinces. So far as they could learn from any source, this was the only professed object she had in view, and the only one which had been regarded as in contemplation.

With this understanding, the undersigned at once decided to yield, upon the most liberal terms, this long-sought convenience; and they indulged the confident expectation that such a concession would at once meet all the wants and wishes of the English Government, and bring the mission to a speedy and satisfactory close. When, therefore, we were met at the outset by a proposition which required the cession, on our part, of all the territory north of the St. John river, and enough of the territory on the south to include the Madawaska settlement, extending at least fifty miles up that river, with no other equivalents to us than the limited right to float timber down that river, and to the United States the small tracts adjacent to the forty-fifth parallel of latitude in other States, we could not but express our regret to be thus, as it were, repelled. But, regarding this rather as the extreme limit of a claim, subject, notwithstanding the strong language of Lord Ashburton, to be restrained and limited, we deemed it proper, in our communication of the 16th instant, after declining to accede to the proposition, in conjunction with the commissioners of Massachusetts, to point out and offer a conventional line of boundary as therein specified. In fixing on this line, we were mainly anxious to select such a one as should at once and pre-eminently give to Great Britain all that was necessary for her understood object, and to preserve to Maine the remainder of her territory. To accomplish this object, we departed from the river, to secure the unobstructed use of the accustomed way from Quebec to Halifax. We are not aware that any objection has been made, from any quarter, to this line, as not giving up to Great Britain all that she needed, or could reasonably ask, for the above purpose. And although Lord Ashburton did not deem it necessary to "examine the line (proposed) in its precise details," or to look at a map on which it could most readily be traced; and although he has seen fit to say that he was "quite at a loss to account for such a proposal," yet he has not intimated that the line suggested fails, in any respect, to meet the object we had in view, and which we frankly and readily avowed. It is well known to you, sir, that we had determined upon no such inflexible adherence to that exact demarcation as would have prevented us from changing it, upon any reasonable evidence that it did not, in every respect, meet the requirements of the above-stated proposition, in relation to a perfect line of communication. But believing then, as we do now, that it did thus meet all these requirements; and although it was, as we feel bound to say, the general and confident expectation of the people of Maine that any relinquishment, on our part, of jurisdiction and territory, would be, in part at least, compensated from that strip of contiguous territory on the west bank of the St. John; yet, when we were solemnly assured that no such cession could be made under his Lordship's instructions, we forebore to press for this reasonable and just exchange, and contented ourselves with accepting the limited right of navigation of the river, as the only equivalent from Great Britain for the territory and jurisdiction we offered to surrender. And, as you will remark, we offered not merely a right of way on land for a similar easement on the water, but the entire and absolute title to the land and jurisdiction of the large tract north and east of the line specified. It cannot be denied that it preserves to us a frontier in a forest almost impenetrable on the north, which would defend itself by its own natural character; and that, if anything should be deducted from the agricultural value of that portion beyond the Madawaska settlements, on account of its ruggedness and its want of attraction to settlers, much may justly be added to its value as a boundary between the two nations.

The value of this tract to Great Britain, both in a civil and military point of view, cannot be overlooked. It gives her the much coveted route for the movement of troops in war, and her mails and passengers in peace, and is most particularly important in case of renewed outbreaks in her North American colonies. The assumption of jurisdiction in the Madawaska settlement, and the pertinacity with which it has been maintained, are practical evidence of the value attached to the tract by the Government of her Britannic Majesty.

We have alluded to these views of the value and importance of this territory, not with any design of expressing our regret that we thus offered it, but to show that we are fully aware of all these views and circumstances affecting the question, and that we duly appreciate the far-seeing sagacity and prudence of those British statesmen who so early attempted to secure it as a cession, by negotiation, and the suggestion of equivalents.

The answer of Lord Ashburton to your note of the 8th instant, contained a distinct rejection of our offer, with a substantial withdrawal of his claim to any territory south of the river St. John, but not modifying the claim for the relinquishment, on the part of Maine and the United States, of all north of that river. Our views in reference to many of the topics in his Lordship's reply we have had the honor heretofore to communicate to you, in our note of the 16th instant; and to that answer we would now refer, as forming an important part of this negotiation, and as containing our refusal of the line indicated. We are now called upon to consider the final proposition made by or through the Government of the United States, for our consideration and acceptance. The line indicated may be shortly defined as the line recommended by the King of the Netherlands, and an addition thereto of a strip of land, at the base of the highlands, running to the source of the southwest branch of the St. John. The examination and consideration of all other lines, which might better meet our views and objects, have been precluded by the declaration, and other plenary evidence we have, that the line specified in your communication is the most advantageous that can be offered to us; and that no one of less extent, or yielding in fact less to the other party, can be deemed admissible. We are, therefore, brought to the single and simple consideration of the question--whether we can, consistently with our views of our duty to the State we represent, accept the proposition submitted by you.

So far as any claim is interposed, based upon a supposed equity arising from the recommendation of the King of the Netherlands, we have only to refer to our former note for our views on that topic. We have now only to add, that we came to this conference untrammelled and free, to see if, in a spirit of amity and equity, we could not find and agree upon some new line, which, whilst it yielded all that was needed by one party, might fairly be the motive and groundwork for equivalent territory or rights granted to the other; and that we cannot make any admission, or consent to any proposition, which would not revive, but put vitality and power into that which, up to this time, has never possessed either. We base our whole action on grounds entirely independent of that advice of the arbiter.

It may possibly be intimated in this connexion, as it has more than once been heretofore, that the commissioners of Maine, and the people of that State, are disposed to regard the whole territory as clearly falling within their rightful limits, and are not willing to consider the question as one in doubt and dispute, and, therefore, one to be settled as if each party had nearly or quite equal claims. Certainly, sir, the people and the Government of Maine do not deny that the question has been drawn into dispute. They have had too many and too recent painful evidences of that fact, to allow such a doubt, however much at a loss they may be to perceive any just or tenable grounds on which the adversary claim is based. For years they have borne and forborne, and struggled to maintain their rights, in a peaceable and yet unflinching spirit, against what appeared to them injustice from abroad and neglect at home. But they have yet to learn that the mere fact that an adverse claim is made and persisted in, and maintained by ingenuity and ability for a series of years, increasing in extent and varying its grounds as years roll on, is to be regarded as a reason why courtesy should require, in opposition to the fact, a relinquishment of the plain, explicit, and sincere language of perfect conviction and unwavering confidence; or that a continued, adverse, and resisted claim, may yet, by mere lapse of time and reiteration, ripen into a right. But we desire it to be distinctly remembered that, in this attempt to negotiate for a conventional line, Maine has not insisted, or even requested, that any formal or virtual admission of her title to the whole territory should be a condition preliminary to a settlement. We hold, and we claim, the right to express, at all times, and in all suitable places, our opinion of the perfect right of Maine to the whole territory; but we have never assumed it as a point of honor that our adversary should acknowledge it. Indeed, we have endeavored to view the subject rather in reference to a settlement on very hard terms for us, than to dwell on the strong aspect of the case, when we look at the naked question of our right and title under the treaty. It could hardly be expected, however, that we should silently, and thus virtually, acquiesce in any assumption that our claim was unsustained, and that "the treaty line was not executable." On this point we expressed ourselves fully in a former note.

In returning to the direct consideration of the last proposition, and the terms and conditions attending it, in justice to ourselves and our State, we feel bound to declare, and we confidently appeal to you, sir, in confirmation of the declaration, that this negotiation has been conducted, on our part, with no mercenary views, and with no design to extort unreasonable equivalents or extravagant compensation. The State of Maine has always felt an insuperable repugnance to parting with any portion even of her disputed territory, for mere pecuniary recompense, from adverse claimants. She comes here for no mere bargain for the sale of acres, in the spirit or with the arts of traffic. Her commissioners have been much less anxious to secure benefit and recompense, than to preserve the State from unnecessary curtailment and dismemberment. The proposition we made is evidence of the fact. We have heretofore expressed some opinions of the mutual character of the benefits to each party from the free navigation of the St. John. Without entering, however, upon the particular consideration of the terms and conditions, which we have not thought it necessary to do, we distinctly state that our repugnance to the line is based upon the extent of territory required to be yielded. We may, however, in passing, remark, that all the pecuniary offers contained in your note, most liberally construed, would scarcely recompense and repay to Maine the amount of money and interest which she has actually expended in defending and protecting the territory from wrongs arising and threatened by reason of its condition as disputed ground.

Considering, then, this proposition as involving the surrender of more territory than the avowed objects of England require, as removing our landmarks from the well-known and well-defined boundary of the treaty of 1783—the crest of the highlands—besides insisting upon the line of the arbiter in its full extent, we feel bound to say, after the most careful and anxious consideration, that we cannot bring our minds to the conviction that the proposal is such as Maine had a right to expect.

But we are not unaware of the expectations which have been, and still are, entertained of a favorable issue to this negotiation by the Government and people of this country, and the great disappointment which would be felt and expressed at its failure. Nor are we unmindful of the future, warned, as we have been, by the past, that any attempts to determine the line by arbitration may be either fruitless, or with a result more to be deplored.

We are now given to understand that the Executive of the United States, representing the sovereignty of the Union, assents to the proposal; and that this department of the Government at least is anxious for its acceptance, as, in its view, most expedient for the general good.

The commissioners of Massachusetts have already given their assent, on behalf of that Commonwealth. Thus situated, the commissioners of Maine, invoking the spirit of attachment and patriotic devotion of their State to the Union, and being willing to yield to the deliberate convictions of her sister States as to the path of duty, and to interpose no obstacles to an adjustment which the general judgment of the nation shall pronounce as honorable and expedient, even if that judgment shall lead to a surrender of a portion of the birthright of the people of their State, and prized by them because it is their birthright, have determined to overcome their objections to the proposal, so far as to say, that if, upon mature consideration, the Senate of the United States shall advise and consent to the ratification of a treaty, corresponding in its terms with your proposal, and with the conditions in our memorandum accompanying this note, (marked A,) and identified by our signatures, they, by virtue of the power vested in them by the resolves of the Legislature of Maine, give the assent of that State to such conventional line, with the terms, conditions, and equivalents, herein mentioned.

We have the honor to be, sir, with high respect, your obedient servants,

EDWARD KAVANAGH,
EDWARD KENT,
JOHN OTIS,
WILLIAM P. PREBLE.

The commissioners of Maine request that the following provisions, or the substance thereof, shall be incorporated into the proposed treaty, should one be agreed on:

1st. That the amount of "the disputed territory fund" (so called) received by the authorities of New Brunswick, for timber cut on the disputed territory, shall be paid over to the United States, for the use of Maine and Massachusetts, in full, and a particular account rendered, or a gross sum, to be agreed upon by the commissioners of Maine and Massachusetts, shall be paid by Great Britain, as a settlement of that fund; and that all claims, bonds, and securities, taken for timber cut upon the territory, be transferred to the authorities of Maine and Massachusetts.

2d. That all grants of land within that portion of the disputed territory conceded to Great Britain, made by Maine and Massachusetts, or either of them, shall be confirmed, and all equitable possessory titles shall be quieted, to those who possess the claims; and we assent to a reciprocal provision for the benefit of settlers falling within the limits of Maine. And we trust that the voluntary suggestion of the British minister, in regard to John Baker, and any others, if there be any, similarly situated, will be carried into effect, so as to secure their rights.

3d. That the right of free navigation of the St. John, as set forth in the proposition of Mr. Webster, on the part of the United States, shall extend to and include the products of the soil, in the same manner as the products of the forest; and that no toll, tax, or duty be levied upon timber coming from the territory of Maine.

WASHINGTON, July 15, 1842.

SIR: The undersigned, composing the delegation of the State of New Hampshire in both Houses of Congress, have received a copy of a resolution passed by the Legislature of New Hampshire, in respect to a portion of the territory of the State which is claimed by Great Britain.

The resolution is as follows:

"STATE OF NEW HAMPSHIRE.

"IN THE YEAR OF OUR LORD ONE THOUSAND EIGHT HUNDRED AND FORTY-TWO.

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives in General Court convened, That his excellency the Governor request our Senators and Representatives in Congress to take such measures as may be necessary, during the pending negotiations at Washington, relative to the Northern and Northeastern boundary of the United States, to best sustain the rights of this State to the territory over which we have always heretofore claimed and exercised jurisdiction; and that such papers, documents, and information, be transmitted to them by his excellency as may aid in carrying into effect the object of this resolution."

The undersigned beg leave to represent, that the right of the State to the territory in controversy is, as they believe, incontrovertible; and, before any arrangement shall be made which looks to any relinquishment of that right, in any degree, it is their wish, on behalf of the State, to present such documents and facts as tend to show the impropriety of such a course.

With great respect,

LEVI WOODBURY,
LEONARD WILCOX,
Senators.
CHAS. G. ATHERTON,
EDMUND BURKE,
TRISTRAM SHAW,
IRA A. EASTMAN,
JOHN R. REDING,
Members of the House of Representatives.

To the PRESIDENT of the United States.

Mr. Webster to the New Hampshire delegation in Congress.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, July 18, 1842.

GENTLEMEN: The President of the United States has transmitted to this department a letter, dated the 15th instant, from the delegation of the State of New Hampshire in both Houses in Congress, communicating a copy of a resolution, passed by the Legislature of that State, respecting a portion of her territory which is claimed by Great Britain, and intimating that, pending the present negotiations at Washington, relative to the Northern and Northeastern boundary of the United States, and before any arrangement shall be made for a relinquishment of the right of the State to the territory referred to, it is the wish of the delegation to present such documents and facts as tend to show the impropriety of such a course.

The Secretary of State would be very happy to receive from the delegation of New Hampshire a statement of what they consider the extent of territory to which the resolution of the State Legislature is supposed to refer; and, also, any such documents or proofs of any such facts as they may think it important to lay before the Government of the United States.

I have the honor, &c,
DANIEL WEBSTER.

The NEW HAMPSHIRE DELEGATION IN CONGRESS

The New Hampshire Delegation in Congress to Mr. Webster.

WASHINGTON, July 19, 1842.

The undersigned have received a letter from the Secretary of State, dated the 18th instant, in reply to a communication dated the 15th instant, which the undersigned had the honor to address to the President of the United States, communicating a resolution, passed by the Legislature of the State of New Hampshire, respecting a portion of the territory of that State claimed by Great Britain.

The Secretary of State having expressed a desire to receive from the delegation of the State of New Hampshire "a statement of what they consider the extent of territory, to which the resolution of the State Legislature is supposed to refer; and also any such documents or proofs of any such facts as they may think it important to lay before the Government of the United States;" the undersigned beg leave to refer to the following documents and papers, among others, as furnishing a full statement of the claims and rights of the State of New Hampshire to the territory in dispute, and as also defining it boundaries.

1. The argument of the Honorable William C. Bradley, furnished the commissioners under the 5th article of the treaty of Ghent.

2. The statement of the Honorable Albert Gallatin, prepared for the King of the Netherlands.

3. An historical sketch of the Northern boundary of New Hampshire, published in the 2d volume of the Collections of the Historical Society of New Hampshire, page 267.

4. A report of commissioners of the State of New Hampshire, dated November 23, 1836, which is to be found accompanying the report of the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives, 25th Congress, 3d session, Report No. 176—No 6 of the accompanying documents.

The undersigned are expecting to receive further documents upon the subject, from his excellency the Governor of New Hampshire, which, when received, they will transmit to the Secretary of State.

We have the honor to be your obedient servants,

LEVI WOODBURY,
L. WILCOX,
Senators of New Hampshire.
IRA A. EASTMAN,
EDMUND BURKE,
JOHN R. REDING,
TRISTRAM SHAW,
Representatives of the State of New Hampshire.

Honorable DANIEL WEBSTER.

P. S. We transmit, herewith, the report of commissioners above alluded to, and also the 2d volume of Historical Collections. You will oblige us by returning the latter when you may have no further use for it.

The other documents are on file in the State Department.

Mr. Stuart to Mr. Webster.

WASHINGTON, July 7th, 1842.

SIR: In answer to the inquiries which you were pleased to make of me yesterday, I would remark, that Sugar Island, situate in the river Ste. Marie, a short distance below Fort Brady, is, as to soil, very excellent; and it abounds in the finest (sugar) maple trees to be found anywhere; the inhabitants of our side of the Sault Ste. Marie derive a handsome revenue from the sugar and sirup which they annually make on this island. It would be a great disappointment to the people of that region to lose it. Besides, is the faith of the nation not pledged for its preservation, by the treaty held with the Chippewas in 1826, which provided for half-breed reservations on this island?

It is, in my opinion, of very great importance, that the right of passage be secured for American vessels, between the island of Bois Blanc, in the river Detroit, (opposite Fort Malden,) and the British shore; the channel is only 200 to 300 yards wide, and is entirely commanded both by the island and Fort Malden. At present, there is no other passage for our larger class of vessels, steamboats, &c.; and it will require much time and expense to render the old passage south of Gros Isle available. In short, the right of using the British channel is, in my opinion, absolutely necessary.

I am, respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,
ROBERT STUART.

Hon. DANIEL WEBSTER,
Secretary of State.

Mr. Delafield to Mr. Fraser.

NEW YORK, July 20, 1842.

DEAR SIR: I have looked over the letter of Mr. F. Webster to you, as you desired, and perceive that it is some "particular topographical information," more especially, that the Secretary desires concerning the country between Lake Superior and the Lake of the Woods. That district was thoroughly explored by Messrs. Ferguson and Whistler, the surveyors of our party, and by myself, as the United States agent.

We all proceeded inland, by the Grand Portage route, to the Lake of the Woods. I had previously obtained much information to prove that there was a more northern route by a well-known Long Lake, and the only lake known by that name, some distance north of the Grand Portage route; and as it became my duty to claim that as the true route, (having discovered, too, that the British commissioners intended to claim by the Fond du Lac route,) I returned by that northern route to Lake Superior, accompanied by Mr. Whistler; we consequently saw more of the country than any others of the party.

As you are aware, my claim to the northern route was sustained by the American commissioners, and became a subject of final disagreement.

The only other difference was in relation to the claim I made to the St. George island, in the river St. Mary, which was also sanctioned by General Porter, the American commissioner; and is a good claim, I think, by all the evidence in the case.

As to topographical information, some can be had by reference to the maps and discussions which were deposited by me in the State Department, July 24, 1824. Besides the journal of the commissioners, I also deposited the journal of the agent, more in detail, containing all the claims and discussions, &c., at length.

The face of the country is mountainous, rocky, and barren, for nearly the whole distance in question. Throughout my journeys, I may say, I saw but little except rock and water. My route was necessarily confined to the watercourses; but, whenever I ascended a height, it was the same dreary prospect in all directions, every valley between such heights being a little lake, or the discharge of a watercourse.

As an agricultural district, it has no value or interest, even prospectively, in my opinion. If the climate were suitable, (which it is not,) I can only say that I never saw, in my explorations there, tillable land enough to sustain any permanent population sufficiently numerous to justify other settlements than those of the fur-traders, and, I might add, fishermen. The fur-traders there occupied nearly all those places; and the opinion now expressed is the only one I ever heard entertained by those most experienced in these Northwestern regions.

There is, nevertheless, much interest felt by the fur-traders on this subject of boundary. To them it is of much importance, as they conceive; and it is, in fact, of national importance. Had the British commissioner consented to proceed by the Pigeon river, which is the Long Lake of Mitchell's map, it is probable there would have been an agreement. There were several reasons for his pertinacity, and for this disagreement; which belong, however, to the private history of the commission, and can be stated when required. The Pigeon river is a continuous watercourse. The St. George's island, in the St. Mary river, is a valuable island, and worth as much, perhaps, as most of the country between the Pigeon river and Dog river route, claimed for the United States, in an agricultural sense.

Mr. Ferguson is, I believe, in the neighborhood of Wilmington, Delaware. He can give the desired topographical information. I have a complete and daily journal, descriptive of the country passed over, but have no time to refer to it this evening; it would confirm my general remarks, however.

I am now on the eve of departure with my family for Suffolk county, Long Island. Be pleased to say to Mr. Webster that any and all the information or assistance I can give is at his command; but that, if possible, I hope it may be by correspondence rather than a personal visit, as my engagements here, just now, are such as to make a jaunt to Washington rather inconvenient. Should topographical information only be desired, and the present is not satisfactory, I would refer the Secretary to Mr. Ferguson, and would myself refer to my journal. I shall be absent from the city until the 4th of August. Until (say) August 1, my address will be at "Quoque, Suffolk county, Long Island." You are quite at liberty to show these hasty remarks to Mr. Webster. In short, it is better to do so than to repeat them; and I would prefer it.

Yours, truly,

JOS. DELAFIELD.

Major D. FRASER.

Mr. Webster to Mr. Ferguson.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, July 25, 1842.

SIR: Having been astronomer and surveyor to the commissioners under the 7th article of the treaty of Ghent, and having, as I understand, explored the country personally and thoroughly, from Lake Superior to the Lake of the Woods, I will be obliged to you to give me information in respect to two or three subjects of inquiry.

In the first place, be kind enough to describe the Pigeon river, its estuary or bay at its mouth, its size, and the nature of its channel and current in the last five or ten miles of its course. Be pleased to say whether the estuary of this river, and its position and bearing in relation to Ile Royale, may naturally lead to the conclusion that it is the Long Lake spoken of in the treaty of 1783.

What is the general nature of the country between the mouth of Pigeon river and the Rainy Lake? Of what formation is it, and how is its surface; and will any considerable part of its area be fit for cultivation? Are its waters active and running streams, as in other parts of the United States? Or are they dead lakes, swamps, and morasses? If the latter be their general character, at what point, as you proceed westward, do the waters receive a more decided character as running streams?

There are said to be two lines of communication, each partly by water and partly by portages, from the neighborhood of Pigeon river to the Rainy Lake; one by way of Fowl Lakes, the Saganaga Lake, and the Cypress Lake; the other by way of Arrow river and lake; then by way of Saganaga Lake, and through the river Maligne, meeting the other route at Lake La Croix, and through the river Namekan in the Rainy Lake. Do you know any reason for attaching great preference to either of these two lines? Or do you consider it of no importance, in any point of view, which may be agreed to? Please be full and particular on these several points.

Yours, respectfully,

DANIEL WEBSTER.

JAMES FERGUSON, Esq.,
Wilmington, Delaware.

Mr. Ferguson to Mr. Webster.

WASHINGTON, July 25, 1842.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your note of to-day, desiring to be informed of the character of the region northwestward of Lake Superior, which comprehends the several practised and customary routes between that lake and the Lake of the Woods.

In reply, I submit the following statement, which will give, as far as I am able, the desired information:

At the mouth of the Pigeon river, there is probably about three hundred yards in length of alluvial formation; but the river above that, as far as to near Fort Charlotte, runs between steep cut rocks of basaltic or primitive formation, and is a succession of falls and rapids for nearly its whole length—the last cataract, which is within about a mile of its mouth, being almost one hundred feet in height. You will, perhaps, understand the formation of the country better, when I mention that nearly the whole of the northern shore of Lake Superior consists of these sheer rocky escarpments, from six hundred to nine hundred feet high, and that the sources of most of the rivers which have cut their channels into the lake lie within thirty or forty miles of its verge.

There is, really, not much difference in elevation between South Fowl Lake and the lakes of the height of land. The character I have given of Pigeon river will serve also for the Arrow river, excepting that the latter has a reach of about two miles of still water.

I have no doubt that the bay of the Pigeon river is the Long Lake of the treaty of 1783. It is designated by that name on Mitchell's map, which, at that time, was the only map existing of these regions, and was proven, by the evidence of Mr. John Adams and Mr. John Jay, to have been the only geographical description before the negotiators of the first treaty. Though evidently defective and erroneous, it is but fair to take it as evidence of the intention. In addition to this evidence of the construction of the treaty of 1783, at the time it was concluded, we have this fact further: that, immediately after the peace, the traders of the Northwest Fur Company destroyed their forts and warehouses at the Grand Portage, and removed themselves to Fort William, ten leagues on the other side of the Pigeon river—a course which could only have been adopted for the reason that they supposed their previous location would now be on foreign territory. In addition, I have never heard this construction of the treaty of 1783 questioned by any of the partners of the British Fur Company whom I have met in that quarter.

To your query as to the character of the country between the mouth of the Pigeon river and the Rainy Lake, it is more difficult to give a distinct answer than to any of the others. The rivers here are all rapid; those running towards Lake Superior are of small size. The Pigeon river and Arrow river vary in width from 60 to 200 feet, and, as I have said previously, are almost a continued rapid.

But the rivers running northward—the outlet of Lake Saisaginegau, the river Maligne, the river Namecan, and the Rainy river—are all bold and strong rivers, and of much greater width and volume, carrying with them, through gentler slopes, the drainage of a more extended surface. On the plateau which makes the height of land, and which I would define as lying between the Fowl Lake and Lake Namecan, lie a group of lakes connecting nearly with each other, having their sorties sometimes toward the Arrow and Pigeon rivers, sometimes toward the St. Louis, sometimes toward the Kamanistiquia and the country of the Nipigon, and sometimes toward Hudson's Bay. In examining, therefore, the geography of this country, it is necessary to remember that the rivers and lakes indicated on the maps are only those at present explored, and that there exist other routes and other connexions, known only to the natives, and which the impracticable nature of the country has hitherto prevented from coming to the knowledge of the fur-traders, who are doubtless the persons most interested in the capabilities of the country.

As an agricultural district, this region will always be valueless. The pine timber is of high growth, equal for spars, perhaps, to the Norway pine, and may, perhaps, in time, find a market; but there are no alluvions, no arable lands, and the whole country may be described as one waste of rock and water.

From the outlet of the Rainy Lake, the country changes its appearance; the valleys of the rivers are wider, the timber of more varied and luxuriant growth, and the country capable of cultivation.

You have desired me also to express an opinion as to any preference which I may know to exist between the several lines claimed as boundaries through this country between the United States and Great Britain.

Considering that Great Britain abandons her claim by the Fond du Lac and the St. Louis river, cedes also Sugar island, (otherwise called St. George's island,) in the St. Marie river, and agrees, generally, to a boundary following the old commercial route, commencing at the Pigeon river, I do not think that any reasonable ground exists to [prevent] a final determination of this part of the boundary.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. FERGUSON.

Hon. DANIEL WEBSTER,
Secretary of State of the United States.

Captain Talcott to Mr. Webster.

WASHINGTON, July 25, 1842.

SIR: The extent of boundary line separating the United States, and territory belonging thereto, from the British possessions, and lying between the monument of the St. Croix and the Stony mountains, is estimated as follows for each adjacent State:

Maine (line as awarded by the King of Holland)	460	miles.
New Hampshire	40	"
Vermont	90	"
New York	420	"
Pennsylvania	30	"
Ohio	200	"
Michigan	740	"
Territory west of Lake Superior	1,150	"
Total length of boundary line	3,130	"

Respectfully submitted by your obedient servant,

A. TALCOTT.

Hon. SECRETARY OF STATE.

SUPPRESSION OF THE AFRICAN SLAVE-TRADE—EXTRADITION.

Lord Ashburton to Mr. Webster.

WASHINGTON, August 9, 1842.

SIR: By the 3d article of the convention which I have this day signed with you, there is an agreement for the reciprocal delivery, in certain cases, of criminals fugitive from justice; but it becomes necessary that I should apprize you that this article can have no legal effect within the dominions of Great Britain, until confirmed by act of Parliament. It is possible that Parliament may not be in session before the exchange of the ratifications of the convention; but its sanction shall be asked at the earliest possible period, and no doubt can be entertained that it will be given. In her Majesty's territories in Canada, where cases for acting under this convention are likely to be of more frequent occurrence, the Governor General has sufficient power, under authority of local legislation; and the convention will there be acted upon so soon as its ratification shall be known; but it becomes my duty to inform you of the short delay which may possibly intervene in giving full effect to it where the confirmation by Parliament becomes necessary for its execution.

I beg, sir, to renew to you the assurance of my high consideration.

ASHBURTON.

Hon. DANIEL WEBSTER, &c., &c., &c.

Mr. Paine to Mr. Webster.

WASHINGTON, May 2, 1842.

SIR: The agreement between Commander William Tucker, of the British navy, and myself, is so connected with numerous instructions respecting proceedings on the coast of Africa, that I should furnish a copy of all if the object were to justify myself; but as the wish of the State Department seems to be to ascertain the nature of the agreement itself, and the action of myself thereon, and as I wish to forward this view promptly, I shall restrict myself to these points commencing with the agreement, of which the following is a copy:

Commander William Tucker, of her Britannic Majesty's sloop Wolverine, and senior officer on the west coast of Africa, and Lieutenant John S. Paine, commanding the United States schooner Grampus, in order to carry into execution, as far as possible, the orders and views of their respective Governments respecting the suppression of the slave trade, hereby request each other and agree to detain all vessels under American colors found to be fully equipped for, and engaged in, the slave-trade; that, if proved to be American property, they shall be handed over to the United States schooner Grampus, or any other American cruiser; and that, if proved to be Spanish, Portuguese, Brazilian, or English property, to any of her Britannic Majesty's cruisers employed on the west coast of Africa for the suppression of the slave-trade, so far as their respective laws and treaties will permit.

Signed and exchanged at Sierra Leone, this 11th day of March, 1840.

JOHN S. PAINE,
Commanding the U. S. schooner Grampus.
WILLIAM TUCKER,
Commanding H. B. M sloop Wolverine, and senior officer of the west coast of Africa.

The objects of this agreement were, mainly—

1st. To meet the very common case with slavers—that of having on board two sets of papers.

2d. To let it be known that there subsisted between the British and American forces a good understanding, and a disposition to co-operate for the purpose indicated, as far as possible, without violating existing treaties.

A copy was forwarded by me to the Navy Department, to which I received the following reply:

"NAVY DEPARTMENT, June 4, 1840.

"SIR: Your letter of the 23d March last, with its enclosures, has been received.

"The instructions given you for your government, when you left the United States, while they indicated a friendly co operation with the commanders of the British cruisers, in the suppression of the slave-trade on the coast of Africa, as likely to aid in detecting the frauds resorted to by those engaged in it for the purpose of avoiding discovery and escaping punishment, were not intended to authorize any such arrangement as that which, it appears, you have made with the commander of her Britannic Majesty's sloop Wolverine, and by which you delegated to that officer to seize vessels under American colors, and, under certain circumstances, to detain them, with a view of turning them over to the Grampus, or other United States cruiser.

"Such a delegation of power is not only unauthorized by your instructions, but contrary to the established and well-known principles and policy of your government; and is, therefore, not sanctioned by the department.

"You will make known the views of the department on this subject to the commander of the Wolverine, and inform him that the arrangement made with him, having been disapproved by your Government, cannot, on your part, be complied with; the great object of the co-operation being to obviate the difficulties of capture, growing out of assuming Portuguese, English, Spanish, or Brazilian colors, when overhauled by an American, or American colors when overhauled by a British cruiser.

"For this purpose, you are authorized to cruise in company and in co-operation with any British vessel of war employed on the slave coast, in the pursuit of objects similar to your own.

"I am, respectfully, your obedient servant,

"J. K. PAULDING.

"Lieutenant JOHN S. PAINE,
Commanding United States schooner Grampus,
Sierra Leone, Coast of Africa."

In compliance with this, I addressed Captain Tucker as follows:

"UNITED STATES SCHOONER GRAMPUS,
"April 27, 1841.

"SIR: I am directed to make known to you the views of my Government respecting the agreement signed and exchanged with you on the 11th of March, 1840, at Sierra Leone.

"The Secretary of the Navy says: 'Inform him that the arrangement made with him, having been disapproved by your Government, cannot, on your part, be complied with; the great object of the co-operation being to obviate the difficulties of capture, growing out of the practice adopted by slavers, of assuming Portuguese, English, Spanish, or Brazilian colors, when overhauled by American, or American colors when overhauled by a British cruiser. For this purpose, you are authorized to cruise in company and in co-operation with any British vessel of war employed on the slave coast, in the pursuit of objects similar to your own.'

"From the above extract you will perceive that the Secretary of the Navy at Washington is careful to avoid giving countenance to the practice of detaining American vessels, even though they be slavers, unless by American vessels of war.

"The best, if not the only means of co-operation left, would seem to be, exchanging information, or cruising in company.

"If anything can be effected by this vessel within such limits, while on the coast, it will be gratifying to me to aid you, or any of her Majesty's officers, in forwarding so desirable an object.

"I am, with very high respect, sir, your obedient servant,

"JOHN S. PAINE,
"Lieut. Commanding.

"Capt. WILLIAM TUCKER,
Commanding H. B. M. sloop Wolverine, and senior officer of H. B. M. naval forces on the coast of Africa."

Hoping to meet Captain Tucker, I did not despatch the letter; but, finally, finding that his successor had arrived, I addressed to him the following:

[EXTRACT.]

"U. S. SCHOONER GRAMPUS,
Sierra Leone, June 17, 1841.

"While cruising here last year, I had made an arrangement with Commander Wm Tucker, of a similar character to that recommended; which, however, was not approved by the Secretary of the Navy; and, as I have not fallen in with Captain Tucker since the receipt of a communication from Washington on the subject, I have deemed it proper to enclose to you a letter to Captain Tucker, with a copy of the agreement referred to therein.

"In conclusion, I tender to you my sincere wishes for your success in the prosecution of duties so interesting to the cause of humanity.

"I am, with the highest respect, sir, your obedient servant.

"JOHN S. PAINE,
"Lieut. Commanding.

"Capt. ——— ———,
Commanding H. B. M. ship Isis, and senior officer on the western coast of Africa."

Any expression of my opinion of Mr. Paulding's letter to me would have been improper, and would still be indecorous. I shall be grateful to be informed if you think any explanation or defence necessary. I have never believed so.

I have the honor to be, with the highest respect, sir, your obedient servant,

JOHN S. PAINE,
Commander United States Navy.

Hon. DANIEL WEBSTER,
Secretary of State.

Mr. Webster to Captains Bell and Paine.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, April 30, 1842.

GENTLEMEN: Your experience in the service on the coast of Africa has probably enabled you to give information to the Government on some points connected with the slave-trade on that coast, in respect to which it is desirable that the most accurate knowledge attainable should be possessed. These particulars are:

1. The extent of the western coast of Africa, along which the slave-trade is supposed to be carried on; with the rivers, creeks, inlets, bays, harbors, or parts of the coast, to which it is understood slave ships most frequently resort.

2. The space or belt along the shore within which cruisers may be usefully employed for the purpose of detecting vessels engaged in the traffic.

3. The general course of proceeding of a slave ship, after leaving Brazil or the West Indies, on a voyage to the coast of Africa for slaves; including her manner of approach to the shore, her previous bargain or arrangement for the purchase of slaves; the time of her usual stay on or near the coast, and the means by which she has communication with persons on land.

4. The nature of the stations or barracoons in which slaves are collected on shore, to be sold to the traders; whether usually in rivers, creeks, or inlets, or on or near the open shore.

5. The usual articles of equipment and preparation, and the manner of fitting up, by which a vessel is known to be a slaver, though not caught with slaves on board.

6. The utility of employing vessels of different nations to cruise together, so that one or the other might have a right to visit and search every vessel which might be met with under suspicious circumstances, either as belonging to the country of the vessels visiting and searching, or to some other country which has, by treaty, conceded such right of visitation and search.

7. To what places slaves from slave ships could be most conveniently taken.

8. Finally, what number of vessels, and of what size and description, it would be necessary to employ on the western coast of Africa, in order to put an entire end to the traffic in slaves; and for what number of years it would probably be necessary to maintain such force, to accomplish that purpose?

You will please to add such observations as the state of your knowledge may allow, relative to the slave-trade on the eastern coast of Africa.

I have the honor to be, &c.,

DANIEL WEBSTER.

Captains BELL and PAINE,
United States Navy.

Commanders Bell and Paine to the Secretary of State.

WASHINGTON CITY, May 10, 1842

SIR: In accordance with the wishes expressed in your communication of the 30th ultimo, we have the honor to submit the following statement:

In reply to the first particular, viz: "The extent of the western coast of Africa, along which the slave-trade is supposed to be carried on, with the rivers, creeks, inlets, bays, harbors, or parts of the coast to which it is understood slave ships most frequently resort."

The slave-trade from Western Africa to America is carried on wholly between Senegal, latitude 16 deg north, longitude 16½ deg. west, and Cape Frio, in latitude 18 deg. south, longitude 12 deg. east, a space (following the windings of the coast at the distance of three or four miles) of more than 8,600 miles. There are scattered along the coast five English, four French, five American, six Portuguese, six or eight Dutch, and four or five Danish settlements, besides many which have been abandoned by their respective Governments.

These settlements are generally isolated; many of them only a fortress without any town; while a few are a cluster of villages and farms.

The British, French, and particularly the American settlements, exercise an important influence in suppressing the slave-trade.

The influence of the Danes and Dutch is not material.

The Portuguese influence is supposed to favor the continuance of the trade, except the counter-influence of the British, through treaty stipulations.

North of the Portuguese cluster of settlements, of which Bissao is the capital, and south of Benguela, (also Portuguese,) there is believed to be no probability of a revival of the slave-trade to any extent.

This leaves about 3,000 miles of coast to which the trade (principally with Cuba, Porto Rico, and Brazil) is limited.

There are hundreds of trading places on the coast, calling themselves "factories," and each claiming the protection of some civilized power. Some of these were the sites of abandoned colonies; others have been established by trading companies or individuals.

The actual jurisdiction of a tribe on the coast seldom exceeds ten miles, though these small tribes are sometimes more or less perfectly associated for a greater distance.

Of these factories and tribes, a few have never been directly engaged in the slave-trade, and are opposed to it; but the great preponderance is of the slave-trading interest.

To enumerate the rivers and inlets of this coast would not convey a just idea of the slave country or practices, as the embarcation often takes place from the beach, where there is no inlet; but we will state a few of the most noted.

Commencing at Cape Roxo, in latitude 12 deg. 30 min. north, and running down the coast as far as the river Mellacoree, in latitude 9 deg. north, the slave-trade is more or less carried on; but (in consequence of the vigilance of cruisers) not to the same extent it was a few years ago.

Another portion of the coast, from the limits of the Sierra Leone colony to Cape Mount, (a space including the mouths of six or more rivers,) the slave-trade is extensively prosecuted. Here commences the jurisdiction of the American Colonization Society, which extends to Grand Bassa. There are several slave stations between Grand Bassa and Cape Palmas. From thence eastwardly to Cape Coast castle, situated near the meridian of Greenwich, we believe there are no slave stations; but eastward of this, and in the bights of Benin and Biafra, along the whole coast, (which includes the mouths of the great rivers Benin, Formosa, Nun, old and new Calabar, Bonny, Camerons, Gaboon, and Congo,) with few exceptions, down to Benguela, in latitude 13 deg. south, the slave-trade is carried on to a very great extent.

2d. "The space or belt along the shore, within which cruisers may be usefully employed, for the purpose of detecting vessels engaged in the traffic."

Men of war should always cruise as near the shore as the safety of the vessel will admit, in order to take advantage of the land and sea breezes. Twenty or thirty miles from the coast there are continual calms, where vessels are subject to vexatious delays; besides which, ships engaged in the slave-trade keep close in with the land, in order to reach their places of destination.

3d. "The general course of proceeding of a slave ship, after leaving Brazil or the West Indies, on a voyage to the coast of Africa, for slaves, including her manner of approach to the shore, her previous bargain or arrangements for the purchase of slaves, the time of her usual stay on or near the coast, and the means by which she has communication with persons on land."

Vessels bound from the coast of Brazil, or the West Indies, to the coast of Africa, are obliged, in consequence of the trade winds to run north as far as the latitude of thirty or thirty five, to get into the variable winds; thence to the eastward, until they reach the longitude of Cape Verd Islands; then steer to the southward to their port of destination; and, if bound as far to the eastward as the Gulf of Guinea, usually make the land near Cape Mount or Cape Palmas. Vessels from Brazil bound to the southern part of the coast of Africa run south as far as the latitude of 35 deg. south, and make up their easting in the southern variables.

Slave vessels are generally owned or chartered by those persons who have an interest in the slave establishments on the coast of Africa, where the slaves are collected and confined in barracoons or slave prisons, ready for transhipment the moment the vessel arrives. They are therefore detained but a short time after arriving at their place of destination. Instances have come to our notice of vessels arriving at the slave station in the evening, landing their cargo, taking on board all their slaves, and sailing with the land breeze the following morning.

It is not unusual, however, for vessels, unconnected with any particular slave establishment, to make their purchases after arrival. If any delay is likely to occur, an agent is landed, and the vessel stands to sea, and remains absent for as long a time as may be thought necessary to complete their arrangements. The slavers communicate with the shore, either with their own boats, or boats and canoes belonging to the Kroomen in the employment of those on shore.

4th. "The nature of the stations or barracoons in which slaves are collected on shore to be sold to the traders, whether usually on rivers, creeks, or inlets, or on or near the open shore."

The slave stations are variously situated; some near the mouth, others a considerable distance up the rivers, and many directly on the seashore. The barracoons are thatched buildings, made sufficiently strong to secure the slaves, and enough of them to contain, in some instances, several thousands. The slaves are collected by the negro chiefs in the vicinity, and sold to the persons in charge of the stations, where they are kept confined until an opportunity offers to ship them off. Materials of all kinds necessary to convert a common trader into a slave ship are kept on hand, and the change can be completed in a few hours. A number of Kroomen are employed, and boats and canoes ready for immediate service.

The slave stations are generally fortified with cannon and muskets, not only to guard against a rising of the slaves, but to protect them from sudden attacks of the natives in the vicinity, and to command their respect.

5th. "The usual articles of equipment and preparation, and the manner of fitting up, by which a vessel is known to be a slaver, though not caught with slaves on board."

Vessels engaged in the slave-trade are either fitted up with a slave deck, or have the materials on board, prepared, to put one up in a few hours. Their hatches, instead of being close, as is usual in merchantmen, have gratings; they are supplied with boilers sufficiently large to cook rice or farinha for the number of slaves they expect to receive; an extra number of water-casks, many more than are sufficient for a common crew; also a number of shackles to secure their slaves. Most of these articles, however, are concealed, and every thing is done to disguise the vessel.

It is not unusual for them to have several sets of papers, two or more persons representing themselves as captains or masters of the vessel, and flags of all nations; every device is resorted to, to deceive, should they encounter a cruiser.

Some are armed with only a few muskets; others have a number of heavy guns, according to the size of the vessel; and they range from sixty to four hundred tons burden, with crews from ten to upwards of one hundred men.

6th. "The utility of employing vessels of different nations to cruise together, so that one or the other might have a right to visit and search every vessel which might be met with under suspicious circumstances, either as belonging to the country of the vessel visiting or searching, or to some other country which has, by treaty, conceded such right of visitation and search.

We are of opinion that a squadron should be kept on the coast of Africa, to co-operate with the British, or other nations interested in stopping the slave-trade; and that the most efficient mode would be for vessels to cruise in couples, one of each nation.

7th. "To what places slaves taken from slave ships on the coast could be most conveniently taken?"

If captured under the American flag, send them to Cape Mesurada, Liberia, or, if convenient, to such other of the American settlements as the agent of the United States there may wish.

8th. "Finally, what number of vessels, and of what size and description, it would be necessary to employ on the western coast of Africa, in order to put an entire end to the traffic in slaves; and for what number of years it would probably be necessary to maintain such force to accomplish that purpose;" adding "such observations as the state of your knowledge may allow, relative to the slave-trade on the eastern coast of Africa?"

As our personal knowledge of the coast extends to only that part of it comprised between Cape Verd and Cape Palmas, it is difficult to state the exact force required for this service; not less, however, than the following, we think necessary:

One first class sloop-of-war.

One steamer from 200 to 300 tons burden.

Two (eight or ten-gun) brigs or schooners.

Ten schooners of about one hundred tons, each with four guns.

One store-ship of from 250 to 300 tons.

All the vessels to have one-tenth less than their complements of men, to be filled up with Kroomen on their arrival on the coast.

A steamer (to be fitted up, if possible, to burn either wood or coal, as circumstances require) will be essentially necessary.

That part of the coast of Africa from which slaves are exported is subject to light winds and calms. A steamer propelled at the rate of six miles an hour could easily overtake the fastest sailing vessels, and would be a great auxiliary in ascending rivers and towing boats, in order to attack slave stations. Less duty is performed by sailing cruisers on this coast than on any other we are acquainted with, from the reasons just stated; and the importance of steam vessels is much increased by this difficulty.

We cannot state confidently how long such force would be necessary; but we are of opinion that in three years the trade would be so far destroyed as to enable the United States to withdraw a greater part, while a small force of observation would be necessary, until the natives had become accustomed to other occupations, and lost all hope of again engaging in the traffic.

In connexion with this subject, we beg leave to remark, that the American fair trader is sometimes obstructed in the most vexatious manner by armed British merchantmen, sustained by British cruisers. This arises from the practice which exists with the commanders of single cruisers, the agents of trading companies, the masters of merchantmen, and others, making agreements, treaties, or, as the expression there is, "books," securing to themselves the exclusive trade with the tribe or district. A late instance of this unreasonable, and probably unauthorized, spirit of monopoly, has come to our notice near Cape Mount, where the native chief was induced to believe that he could not make a treaty with the American colonists, because he had made one with the commander of a British cruiser.

The same commander, it is asserted, has also threatened the Governor of the colony at Monrovia that he will make reprisals on the commerce of the colony, for exercising the usual jurisdiction at Bassa Cove, only two or three miles from their town of Bassa and Edina.

Our knowledge of the commanders of British cruisers authorizes us to say that their conduct is not usually thus unfriendly; but many instances show the propriety of guarding the interests of the fair dealer, who is generally opposed to the slave-trade.

Respecting these treaties or agreements with the tribes, we think that only the commanders of squadrons or governors of colonies should be permitted to make them; and with those over whom their Government cannot reasonably claim jurisdiction, treaties should not be made to the exclusion of other mercantile powers trading on the coast, as has sometimes been done; and all treaties should contain a prohibition of the slave-trade. Commanders of squadrons and governors of colonies should be authorized and directed to seize every opportunity, and make use of all honorable means, of inducing the native tribes, and particularly the Emperor of Ashantee, the Empress or Potentate at Loango, and other powerful nations, to enter into agreements to put a stop, as far as their influence extends, to the traffic; to seize and send home for trial all foreigners found on the coast engaged in the slave-trade, whether belonging to vessels or residing on the coast, (for should these persons be permitted to remain, even after their slave stations are destroyed, they will erect others at points probably less assailable;) and should be enjoined to extend their protection to fair traders, though not of their own nation.

Commanders of squadrons and governors should be directed to destroy all slave factories within the reach of the force employed; and to proclaim to the tribes in the vicinity they must not be renewed, on pain of having their villages also destroyed.

We have little knowledge of the details respecting the slave-trade on the eastern coast of Africa. No instance has come to our knowledge of the use of the American flag there. From the best information we can obtain, it seems that a large trade is carried on by Portuguese colonies, the Arab chiefs, and negro tribes. Their greatest markets are the Mahometan countries bordering on the Red Sea and Persian Gulf, the Portuguese East India colonies, Bombay, and perhaps other British possessions in the East Indies. This part of the trade is probably in the hands of the Arabian vessels. Many are also shipped to Brazil, and some perhaps find their way to Cuba and Porto Rico.

In concluding this subject, we beg leave to remark, that the field of operations to carry on the slave-trade is so extensive, the profits so great, and the obstacles in the path so many, so various, so difficult, that every means should be used by civilized nations, and particularly by the United States and Great Britain, to effect the object; and we do not believe that any material good can result without an earnest and cordial co-operation.

We have the honor to be, with high respect, your obedient servants,

CHARLES H. BELL,
JOHN S. PAINE,
Commanders United States Navy.

Hon. DANIEL WEBSTER,
Secretary of State, Washington.

CASE OF THE "CREOLE."

Mr. Webster to Lord Ashburton.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, August 1, 1842.

MY LORD: The President has learned, with much regret, that you are not empowered by your Government to enter into a formal stipulation for the better security of vessels of the United States, when meeting with disasters in passing between the United States and the Bahama Islands, and driven, by such disasters, into British ports. This is a subject which is deemed to be of great importance; and which cannot, on the present occasion, be overlooked.

Your Lordship is aware that several cases have occurred within the last few years, which have caused much complaint. In some of these cases, compensation has been made by the English Government for the interference of the local authorities with American vessels having slaves on board, by which interference these slaves were set free. In other cases, such compensation has been refused. It appears to the President to be for the interest of both countries that the recurrence of similar cases in future should be prevented as far as possible.

Your Lordship has been made acquainted with the case of the "Creole," a vessel carried into the port of Nassau last winter by persons who had risen upon the lawful authority of the vessel, and, in the accomplishment of their purpose, had committed murder on a person on board.

The opinions which that occurrence gave occasion for this Government to express, in regard to the rights and duties of friendly and civilized maritime States, placed by Providence near to each other, were well considered, and are entertained with entire confidence. The facts in the particular case of the "Creole" are controverted; positive and officious interference by the colonial authorities to set the slaves free, being alleged on one side, and denied on the other.

It is not my present purpose to discuss this difference of opinion as to the evidence in the case as it at present exists; because, the rights of individuals having rendered necessary a more thorough and a judicial investigation of facts and circumstances attending the transaction, such investigation is understood to be now in progress, and its result, when known, will render me more able than at this moment to present to the British Government a full and accurate view of the whole case. But it is my purpose, and my duty, to invite your Lordship's attention to the general subject, and your serious consideration of some practical means of giving security to the coasting trade of the United States, against unlawful annoyance and interruption along this part of their shore. The Bahama islands approach the coast of Florida within a few leagues, and, with the coast, form a long and narrow channel, filled with innumerable small islands and banks of sand; and the navigation is difficult and dangerous, not only on these accounts, but from the violence of the winds and the variable nature of the currents. Accidents are of course frequent; and necessity often compels vessels of the United States, in attempting to double Cape Florida, to seek shelter in the ports of these islands. Along this passage, the Atlantic States hold intercourse with the States on the Gulf and the Mississippi; and through it the products of the valley of that river (a region of vast extent and boundless fertility) find a main outlet to the sea, in their destination to the markets of the world.

No particular ground of complaint exists as to the treatment which American vessels usually receive in these ports, unless they happen to have slaves on board; but, in cases of that kind, complaints have been made, as already stated, of officious interference of the colonial authorities with the vessel, for the purpose of changing the condition in which these persons are, by the laws of their own country, and of setting them free.

In the Southern States of this Union, slavery exists by the laws of the States, and under the guaranty of the Constitution of the United States; and it has existed in them from a period long antecedent to the time when they ceased to be British colonies. In this state of things, it will happen that slaves will be often on board coasting vessels, as hands, as servants attending the families of their owners, or for the purpose of being carried from port to port. For the security of the rights of their citizens, when vessels, having persons of this description on board, are driven by stress of weather, or carried by unlawful force into British ports, the United States propose the introduction of no new principle into the law of nations. They require only a faithful and exact observance of the injunctions of that code, as understood and practised in modern times.

Your Lordship observes that I have spoken only of American vessels driven into British ports by the disasters of the seas, or carried in by unlawful force. I confine my remarks to these cases, because they are the common cases, and because they are the cases which the law of nations most emphatically exempts from interference. The maritime law is full of instances of the application of that great and practical rule, which declares that that which is the clear result of necessity, ought to draw after it no penalty and no hazard. If a ship be driven, by stress of weather, into a prohibited port, or into an open port, with prohibited articles on board, in neither case is any forfeiture incurred. And (what may be considered a still stronger case) it has been decided by eminent English authority, and that decision has received general approbation, that if a vessel be driven, by necessity, into a port strictly blockaded, this necessity is good defence, and exempts her from penalty.

A vessel on the high seas, beyond the distance of a marine league from the shore, is regarded as part of the territory of the nation to which she belongs, and subjected exclusively to the jurisdiction of that nation. If, against the will of her master, or owner, she be driven or carried nearer to the land, or even into port, those who have, or ought to have, control over her, struggling all the while to keep her upon the high seas, and so within the exclusive jurisdiction of her own Government, what reason or justice is there in creating a distinction between her rights and immunities, in a position, thus the result of absolute necessity, and the same rights and immunities before superior power had forced her out of her voluntary course?

But, my Lord, the rule of law, and the comity and practice of nations, go much further than these cases of necessity, and allow even to a merchant vessel coming into any open port of another country voluntarily, for the purposes of lawful trade, to bring with her, and keep over her, to a very considerable extent, the jurisdiction and authority of the laws of her own country; excluding, to this extent, by consequence, the jurisdiction of the local law. A ship, say the publicists, though at anchor in a foreign harbor, preserves its jurisdiction and its laws. It is natural to consider the vessels of a nation as parts of its territory, though at sea, as the State retains its jurisdiction over them; and, according to the commonly received custom, this jurisdiction is preserved over the vessels, even in parts of the sea subject to a foreign dominion.

This is the doctrine of the law of nations, clearly laid down by writers of received authority, and entirely conformable, as it is supposed, with the practices of modern nations.

If a murder be committed on board of an American vessel, by one of the crew upon another, or upon a passenger, or by a passenger on one of the crew, or another passenger, while such vessel is lying in a port within the jurisdiction of a foreign state or sovereignty, the offence is cognizable and punishable by the proper court of the United States, in the same manner as if such offence had been committed on board the vessel on the high seas. The law of England is supposed to be the same.

It is true, that the jurisdiction of a nation over a vessel belonging to it, while lying in the port of another, is not necessarily wholly exclusive. We do not so consider or so assert it. For any unlawful act done by her while thus lying in port, and for all contracts entered into while there, by her master or owners, she and they must doubtless be answerable to the laws of the place. Nor, if her master or crew, while on board in such port, break the peace of the community by the commission of crimes, can exemption be claimed for them. But, nevertheless, the law of nations, as I have stated it, and the statutes of governments founded on that law, as I have referred to them, show that enlightened nations, in modern times, do clearly hold that the jurisdiction and laws of a nation accompany her ships not only over the high seas, but into ports and harbors, or whereso-ever else they may be water-borne, for the general purpose of governing and regulating the rights, duties, and obligations of those on board thereof; and that, to the extent of the exercise of this jurisdiction, they are considered as parts of the territory of the nation herself.

If a vessel be driven by weather into the ports of another nation, it would hardly be alleged by any one, that, by the mere force of such arrival within the waters of the State, the law of that State would so attach to the vessel as to affect existing rights of property between persons on board, whether arising from contract or otherwise. The local law would not operate to make the goods of one man to become the goods of another man. Nor ought it to affect their personal obligations, or existing relations between themselves; nor was it ever supposed to have such effect, until the delicate and exciting question which has caused these interferences in the British islands arose. The local law in these cases dissolves no obligations or relations lawfully entered into or lawfully existing, according to the laws of the ship's country. If it did, intercourse of civilized men between nation and nation must cease. Marriages are frequently celebrated in one country in a manner not lawful or valid in another; but did anybody ever doubt that marriages are valid all over the civilized world, if valid in the country in which they took place? Did any one ever imagine that local law acted upon such marriages to annihilate their obligation, if the parties should visit a country in which marriages must be celebrated in another form?

It may be said that, in such instances, personal relations are founded in contract, and therefore to be respected; but that the relation of master and slave is not founded in contract, and therefore is to be respected only by the law of the place which recognises it. Whoever so reasons, encounters the authority of the whole body of public law, from Grotius down; because there are numerous instances in which the law itself presumes or implies contracts; and prominent among these instances is the very relation which we are now considering, and which relation is holden by law to draw after it mutuality of obligation.

Is not the relation between a father and his minor children acknowledged, when they go abroad? And on what contract is this founded, but a contract raised by general principles of law, from the relation of the parties?

Your Lordship will please to bear in mind, that the proposition which I am endeavoring to support, is, that, by the comity of the law of nations, and the practice of modern times, merchant vessels, entering open ports of other nations, for the purpose of trade, are presumed to be allowed to bring with them, and to retain, for their protection and government, the jurisdiction and laws of their own country. All this, I repeat, is presumed to be allowed; because the ports are open, because trade is invited, and because, under these circumstances, such permission or allowance is according to general usage. It is not denied that all this may be refused; and this suggests a distinction, the disregard of which may perhaps account for most of the difficulties arising in cases of this sort; [that is to say, the distinction between what a State may do if it pleases, and what it is presumed to do, or not to do, in the absence of any positive declaration of its will. A State might declare that all foreign marriages should be regarded as null and void, within its territory; that a foreign father, arriving with an infant son, should no longer have authority or control over him; that, on the arrival of a foreign vessel in its ports, all shipping articles and all indentures of apprenticeship between her crew and her owners or masters, should cease to be binding. These, and many other things, equally irrational and absurd, a sovereign State has doubtless the power to do. But they are not to be presumed. It is not to be taken for granted, ab ante, that it is the will of the sovereign State thus to withdraw itself from the circle of civilized nations. It will be time enough to believe this to be its intention, when it formally announces that intention, by appropriate enactments, edicts, or other declarations. In regard to slavers within the British territories, there is a well-known and clear promulgation of the will of the sovereign authority; that is to say, there is a well known rule of her law. As to England herself, that law has long existed; and recent acts of Parliament establish the same law for the colonies. The usual mode of stating the rule of English law is, that no sooner does a slave reach the shore of England, than he is free. This is true; but it means no more than that, when a slave comes within the exclusive jurisdiction of England, he ceases to be a slave, because the law of England positively and notoriously prohibits and forbids the existence of such a relation between man and man. But it does not mean that English authorities, with this rule of English law in their hands, may enter where the jurisdiction of another nation is acknowledged to exist, and there destroy rights, obligations, and interests, lawfully existing under the authority of such other nation. No such construction, and no such effect, can be rightfully given to the British law. It is true, that it is competent to the British Parliament, by express statute provision, to declare that no foreign jurisdiction of any kind should exist in or over a vessel, after its arrival voluntarily her ports. And so she might close all her ports to the ships of all nations. A State may also declare, in the absence of treaty stipulations, that foreigners shall not sue in her courts, nor travel in her territories, nor carry away funds or goods received for debts. We need not inquire what would be the condition of a country that should establish such laws, nor in what relation they would leave her towards the States of the civilized world. Her power to make such laws is unquestionable; but, in the absence of direct and positive enactments to that effect, the presumption is that the opposites of these things exist. While her ports are open to foreign trade, it is to be presumed that she expects foreign ships to enter them, bringing with them the jurisdiction of their own Government, and the protection of its laws, to the same extent that her ships, and the ships of other commercial States, carry with them the jurisdiction of their respective Governments into the open ports of the world; just as it is presumed, while the contrary is not avowed, that strangers may travel in a civilized country, in a time of peace, sue in its courts, and bring away their property.

A merchant vessel enters the port of a friendly State, and enjoys while there the protection of her own laws, and is under the jurisdiction of her own Government—not in derogation of the sovereignty of the place, but by the presumed allowance or permission of that sovereignty. This permission or allowance is founded on the comity of nations, like the other cases which have been mentioned; and this comity is part (and a most important and valuable part) of the law of nations, to which all nations are presumed to assent until they make their dissent known. In the silence of any positive rule affirming or denying or restraining the operation of foreign laws, their tacit adoption is presumed, to the usual extent. It is upon this ground that courts of law expound contracts according to the law of the place in which they are made; and instances almost innumerable exist, in which, by the general practice of civilized countries, the laws of one will be recognised and often executed in another. This is the comity of nations; and it is upon this, as its solid basis, that the intercourse of civilized States is maintained.

But while that which has now been said is understood to be the voluntary and adopted law of nations, in cases of the voluntary entry of merchant vessels into the ports of other countries, it is nevertheless true, that vessels in such ports, only through an overruling necessity, may place their claim for exemption from interference on still higher principles; that is to say, principles held in more sacred regard by the comity, the courtesy, or indeed the common sense of justice of all civilized States.

Even in regard to cases of necessity, however, there are things of an unfriendly and offensive character, which yet it may not be easy to say that a nation might not do. For example: a nation might declare her will to be, and make it the law of her dominions, that foreign vessels, cast away on her shores, should be lost to their owners, and subject to the ancient law of wreck. Or a neutral State, while shutting her ports to the armed vessels of belligerents, as she has a right to do, might resolve on seizing and confiscating vessels of that description, which should be driven to take shelter in her harbors by the violence of the storms of the ocean. But laws of this character, however within the absolute competence of Governments, could only be passed, if passed at all, under willingness to meet the last responsibility to which nations are subjected.

The presumption is stronger, therefore, in regard to vessels driven into foreign ports by necessity, and seeking only temporary refuge, than in regard to those which enter them voluntarily, and for purposes of trade, that they will not be interfered with; and that, unless they commit, while in port, some act against the laws of the place, they will be permitted to receive supplies, to repair damages, and to depart unmolested.

If, therefore, vessels of the United States, pursuing lawful voyages from port to port, along their own shore, are driven by stress of weather, or carried by unlawful force, into English ports, the Government of the United States cannot consent that the local authorities in those ports shall take advantage of such misfortunes, and enter them, for the purpose of interfering with the condition of persons or things on board, as established by their own laws. If slaves, the property of citizens of the United States, escape into the British territories, it is not expected that they will be restored. In that case, the territorial jurisdiction of England will have become exclusive over them, and must decide their condition. But slaves on board of American vessels, lying in British waters, are not within the exclusive jurisdiction of England; or under the exclusive operation of English law; and this founds the broad distinction between the cases. If persons guilty of crimes in the United States, seek an asylum in the British dominions, they will not be demanded, until provision for such cases be made by treaty; because, the giving up of criminals fugitive from justice is agreed and understood to be a matter in which every nation regulates its conduct according to its own discretion. It is no breach of comity to refuse such surrender.

On the other hand, vessels of the United States, driven by necessity into British ports, and staying there no longer than such necessity exists, violating no law, nor having intent to violate any law, will claim, and there will be claimed for them, protection and security, freedom from molestation, and from all interference with the character or condition of persons or things on board. In the opinion of the Government of the United States, such vessels, so driven and so detained by necessity in a friendly port, ought to be regarded as still pursuing their original voyage, and turned out of their direct course only by disaster, or by wrongful violence; that they ought to receive all assistance necessary to enable them to resume that direct course; and that interference or molestation by the local authorities, where the whole voyage is lawful, both in act and intent, is ground for just and grave complaint.

Your Lordship's discernment and large experience in affairs cannot fail to suggest to you how important it is to merchants and navigators, engaged in the coasting trade of a country so large in extent as the United States, that they should feel secure against all but the ordinary causes of maritime loss. The possessions of the two Governments closely approach each other. This proximity, which ought to make us friends and good neighbors, may, without proper care and regulation, itself prove a ceaseless cause of vexation, irritation, and disquiet.

If your Lordship has no authority to enter into a stipulation by treaty for the prevention of such occurrences hereafter as have already happened—occurrences so likely to disturb that peace between the two countries which it is the object of your Lordship's mission to establish and confirm—you may still be so far acquainted with the sentiments of your Government as to be able to engage that instructions shall be given to the local authorities in the islands, which shall lead them to regulate their conduct in conformity with the rights of citizens of the United States, and the just expectations of their Government, and in such manner as shall, in future, take away all reasonable ground of complaint. It would be with the most profound regret that the President should see that, while it is now hoped so many other subjects of difference may be harmoniously adjusted, nothing should be done in regard to this dangerous source of future collisions.

I avail myself of this occasion to renew to your Lordship the assurances of my distinguished consideration.

DANIEL WEBSTER.

Lord ASHBURTON, &c., &c., &c.

Lord Ashburton to Mr. Webster.

WASHINGTON, August 6, 1842.

SIR: You may be well assured that I am duly sensible of the great importance of the subject to which you call my attention in the note which you did me the honor of addressing me the 1st instant, in which you informed me that the President had been pleased to express his regret that I was not empowered by my Government to enter into a formal stipulation for the better security of vessels of the United States, when meeting with disasters in passing between the United States and the Bahama islands, and driven, by such disasters, into British ports.

It is, I believe, unnecessary that I should tell you that the case of the Creole was known in London a few days only before my departure. No complaint had at that time been made by Mr. Everett. The subject was not, therefore, among those which it was the immediate object of my mission to discuss. But at the same time I must admit that, from the moment I was acquainted with the facts of this case, I was sensible of all its importance; and I should not think myself without power to consider of some adjustment of, and remedy for, a great acknowledged difficulty, if I could see my way clearly to any satisfactory course, and if I had not arrived at the conclusion, after very anxious consideration, that, for the reasons which I will state, this question had better be treated in London, where it will have a much increased chance of settlement, on terms likely to satisfy the interests of the United States.

The immediate case of the Creole would be easily disposed of; but it involves a class and description of cases which, for the purpose of affording that security you seek for the trade of America through the Bahama channel, brings into consideration questions of law, both national and international, of the highest importance; and to increase the delicacy and difficulty of the subject, public feeling is sensitively alive to every thing connected with it. These circumstances bring me to the conviction that, although I really believe that much may be done to meet the wishes of your Government, the means of doing so would be best considered in London, where immediate reference may be had to the highest authorities, on every point of delicacy and difficulty that may arise. Whatever I might attempt would be more or less under the disadvantage of being fettered by apprehensions of responsibility, and I might thereby be kept within limits which my Government at home might disregard. In other words, I believe you would have a better chance in this settlement with them than with me. I state this after some imperfect endeavors, by correspondence, to come at satisfactory explanations. If I were in this instance treating of ordinary material interests, I should proceed with more confidence; but anxious as I unfeignedly am that all questions likely to disturb the future good understanding between us should be averted, I strongly recommend this question of the security of the Bahama channel being referred for discussion in London.

This opinion is more decidedly confirmed by your very elaborate and important argument on the application of the general principles of the law of nations to these subjects—an argument to which your authority necessarily gives great weight, but in which I would not presume to follow you with my own imperfect means. Great Britain and the United States, covering all the seas of the world with their commerce, have the greatest possible interest in maintaining sound and pure principles of international law, as well as the practice of reciprocal aid and good offices in all their harbors and possessions. With respect to the latter, it is satisfactory to know that the disposition of the respective Governments and people leaves little to be desired, with the single exception of those very delicate and perplexing questions which have recently arisen from the state of slavery; and even these seem confined, and likely to continue to be confined, to the narrow passage of the Bahama channel. At no other part of the British possessions are American vessels with slaves ever likely to touch, nor are they likely to touch there otherwise than from the pressure of very urgent necessity. The difficulty, therefore, as well as the desired remedy, is apparently confined within narrow limits.

Upon the great general principles affecting this case, we do not differ. You admit that if slaves, the property of American citizens, escape into British territories, it is not expected that they will be restored; and you may be well assured that there is no wish on our part that they should reach our shores, or that British possessions should be used as decoys for the violators of the laws of a friendly neighbor.

When these slaves do reach us, by whatever means, there is no alternative. The present state of British law is, in this respect, too well known to require repetition; nor need I remind you that it is exactly the same with the laws of every part of the United States where a state of slavery is not recognised; and that the slave put on shore at Nassau would be dealt with exactly as would a foreign slave landed, under any circumstances whatever, at Boston.

But what constitutes the being within British dominion, from which these consequences are to follow? Is a vessel passing through the Bahama channel, and forced involuntarily, either from storm or mutiny, into British waters, to be so considered? What power have the authorities of those islands to take cognizance of persons or property in such vessels? These are questions which you, sir, have discussed at great length, and with evident ability. Although you have advanced some propositions which rather surprise and startle me, I do not pretend to judge them; but what is very clear, is, that great principles are involved in a discussion which it would ill become me lightly to enter upon; and I am confirmed by this consideration in wishing that the subject be referred to where it will be perfectly weighed and examined.

It behooves the authorities of our two Governments well to guard themselves against establishing, by their diplomatic intercourse, false precedents and principles; and that they do not, for the purpose of meeting a passing difficulty, set examples which may hereafter mislead the world.

It is not intended, on this occasion, to consider in detail the particular instances which have given rise to these discussions. They have already been stated and explained. Our object is rather to look to the means of future prevention of such occurrences. That this may be obtained, I have little doubt, although we may not be able immediately to agree on the precise stipulations of a treaty. On the part of Great Britain, there are certain great principles, too deeply rooted in the consciences and sympathies of the people for any minister to be able to overlook; and any engagement I might make in opposition to them would be instantly disavowed; but, at the same time that we maintain our own laws within our own territories, we are bound to respect those of our neighbors, and to listen to every possible suggestion of means of averting from them every annoyance and injury. I have great confidence that this may be effectually done in the present instance; but the case to be met and remedied is new, and must not be too hastily dealt with. You may, however, be assured that measures so important for the preservation of friendly intercourse between the two countries shall not be neglected.

In the mean time, I can engage that instructions shall be given to the Governors of her Majesty's colonies on the southern borders of the United States, to execute their own laws with careful attention to the wish of their own Government to maintain good neighborhood; and that there shall be no officious interference with American vessels driven by accident or by violence into those ports. The laws and duties of hospitality shall be executed; and these seem neither to require nor to justify any further inquisition into the state of persons, or things, on board of vessels so situated, than may be indispensable to enforce the observance of the municipal law of the colony, and the proper regulation of its harbors and waters.

A strict and careful attention to these rules, applied in good faith to all transactions as they arise, will, I hope and believe, without any abandonment of great general principles, lead to the avoidance of any excitement or agitation on this very sensitive subject of slavery, and, consequently, of those irritating feelings which may have a tendency to bring into peril all the great interests connected with the maintenance of peace.

I further trust that friendly sentiments, and a conviction of the importance of cherishing them, will, on all occasions, lead the two countries to consider favorably any further arrangements which may be judged necessary for the reciprocal protection of their interests.

I hope, sir, that this explanation on this very important subject will be satisfactory to the President, and that he will see in it no diminution of that earnest desire, which you have been pleased to recognise in me, to perform my work of reconciliation and friendship; but that he will rather perceive, in my suggestion, in this particular instance, that it is made with a well-founded hope of thereby better obtaining the object we have in view.

I have the honor to renew to you, sir, the assurances of my high consideration.

ASHBURTON.

Hon. DANIEL WEBSTER, &c., &c., &c.

Mr. Webster to Lord Ashburton.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, August 8, 1842.

MY LORD: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your Lordship's note of the 6th instant, in answer to mine of the 1st, upon the subject of a stipulation for the better security of American vessels driven by accident, or carried by force, into the British West India ports.

The President would have been gratified if you had felt yourself at liberty to proceed at once to consider of some proper arrangement, by formal treaty, for this object; but there may be weight in the reasons which you urge for referring such mode of stipulation for consideration in London.

The President places his reliance on those principles of public law which were stated in my note to your Lordship, and which are regarded as equally well founded and important; and on your Lordship's engagement that instructions shall be given to the Governors of her Majesty's colonies to execute their own laws with careful attention to the wish of their Government to maintain good neighborhood; and that there shall be no officious interference with American vessels driven by accident or by violence into those ports; that the laws and duties of hospitality shall be executed, and that these seem neither to require nor to justify any further inquisition into the state of persons or things on board of vessels so situated, than may be indispensable to enforce the observance of the municipal law of the colony, and the proper regulation of its harbors and waters. He indulges the hope, nevertheless, that, actuated by a just sense of what is due to the mutual interests of the two countries, and the maintenance of a permanent peace between them, her Majesty's Government will not fail to see the importance of removing, by such further stipulations, by treaty or otherwise, as may be found to be necessary, all cause of complaint connected with the subject.

I have the honor to be,
With high consideration,
Your Lordship's obedient servant,
DANIEL WEBSTER.

Lord ASHBURTON, &c., &c., &c.

CASE OF THE CAROLINE.

Mr. Webster to Lord Ashburton.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, July 27, 1842.

MY LORD: In relation to the case of the "Caroline," which we have heretofore made the subject of conference, I have thought it right to place in your hands an extract of a letter from this department to Mr. Fox, of the 24th of April, 1841, and an extract from the message of the President of the United States to Congress at the commencement of its present session. These papers you have, no doubt, already seen; but they are, nevertheless, now communicated, as such a communication is considered a ready mode of presenting the view which this Government entertains of the destruction of that vessel.

The act of which the Government of the United States complains, is not to be considered as justifiable or unjustifiable, as the question of the lawfulness or unlawfulness of the employment in which the "Caroline" was engaged may be decided the one way or the other. That act is of itself a wrong, and an offence to the sovereignty and the dignity of the United States, being a violation of their soil and territory; a wrong for which, to this day, no atonement, or even apology, has been made by her Majesty's Government. Your Lordship cannot but be aware that self-respect, the consciousness of independence and national equality, and a sensitiveness to whatever may touch the honor of the country—a sensitiveness which this Government will ever feel and ever cultivate—make this a matter of high importance; and I must be allowed to ask for it your Lordship's grave consideration.

I have the honor to be, my Lord,
Your Lordship's most obedient servant,
DANIEL WEBSTER.

Lord ASHBURTON, &c., &c., &c.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Webster to Mr. Fox, dated April 24, 1841.

* * * * * * *

The undersigned has now to signify to Mr. Fox that the Government of the United States has not changed the opinion which it has heretofore expressed to her Majesty's Government, of the character of the act of destroying the "Caroline."

It does not think that that transaction can be justified by any reasonable application or construction of the right of self-defence, under the laws of nations. It is admitted that a just right of self-defence attaches always to nations as well as to individuals, and is equally necessary for the preservation of both. But the extent of this right is a question to be judged of by the circumstances of each particular case; and when its alledged exercise has led to the commission of hostile acts within the territory of a power at peace, nothing less than a clear and absolute necessity can afford ground of justification. Not having, up to this time, been made acquainted with the views and reasons, at length, which have led her Majesty's Government to think the destruction of the "Caroline" justifiable as an act of self-defence, the undersigned, earnestly renewing the remonstrance of this Government against the transaction, abstains, for the present, from any extended discussion of the question. But it is deemed proper, nevertheless, not to omit to take some notice of the general grounds of justification stated by her Majesty's Government, in their instructions to Mr. Fox.

Her Majesty's Government have instructed Mr. Fox to say, that they are of opinion that the transaction which terminated in the destruction of the "Caroline" was a justifiable employment of force, for the purpose of defending the British territory from the unprovoked attack of a band of British rebels and American pirates, who, having been "permitted" to arm and organize themselves within the territory of the United States, had actually invaded a portion of the territory of her Majesty.

The President cannot suppose that her Majesty's Government, by the use of these terms, meant to be understood as intimating that those acts, violating the laws of the United States and disturbing the peace of the British territories, were done under any degree of countenance from this Government, or were regarded by it with indifference; or that, under the circumstances of the case, they could have been prevented by the ordinary course of proceeding. Although he regrets that, by using the term "permitted," a possible inference of that kind might be raised, yet such an inference the President is willing to believe would be quite unjust to the intentions of the British Government.

That, on a line of frontier such as separates the United States from her Britannic Majesty's North American provinces—a line long enough to divide the whole of Europe into halves—irregularities, violences, and conflicts should sometimes occur, equally against the will of both Governments, is certainly easily to be supposed. This may be more possible, perhaps, in regard to the United States, without any reproach to their Government; since their institutions entirely discourage the keeping up of large standing armies in time of peace, and their situation happily exempts them from the necessity of maintaining such expensive and dangerous establishments. All that can be expected from either Government, in these cases, is good faith, a sincere desire to preserve peace and do justice the use of all proper means of prevention; and that, if offences cannot, nevertheless, be always prevented, the offenders shall still be justly punished. In all these respects, this Government acknowledges no delinquency in the performance of its duties.

Her Majesty's Government are pleased, also, to speak of those American citizens who took part with persons in Canada engaged in an insurrection against the British Government, as "American pirates." The undersigned does not admit the propriety or justice of this designation. If citizens of the United States fitted out, or were engaged in fitting out, a military expedition from the United States, intended to act against the British Government in Canada, they were clearly violating the laws of their own country, and exposing themselves to the just consequences which might be inflicted on them, if taken within the British dominions. But, notwithstanding this, they were certainly not pirates; nor does the undersigned think that it can advance the purpose of fair and friendly discussion, or hasten the accommodation of national difficulties, so to denominate them. Their offence, whatever it was, had no analogy to cases of piracy. Supposing all that is alleged against them to be true; they were taking a part in what they regarded as a civil war, and they were taking a part on the side of the rebels. Surely, England herself has not regarded persons thus engaged as deserving the appellation which her Majesty's Government bestowed on these citizens of the United States.

It is quite notorious that, for the greater part of the last two centuries, subjects of the British Crown have been permitted to engage in foreign wars, both national and civil; and in the latter, in every stage of their progress; and yet it has not been imagined that England has at any time allowed her subjects to turn pirates. Indeed, in our own times, not only have individual subjects of that Crown gone abroad to engage in civil wars, but we have seen whole regiments openly recruited, imbodied, armed, and disciplined, in England, with the avowed purpose of aiding a rebellion against a nation with which England was at peace; although it is true that, subsequently, an act of Parliament was passed to prevent transactions so nearly approaching to public war, without license from the Crown.

It may be said that there is a difference between the case of a civil war arising from a disputed succession, or a protracted revolt of a colony against the mother country, and the case of the fresh outbreak or commencement of a rebellion. The undersigned does not deny that such distinction may, for certain purposes, be deemed well founded. He admits that a Government, called upon to consider its own rights, interests, and duties, when civil wars break out in other countries, may decide on all the circumstances of the particular case upon its own existing stipulations, on probable results, on what its own security requires, and on many other considerations. It may be already bound to assist one party; or it may become bound, if it so chooses, to assist the other, and to meet the consequences of such assistance.

But whether the revolt be recent or long continued, they who join those concerned in it, whatever may be their offence against their own country, or however they may be treated, if taken with arms in their hands in the territory of the Government against which the standard of revolt is raised, cannot be denominated pirates, without departing from all ordinary use of language in the definition of offences. A cause which has so foul an origin as piracy cannot, in its progress or by its success, obtain a claim to any degree of respectability or tolerance among nations; and civil wars, therefore, are not understood to have such a commencement.

It is well known to Mr. Fox, that authorities of the highest eminence in England, living and dead, have maintained that the general law of nations does not forbid the citizens or subjects of one Government from taking part in the civil commotions of another. There is some reason, indeed, to think that such may be the opinion of her Majesty's Government at the present moment.

The undersigned has made these remarks from the conviction that it is important to regard established distinctions, and to view the acts and offences of individuals in the exactly proper light. But it is not to be inferred that there is, on the part of this Government, any purpose of extenuating in the slightest degree the crimes of those persons, citizens of the United States, who have joined in military expeditions against the British Government in Canada. On the contrary, the President directs the undersigned to say, that it is his fixed resolution that all such disturbers of the national peace, and violaters of the laws of their country, shall be brought to exemplary punishment. Nor will the fact that they are instigated and led on to these excesses by British subjects, refugees from the provinces, be deemed any excuse or palliation; although it is well worthy of being remembered, that the prime movers of these disturbances on the borders are subjects of the Queen, who come within the territories of the United States, seeking to enlist the sympathies of their citizens, by all the motives which they are able to address to them, on account of grievances, real or imaginary. There is no reason to believe that the design of any hostile movement from the United States, against Canada, has commenced with citizens of the United States. The true origin of such purposes and such enterprises is on the other side of the line. But the President's resolution to prevent these transgressions of the laws, is not, on that account, the less strong. It is taken, not only in conformity to his duty, under the provisions of existing laws, but in full consonance with the established principles and practice of this Government.

The Government of the United States has not, from the first, fallen into the doubts, elsewhere entertained, of the true extent of the duties of neutrality. It has held that, however it may have been in less enlightened ages, the just interpretation of the modern law of nations is, that neutral States are bound to be strictly neutral; and that it is a manifest and gross impropriety for individuals to engage in the civil conflicts of other States, and thus to be at war while their Government is at peace. War and peace are high national relations, which can properly be established or changed only by nations themselves.

The United States have thought, also, that the salutary doctrine of non-intervention by one nation with the affairs of others is liable to be essentially impaired, if, while Government refrains from interference, interference is still allowed to its subjects, individually or in masses. It may happen, indeed, that persons choose to leave their country, emigrate to other regions, and settle themselves on uncultivated lands in territories belonging to other States. This cannot be prevented by Governments which allow the emigration of their subjects and citizens; and such persons, having voluntarily abandoned their own country, have no longer claim to its protection, nor is it longer responsible for their acts. Such cases, therefore, if they occur, show no abandonment of the duty of neutrality.

The Government of the United States has not considered it as sufficient to confine the duties of neutrality and non-interference to the case of Governments whose territories lie adjacent to each other. The application of the principle may be more necessary in such cases, but the principle itself they regard as being the same, if those territories be divided by half the globe. The rule is founded in the impropriety and danger of allowing individuals to make war on their own authority, or, by mingling themselves in the belligerent operations of other nations, to run the hazard of counteracting the policy or embroiling the relations of their own Government. And the United States have been the first among civilized nations to enforce the observance of this just rule of neutrality and peace, by special and adequate legal enactments. In the infancy of this Government, on the breaking out of the European wars, which had their origin in the French revolution, Congress passed laws, with severe penalties, for preventing the citizens of the United States from taking part in those hostilities.

By these laws, it prescribed to the citizens of the United States what it understood to be their duty as neutrals, by the law of nations; and the duty, also, which they owed to the interest and honor of their own country.

At a subsequent period, when the American colonies of a European power took up arms against their sovereign, Congress—not diverted from the established system of the Government by any temporary considerations—not swerved from its sence of justice and of duty by any sympathies which it might naturally feel for one of the parties—did not hesitate, also, to pass acts applicable to the case of colonial insurrection and civil war. And these provisions of law have been continued, revised, amended, and are in full force at the present moment. Nor have they been a dead letter; as it is well known that exemplary punishments have been inflicted on those who have transgressed them. It is known, indeed, that heavy penalties have fallen on individuals (citizens of the United States) engaged in this very disturbance in Canada with which the destruction of the Caroline was connected. And it is in Mr. Fox's knowledge, also, that the act of Congress of March 10th, 1838, was passed for the precise purpose of more effectually restraining military enterprises from the United States into the British provinces, by authorizing the use of the most sure and decisive preventive means. The undersigned may add, that it stands on the admission of very high British authority, that during the recent Canadian troubles, although bodies of adventurers appeared on the border, making it necessary for the people of Canada to keep themselves in a state prepared for self-defence, yet that these adventurers were acting by no means in accordance with the feeling of the great mass of the American people, or of the Government of the United States.

This Government, therefore, not only holds itself above reproach in everything respecting the preservation of neutrality, the observance of the principle of non-intervention, and the strictest conformity, in these respects, to the rules of international law, but it doubts not that the world will do it the justice to acknowledge that it has set an example not unfit to be followed by others; and that, by its steady legislation on this most important subject, it has done something to promote peace and good neighborhood among nations, and to advance the civilization of mankind.

The undersigned trusts that, when her Britannic Majesty's Government shall present the grounds, at length, on which they justify the local authorities of Canada in attacking and destroying the "Caroline," they will consider that the laws of the United States are such as the undersigned has now represented them, and that the Government of the United States has always manifested a sincere disposition to see those laws effectually and impartially administered. If there have been cases in which individuals, justly obnoxious to punishment, have escaped, this is no more than happens in regard to other laws.

Under these circumstances, and under those immediately connected with the transaction itself, it will be for her Majesty's Government to show upon what state of facts, and what rules of national law, the destruction of the "Caroline" is to be defended. It will be for that Government to show a necessity of self-defence, instant, overwhelming, leaving no choice of means, and no moment for deliberation. It will be for it to show, also, that the local authorities of Canada, even supposing the necessity of the moment authorized them to enter the territories of the United States at all, did nothing unreasonable or excessive, since the act, justified by the necessity of self defence, must be limited by that necessity, and kept clearly within it. It must be shown that admonition or remonstrance to the persons on board the "Caroline" was impracticable, or would have been unavailing. It must be shown that daylight could not be waited for; that there could be no attempt at discrimination between the innocent and the guilty; that it would not have been enough to seize and detain the vessel; but that there was a necessity, present and inevitable, for attacking her in the darkness of the night, while moored to the shore, and while unarmed men were asleep on board, killing some and wounding others, and then drawing her into the current, above the cataract, setting her on fire, and, careless to know whether there might not be in her the innocent with the guilty, or the living with the dead, committing her to a fate which fills the imagination with horror. A necessity for all this, the Government of the United States cannot believe to have existed.

All will see that, if such things be allowed to occur, they must lead to bloody and exasperated war. And when an individual comes into the United States from Canada, and to the very place on which this drama was performed, and there chooses to make public and vainglorious boast of the part he acted in it, it is hardly wonderful that great excitement should be created, and some degree of commotion arise.

This republic does not wish to disturb the tranquillity of the world; its object is peace, its policy peace. It seeks no aggrandizement by foreign conquest, because it knows that no foreign acquisitions could augment its power and importance so rapidly as they are already advancing by its own natural growth, under the propitious circumstances of its situation. But it cannot admit that its Government has not both the will and the power to preserve its own neutrality, and to enforce the observances of its own laws upon its own citizens. It is jealous of its rights, and among others, and most especially, of the right of the absolute immunity of its territory against aggression from abroad; and these rights it is the duty and determination of this Government fully and at all times to maintain, while it will at the same time as scrupulously refrain from infringing on the rights of others.

The President instructs the undersigned to say, in conclusion, that he confidently trusts that this, and all other questions of difference between the two Governments, will be treated by both in the full exercise of such a spirit of candor, justice, and mutual respect, as shall give assurance of the long continuance of peace between the two countries.

The undersigned avails himself of this opportunity to assure Mr. Fox of his high consideration.

DANIEL WEBSTER.

HENRY S. FOX, Esq.,
Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary.

Extract from the message of the President to Congress, at the commencement of its present session.

I regret that it is not in my power to make known to you an equally satisfactory conclusion in the case of the "Caroline" steamer, with the circumstances connected with the destruction of which, in December, 1837, by an armed force fitted out in the province of Upper Canada, you are already made acquainted. No such atonement as was due for the public wrong to the United States by this invasion of her territory, so wholly irreconcileable with her rights as an independent power, has yet been made. In the view taken by this Government, the inquiry whether the vessel was in the employment of those who were prosecuting an unauthorized war against that province, or was engaged by the owner in the business of transporting passengers to and from Navy island, in hopes of private gain, (which was most probably the case,) in no degree alters the real question at issue between the two Governments. This Government can never concede to any foreign Government the power, except in a case of the most urgent and extreme necessity, of invading its territory, either to arrest the persons or destroy the property of those who may have violated the municipal laws of such foreign Government, or have disregarded their obligations arising under the law of nations. The territory of the United States must be regarded as sacredly secure against all such invasions, until they shall voluntarily acknowledge inability to acquit themselves of their duty to others; and, in announcing this sentiment, I do but affirm a principle which no nation on earth would be more ready to vindicate, at all hazards, than the people and Government of Great Britain. If, upon a full investigation of all the facts, it shall appear that the owner of the "Caroline" was governed by a hostile intent, or had made common cause with those who were in the occupancy of Navy island, then, so far as he is concerned, there can be no claim to indemnity for the destruction of his boat, which this Government would feel itself bound to prosecute; since he would have acted not only in derogation of the rights of Great Britain, but in clear violation of the laws of the United States. But that is a question which, however settled, in no manner involves the higher consideration of the violation of territorial sovereignty and jurisdiction. To recognise it as an admissible practice, that each Government, in its turn, upon any sudden and unauthorized outbreak on a frontier, the extent of which renders it impossible for either to have an efficient force on every mile of it, and which outbreak, therefore, neither may be able to suppress in a day, may take vengeance into its own hands, and without even a remonstrance, and in the absence of any pressing or overruling necessity, may invade the territory of the other, would inevitably lead to results equally to be deplored by both. When border collisions come to receive the sanction, or to be made on the authority, of either Government, general war must be the inevitable result. While it is the ardent desire of the United States to cultivate the relations of peace with all nations, and to fulfil all the duties of good neighborhood towards those who possess territories adjoining their own, that very desire would lead them to deny the right of any foreign power to invade their boundary with an armed force. The correspondence between the two Governments on this subject will, at a future day of your session, be submitted to your consideration; and, in the mean time, I cannot but indulge the hope that the British Government will see the propriety of reasuming, as a rule of future action, the precedent which has been set in the affair at Schlosser.

WASHINGTON, July 28, 1842.

SIR: In the course of our conferences on the several subjects of difference which it was the object of my mission to endeavor to settle, the unfortunate case of the Caroline, with its attendant consequences, could not escape our attention; for, although it is not of a description to be susceptible of any settlement by a convention or treaty, yet, being connected with the highest considerations of national honor and dignity, it has given rise, at times, to deep excitements, so as more than once to endanger the maintenance of peace.

The note you did me the honor of addressing me the 27th instant, reminds me that, however disposed your Government might be to be satisfied with the explanations which it has been my duty to offer, the natural anxiety of the public mind requires that these explanations should be more durably recorded in our correspondence; and you send me a copy of your note to Mr. Fox, her Britannic Majesty's minister here, and an extract from the speech of the President of the United States to Congress, at the opening of the present session, as a ready mode of presenting the view entertained on this subject by the Government of the United States.

It is so far satisfactory to perceive that we are perfectly agreed as to the general principles of international law applicable to this unfortunate case. Respect for the inviolable character of the territory of independent nations is the most essential foundation of civilization. It is useless to strengthen a principle so generally acknowledged, by any appeal to authorities on international law; and you may be assured, sir, that her Majesty's Government set the highest possible value on this principle, and are sensible of their duty to support it by their conduct and example, for the maintenance of peace and order in the world. If a sense of moral responsibility were not a sufficient security for their observance of this duty towards all nations, it will be readily believed that the most common dictates of interest and policy would lead to it in the case of a long conterminous boundary of some thousand miles, with a country of such great and growing power as the United States of America, inhabited by a kindred race, gifted with all its activity, and all its susceptibility on points of national honor.

Every consideration, therefore, leads us to set, as highly as your Government can possibly do, this paramount obligation of reciprocal respect for the independent territory of each. But however strong this duty may be, it is admitted by all writers, by all jurists, by the occasional practice of all nations, not excepting your own, that a strong overpowering necessity may arise, when this great principle may and must be suspended. It must be so for the shortest possible period, during the continuance of an admitted overruling necessity, and strictly confined within the narrowest limits imposed by that necessity. Self-defence is the first law of our nature; and it must be recognised by every code which professes to regulate the condition and relations of man. Upon this modification (if I may so call it) of the great general principle, we seem also to be agreed; and on this part of the subject I have done little more than repeat the sentiments, though in less forcible language, admitted and maintained by you in the letter to which you refer me.

Agreeing, therefore, on the general principle, and on the possible exception to which it is liable, the only question between us is, whether this occurrence came within the limits fairly to be assigned to such exception; whether, to use your words, there was "that necessity of self-defence, instant, overwhelming, leaving no choice of means," which preceded the destruction of the Caroline, while moored to the shore of the United States. Give me leave to say, sir, with all possible admiration of your very ingenious discussion of the general principles which are supposed to govern the right and practice of interference by the people of one country in the wars and quarrels of others, that this part of your argument is little applicable to our immediate case. If Great Britain, America, or any other country, suffer their people to fit out expeditions to take part in distant quarrels, such conduct may, according to the circumstances of each case, be justly matter of complaint; and, perhaps these transactions have generally been in late times too much overlooked or connived at. But the case we are considering, is of a wholly different description, and may be best determined by answering the following question. Supposing a man, standing on ground where you have no legal right to follow him, has a weapon long enough to reach you, and is striking you down and endangering your life: how long are you bound to wait for the assistance of the authority having the legal power to relieve you? or, to bring the facts more immediately home to the case, if cannon are moving and setting up in a battery which can reach you, and are actually destroying life and property by their fire, if you have remonstrated for some time without effect, and see no prospect of relief, when begins your right to defend yourself, should you have no other means of doing so than by seizing your assailant on the verge of a neutral territory?

I am unwilling to recall to your recollection the particulars of this case; but I am obliged very shortly to do so, to show what was, at the time, the extent of the existing justification; for, upon this, entirely depends the question whether a gross insult has or has not been offered to the Government and people of the United States.

After some tumultuous proceedings in Upper Canada, which were of short duration, and were suppressed by the militia of the country, the persons criminally concerned in them took refuge in the neighboring State of New York; and, with a very large addition to their numbers, openly collected, invaded the Canadian territory, taking possession of Navy island.

This invasion took place the 16th of December, 1837; a gradual accession of numbers and of military ammunition continued openly, and, though under the sanction of no public authority, at least with no public hindrance, until the 29th of the same month, when several hundred men were collected, and twelve pieces of ordnance, which could only have been procured from some public store or arsenal, were actually mounted on Navy island, and were used to fire within easy range upon the unoffending inhabitants of the opposite shore. Remonstrances, wholly ineffectual, were made; so ineffectual, indeed, that a militia regiment, stationed on the neighboring American island, looked on without any attempt at interference, while shots were fired from the American island itself. This important fact stands on the best American authority, being stated in a letter to Mr. Forsyth, of the 6th February, 1838, of Mr. Benton, attorney of the United States, the gentleman sent by your Government to inquire into the facts of the case; who adds, very properly, that he makes the statement "with deep regret and mortification."

This force, formed of all the reckless and mischievous people of the border, formidable from their numbers and from their armament, had in their pay, and as part of their establishment, this steamboat Caroline—the important means and instrument by which numbers and arms were hourly increasing. I might safely put it to any candid man acquainted with the existing state of things, to say whether the military commander in Canada had the remotest reason, on the 29th of December, to expect to be relieved from this state of suffering by the protective intervention of any American authority. How long could a Government, having the paramount duty of protecting its own people, be reasonably expected to wait for what they had then no reason to expect? What would have been the conduct of American officers? What has been their conduct under circumstances much less aggravated? I would appeal to you, sir, to say whether the facts which you say would alone justify this act, viz: "a necessity of self-defence, instant, overwhelming, leaving no choice of means, and no moment for deliberation," were not applicable to this case in as high a degree as they ever were to any case of a similar description in the history of nations.

Nearly five years are now passed since this occurrence; there has been time for the public to deliberate upon it calmly; and I believe I may take it to be the opinion of candid and honorable men, that the British officers who executed this transaction, and their Government who approved it, intended no slight or disrespect to the sovereign authority of the United States. That they intended no such disrespect, I can most solemnly affirm; and I trust it will be admitted that no inference to the contrary can fairly be drawn, even by the most susceptible in points of national honor.

Notwithstanding my wish that the explanation I had to make might not revive in any degree any feelings of irritation, I do not see how I could treat this subject without this short recital of facts, because the proof that no disrespect was intended is mainly to be looked for in the extent of the justification.

There remains only a point or two which I should wish to notice, to remove, in some degree, the impression which your rather highly colored description of this transaction is calculated to make. The mode of telling a story often tends to distort facts; and in this case, more than in any other, it is important to arrive at plain unvarnished truth.

It appears from every account, that the expedition was sent to capture the Caroline when she was expected to be found on the British ground of Navy island, and that it was only owing to the orders of the rebel leader being disobeyed, that she was not so found. When the British officer came round the point of the island in the night, he first discovered that the vessel was moored to the other shore. He was not by this deterred from making the capture, and his conduct was approved. But you will perceive that there was here, most decidedly, the case of justification mentioned in your note, that there should be "no moment left for deliberation." I mention this circumstance to show, also, that the expedition was not planned with a premeditated purpose of attacking the enemy within the jurisdiction of the United States, but that the necessity of so doing arose from altered circumstances at the moment of execution.

I have only further to notice the highly colored picture drawn in your note, of the facts attending the execution of this service. Some importance is attached to the attack having been made in the night, and the vessel having been set on fire and floated down the falls of the river; and it is insinuated rather than asserted, that there was carelessness as to the lives of the persons on board. The account given by the distinguished officer who commanded the expedition, distinctly refutes, or satisfactorily explains these assertions. The time of night was purposely selected as most likely to insure the execution, with the least loss of life; and it is expressly stated that, the strength of the current not permitting the vessel to be carried off, and it being necessary to destroy her by fire, she was drawn into the stream for the express purpose of preventing injury to persons or property of the inhabitants at Schlosser.

I would willingly have abstained from a return to the facts of this transaction; my duty being to offer those explanations and assurances which may lead to satisfy the public mind, and to the cessation of all angry feeling; but it appeared to me that some explanation of parts of the case, apparently misunderstood, might be of service for this purpose.

Although it is believed that a candid and impartial consideration of the whole history of this unfortunate event will lead to the conclusion that there were grounds of justification as strong as were ever presented in such cases; and, above all, that no slight of the authority of the United States were intended, yet it must be admitted that there was, in the hurried execution of this necessary service, a violation of territory; and I am instructed to assure you that her Majesty's Government consider this as a most serious fact; and that, far from thinking that an event of this kind should be lightly risked, they would unfeignedly deprecate its recurrence. Looking back to what passed at this distance of time, what is, perhaps, most to be regretted, is, that some explanation and apology for this occurrence was not immediately made. This (with a frank explanation of the necessity of the case) might, and probably would, have prevented much of the exasperation, and of the subsequent complaints and recriminations to which it gave rise.

There are possible cases in the relations of nations, as of individuals, where necessity, which controls all other laws, may be pleaded; but it is neither easy nor safe to attempt to define the rights or limits properly assignable to such a plea. This must always be a subject of much delicacy, and should be considered by friendly nations with great candor and forbearance. The intentions of the parties must mainly be looked to. And can it for a moment be supposed that Great Britain would intentionally and wantonly provoke a great and powerful neighbor?

Her Majesty's Government earnestly desire that a reciprocal respect for the independent jurisdiction and authority of neighboring States may be considered among the first duties of all Governments; and I have to repeat the assurance of regret they feel, that the event of which I am treating should have disturbed the harmony they so anxiously wish to maintain with the American people and Government.

Connected with these transactions, there have also been circumstances, of which I believe it is generally admitted that Great Britain has also had just ground to complain. Individuals have been made personally liable for acts done under the avowed authority of their Government; and there are now many brave men exposed to personal consequences for no other cause than having served their country. That this is contrary to every principle of international law, it is useless for me to insist. Indeed, it has been admitted by every authority of your Government; but, owing to a conflict of laws, difficulties have intervened, much to the regret of those authorities, in giving practical effect to these principles; and for these difficulties some remedy has been by all desired. It is no business of mine to enter upon the consideration of them; nor have I sufficient information for the purpose. But I trust you will excuse my addressing to you the inquiry, Whether the Government of the United States is now in a condition to secure, in effect and in practice, the principle—which has never been denied in argument—that individuals, acting under legitimate authority, are not personally responsible for executing the orders of their Government. That the power, when it exists, will be used on every fit occasion, I am well assured; and I am bound to admit that, looking through the voluminous correspondence concerning these transactions, there appears no indisposition with any of the authorities of the Federal Government, under its several administrations, to do justice in this respect in as far as their means and power would allow.

I trust, sir, I may now be permitted to hope that all feelings of resentment and ill-will resulting from these truly unfortunate events, may be buried in oblivion, and that they may be succeeded by those of harmony and friendship, which it is certainly the interest, and, I also believe, the inclination, of all to promote.

I beg, sir, you will be assured of my high and unfeigned consideration.

ASHBURTON.

Hon. DANIEL WEBSTER, &c., &c., &c.

Mr. Webster to Lord Ashburton.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, August 6, 1842.

Your Lordship's note of the 28th July, in answer to mine of the 27th, respecting the case of the "Caroline," has been received and laid before the President.

The President sees, with pleasure, that your Lordship fully admits those great principles of public law, applicable to cases of this kind, which this Government has expressed; and that, on your part, as on ours, respect for the inviolable character of the territory of independent States is the most essential foundation of civilization. And while it is admitted, on both sides, that there are exceptions to this rule, he is gratified to find that your Lordship admits that such exceptions must come within the limitations stated and the terms used in a former communication from this department to the British Plenipotentiary here. Undoubtedly it is just, that, while it is admitted that exceptions growing out of the great law of self-defence do exist, those exceptions should be confined to cases in which the "necessity of self-defence is instant, overwhelming, leaving no choice of means, and no moment for deliberation."

Understanding these principles alike, the difference between the two Governments is only whether the facts in the case of the "Caroline" make out a case of such necessity for the purpose of self-defence. Seeing that the transaction is not recent, having happened in the time of one of his predecessors; seeing that your Lordship, in the name of your Government, solemnly declares that no slight or disrespect was intended to the sovereign authority of the United States; seeing that it is acknowledged that, whether justifiable or not, there was yet a violation of the territory of the United States, and that you are instructed to say that your Government considers that as a most serious occurrence; seeing, finally, that it is now admitted that an explanation and apology for this violation was due at the time, the President is content to receive these acknowledgments and assurances in the conciliatory spirit which marks your Lordships letter, and will make this subject as a complaint of violation of territory, the topic of no further discussion between the two Governments.

As to that part of your Lordship's note which relates to other occurrences springing out of the case of the "Caroline," with which occurrences the name of Alexander McLeod has become connected, I have to say, that the Government of the United States entirely adhere to the sentiments and opinions expressed in the communications from this department to Mr. Fox. This Government has admitted that, for an act committed by the command of his sovereign, jure belli, an individual cannot be responsible in the ordinary courts of another State. It would regard it as a high indignity if a citizen of its own, acting under its authority, and by its special command, in such cases, were held to answer in a municipal tribunal, and to undergo punishment, as if the behest of his Government were no defence or protection to him.

But your Lordship is aware that, in regular constitutional Governments, persons arrested on charges of high crimes can only be discharged by some judicial proceeding. It is so in England; it is so in the colonies and provinces of England. The forms of judicial proceeding differ in different countries, being more rapid in some and more dilatory in others; and it may be added, generally more dilatory, or at least more cautious, in cases affecting life, in Governments of a strictly limited, than in those of a more unlimited character. It was a subject of regret that the release of McLeod was so long delayed. A State court, and that not of the highest jurisdiction, decided that, on summary application, embarrassed, as it would appear, by technical difficulties, he could not be released by that court. His discharge, shortly afterward, by a jury, to whom he preferred to submit his case, rendered unnecessary the further prosecution of the legal question. It is for the Congress of the United States, whose attention has been called to the subject, to say what further provision ought to be made to expedite proceedings in such cases; and, in answer to your Lordship's question towards the close of your note, I have to say that the Government of the United States holds itself not only fully disposed, but fully competent, to carry into practice every principle which it avows or acknowledges, and to fulfil every duty and obligation which it owes to foreign Governments, their citizens or subjects.

I have the honor to be, my Lord, with great consideration, your obedient servant,

DANIEL WEBSTER.

Lord ASHBURTON, &c. &c. &c.

IMPRESSMENT.

Mr. Webster to Lord Ashburton.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, 8th August, 1842.

MY LORD: We have had several conversations on the subject of impressment, but I do not understand that your Lordship has instructions from your Government to negotiate upon it; nor does the Government of the United States see any utility in opening such negotiation, unless the British Government is prepared to renounce the practice in all future wars.

No cause has produced, to so great an extent, and for so long a period, disturbing and irritating influences on the political relations of the United States and England as the impressment of seamen by British cruisers from American merchant vessels.

From the commencement of the French revolution to the breaking out of the war between the two countries in 1812, hardly a year elapsed without loud complaint and earnest remonstrance. A deep feeling of opposition to the right claimed, and to the practice exercised under it—and not unfrequently exercised without the least regard to what justice and humanity would have dictated, even if the right itself had been admitted—took possession of the public mind of America; and this feeling, it is well known, co-operated most powerfully with other causes, to produce the state of hostilities which ensued.

At different periods, before and since the war, negotiations have taken place between the two Governments, with the hope of finding some means of quieting these complaints. At some times, the effectual abolition of the practice has been requested and treated of; at other times, its temporary suspension; and, at other times again, the limitation of its exercise and some security against its enormous abuses.

A common destiny has attended these efforts; they have all failed. The question stands at this moment where it stood fifty years ago. The nearest approach to a settlement was a convention proposed in 1803, and which had come to the point of signature, when it was broken off in consequence of the British Government insisting that the narrow seas should be expressly excepted, out of the sphere over which the contemplated stipulations against impressment should extend. The American minister, Mr. King, regarded this exception as quite inadmissible, and chose rather to abandon the negotiation than to acquiesce in the doctrine which it proposed to establish.

England asserts the right of impressing British subjects, in time of war, out of neutral merchant vessels, and of deciding by her visiting officers, who, among the crews of such merchant vessels, are British subjects. She asserts this as a legal exercise of the prerogative of the Crown; which prerogative is alleged to be founded on the English law of perpetual and indissoluble allegiance of the subject, and his obligation, under all circumstances, and for his whole life, to render military service to the Crown whenever required.

This statement, made in the words of eminent British jurists, shows, at once, that the English claim is far broader than the basis or platform on which it is raised. The law relied on is English law; the obligations insisted on are obligations existing between the Crown of England and its subjects. This law and these obligations, it is admitted, may be such as England may choose they shall be. But then they must be confined to the parties. Impressment of seamen, out of and beyond English territory, and from on board the ships of other nations, is an interference with the rights of other nations; is further, therefore, than English prerogative can legally extend; and is nothing but an attempt to enforce the peculiar law of England beyond the dominions and jurisdiction of the Crown. The claim asserts an extra-territorial authority for the law of British prerogative; and assumes to exercise this extra-territorial authority to the manifest injury and annoyance of the citizens and subjects of other States, on board their own vessels on the high seas.

Every merchant vessel on the seas is rightfully considered as part of the territory of the country to which it belongs. The entry, therefore, into such vessel, (being neutral,) by a belligerent, is an act of force, and is, prima facie, a wrong - a trespass, which can be justified only when done for some purpose, allowed to form a sufficient justification by the law of nations. But a British cruiser enters an American merchant vessel in order to take therefrom supposed British subjects; offering no justification therefor, under the law of nations, but claiming the right under the law of England respecting the King's prerogative. This cannot be defended. English soil, English territory, English jurisdiction, is the appropriate sphere for the operation of English law; the ocean is the sphere of the law of nations; and any merchant vessel on the seas is, by that law, under the protection of the laws of her own nation, and may claim immunity, unless in cases in which that law allows her to be entered or visited.

If this notion of perpetual allegiance, and the consequent power of the prerogative, were the law of the world; if it formed part of the conventional code of nations, and were usually practised like the right of visiting neutral ships, for the purpose of discovering and seizing enemy property, then impressment might be defended as a common right; and there would be no remedy for the evil till the national code should be altered. But this is, by no means, the case. There is no such principle incorporated into the code of nations. The doctrine stands only as English law, not as national law; and English law cannot be of force beyond English dominion. Whatever duties or relations that law creates between the sovereign and his subjects, can be enforced and maintained only within the realm, or proper possessions or territory of the sovereign. There may be quite as just a prerogative right to the property of subjects as to their personal services, in an exigency of the State; but no Government thinks of controlling, by its own laws, property of its subjects situated abroad; much less does any Government think of entering the territory of another power for the purpose of seizing such property and applying it to its own uses. As laws, the prerogatives of the Crown of England have no obligation on persons or property domiciled or situated abroad.

"When, therefore," says an authority not unknown or unregarded on either side of the Atlantic, "we speak of the right of a State to bind its own native subjects everywhere, we speak only of its own claim and exercise of sovereignty over them, when they return within its own territorial jurisdiction; and not of its right to compel or require obedience to such laws, on the part of other nations, within their own territorial sovereignty. On the contrary, every nation has an exclusive right to regulate persons and things within its own territory, according to its sovereign will and public polity."

The good sense of these principles, their remarkable pertinency to the subject now under consideration, and the extraordinary consequences resulting from the British doctrine, are signally manifested by that which we see taking place every day. England acknowledges herself overburdened with population of the poorer classes. Every instance of the emigration of persons of those classes is regarded by her as a benefit. England, therefore, encourages emigration; means are notoriously supplied to emigrants to assist their conveyance, from public funds; and the New World, and more especially these United States, receive the many thousands of her subjects thus ejected from the bosom of their native land by the necessities of their condition. They come away from poverty and distress, in over crowded cities, to seek employment, comfort, and new homes, in a country of free institutions, possessed by a kindred race, speaking their own language, and having laws and usages, in many respects, like those to which they have been accustomed; and a country which, upon the whole, is found to possess more attractions for persons of their character and condition than any other on the face of the globe. It is stated that, in the quarter of the year ending with June last, more than twenty six thousand emigrants left the single port of Liverpool for the United States—being four or five times as many as left the same port within the same period for the British colonies and all other parts of the world. Of these crowds of emigrants, many arrive in our cities in circumstances of great destitution; and the charities of the country, both public and private, are severely taxed to relieve their immediate wants. In time, they mingle with the new community in which they find themselves, and seek means of living; some find employment in the cities; others go to the frontiers, to cultivate lands reclaimed from the forest; and a greater or less number of the residue, becoming, in time, naturalized citizens, enter into the merchant service, under the flag of their adopted country.

Now, my Lord, if war should break out between England and a European power, can anything be more unjust, anything more irreconcileable to the general sentiments of mankind, than that England should seek out these persons, thus encouraged by her, and compelled by their own condition to leave their native homes, tear them away from their new employments, their new political relations, and their domestic connexions, and force them to undergo the dangers and hardships of military service, for a country which has thus ceased to be their own country? Certainly, certainly, my Lord, there can be but one answer to this question. Is it not far more reasonable that England should either prevent such emigration of her subjects, or that, if she encourage and promote it, she should leave them, not to the embroilment of a double and contradictory allegiance, but to their own voluntary choice, to form such relations, political or social, as they see fit, in the country where they are to find their bread, and to the laws and institutions of which they are to look for defence and protection!

A question of such serious importance ought now to be put at rest. If the United States give shelter and protection to those whom the policy of England annually casts upon their shores—if, by the benign influences of their Government and institutions, and by the happy condition of the country, those emigrants become raised from poverty to comfort, finding it easy even to become landholders, and being allowed to partake in the enjoyment of all civil rights,—if all this may be done, (and all this is done, under the countenance and encouragement of England herself,) is it not high time, my Lord, that, yielding that which had its origin in feudal ideas as inconsistent with the present state of society, and especially with the intercourse and relations subsisting between the Old World and the New, England should, at length, formally disclaim all right to the services of such persons, and renounce all control over their conduct?

But impressment is subject to objections of a much wi range. If it could be justified in its application to those w are declared to be its only object, it still remains true that, in exercise, it touches the political rights of other governme and endangers the security of their own native subjects and c zens. The sovereignty of the State is concerned in maint ing its exclusive jurisdiction and possession over its merch ships on the seas, except so far as the law of nations justi intrusion upon that possession for special purposes; and all e perience has shown that no member of a crew, wherever bo is safe against impressment when a ship is visited.

The evils and injuries resulting from the actual practice hardly be overrated, and have ever proved themselves to such as should lead to its relinquishment, even if it were fou ed in any defensible principle. The difficulty of discrimi ting between English subjects and American citizens has ways been found to be great, even when an honest purpose discrimination has existed. But the lieutenant of a man war, having necessity for men, is apt to be a summary jud and his decisions will be quite as significant of his own wa and his own power as of the truth and justice of the case.
extract from a letter of Mr. King, of the 13th of April, 1797, the American Secretary of State, shows something of the en
mous extent of these wrongful seizures:

"Instead of a few, and these in many instances equivoc cases, I have," says he, "since the month of July past, ma application for the discharge, from British men of war, of tw hundred and seventy-one seamen, who, stating themselves to b Americans, have claimed my interference. Of this numbe eighty six have been ordered by the Admiralty to be discharge thirty-seven more have been detained as British subjects or American volunteers, or for want of proof that they are Ame icans; and to my applications for the discharge of the remai ing one hundred and forty-eight, I have received no answer the ships on board of which these seamen were detained ha ing, in many instances, sailed before an examination was ma in consequence of my application.

"It is certain that some of those who have applied to me a not American citizens; but the exceptions are, in my opinio few; and the evidence, exclusive of certificates, has been suc
as, in most cases, to satisfy me that the applicants were re Americans, who have been forced into the British service, an who, with singular constancy, have generally persevered in r fusing pay or bounty, though in some instances they have bee in service more than two years."

But the injuries of impressment are by no means confined its immediate subjects or the individuals on whom it is prac tised. Vessels suffer from the weakening of their crews, an voyages are often delayed, and not unfrequently broken up, b subtraction from the number of necessary hands by impress ment. And what is still of greater and more general momen the fear of impressment has been found to create great diff culty in obtaining sailors for the American merchant servic in times of European war. Seafaring men, otherwise incline to enter into that service, are, as experience has shown, deter red by the fear of finding themselves ere long in compulsor military service in British ships of war. Many instances hav occurred, fully established in proof, in which raw seamen, na tives of the United States, fresh from the fields of agriculture entering for the first time on shipboard, have been impresse before they made the land, placed on the decks of British men of war, and compelled to serve for years before they could ob tain their release, or revisit their country and their homes. Such instances become known, and their effect in discouraging young men from engaging in the merchant service of their country can neither be doubted nor wondered at. More than all, my Lord, the practice of impressment, whenever it has existed, ha produced not conciliation and good feeling, but resentment, ex asperation, and animosity, between the two great commercia countries of the world.

In the calm and quiet which have succeeded the late war—condition so favorable for dispassionate consideration—Englan herself has evidently seen the harshness of impressment, ever when exercised on seamen in her own merchant service; an she has adopted measures calculated, if not to renounce th power or to abolish the practice, yet, at least, to supersede it necessity by other means of manning the royal navy, mor compatible with justice and the rights of individuals, and fa more conformable to the spirit and sentiments of the age.

Under these circumstances, the Government of the Unite States has used the occasion of your Lordship's pacific missio to review this whole subject, and to bring it to your notice an that of your Government. It has reflected on the past, ponder ed the condition of the present, and endeavored to anticipate, far as might be in its power, the probable future; and I am now to communicate to your Lordship the result of these de liberations.

The American Government, then, is prepared to say the the practice of impressing seamen from American vessels can not hereafter be allowed to take place. That practice founded on principles which it does not recognise; and is inva riably attended by consequences so unjust, so injurious, and o such formidable magnitude, as cannot be submitted to.

In the early disputes between the two Governments on thi so long contested topic, the distinguished person to whos hands were first intrusted the seals of this department de clared, that the simplest rule will be, that the vessel bein American shall be evidence that the seamen on board ar such."

Fifty years' experience, the utter failure of many negotiation and a careful reconsideration now had of the whole subject, a moment when the passions are laid, and no present interes or emergency exists to bias the judgment, have fully convince this Government that this is not only the simplest and be but the only rule which can be adopted and observed, co sistently with the rights and honor of the United States and th security of their citizens. That rule announces, therefore, wha will hereafter be the principle maintained by their Governmen
In every regularly documented American merchant vessel, th crew who navigate it will find their protection in the fla which is over them.

This announcement is not made, my Lord, to revive useles recollections of the past, nor to stir the embers from fires whic have been, in a great degree, smothered by many years peace. Far otherwise. Its purpose is to extinguish thos fires effectually, before new incidents arise to fan them int flame. The communication is in the spirit of peace, and fo the sake of peace; and springs from a deep and conscientio conviction that high interests of both nations require th this so-long contested and controverted subject should now b finally put to rest. I persuade myself, my Lord, that you wi

Secondly. That the insolvent laws of the States be respected and left in force, to the same degree that they were ordered to be respected by the 61st section of the act of 1800; which section is in the following words:

"That this act shall not repeal or annul, or be construed to repeal or annul, the laws of any State now in force, or which may hereafter be enacted, for the relief of insolvent debtors, except so far as the same may respect persons who are, or may be, clearly within the purview of this act, and whose debts shall amount, in the cases specified in the second section thereof, to the sums therein mentioned. And if any person within the purview of this act shall be imprisoned for the space of three months for any debt or upon any contract, unless the creditors of such prisoner shall proceed to prosecute a commission of bankruptcy against him or her, agreeably to the provisions of this act, such debtor may, and shall be, entitled to relief under any such laws for the relief of insolvent debtors, this act notwithstanding."

Thirdly. That the liens created by State laws on the property of bankrupts be respected and observed in the same full and absolute manner in which they were ordered to be respected and observed by the 64th section of the said act of 1800; which section is in these words:

"That nothing contained in this act shall be taken or construed to invalidate or impair any lien existing at the date of this act upon the lands or chattels of any person who may become bankrupt."

Fourthly. That a person subject to involuntary bankruptcy shall not have the privilege of voluntary bankruptcy; but, on filing a declaration of insolvency, shall be subject to be proceeded against at the will of his creditors, according to the principles of the 6th section of the bankrupt act of George IV, and the 13th section of the insolvent debtors act of the same reign.

Fifthly. That the operation of the act be prospective only, according to the first section of the bankrupt act of the year 1800.

Sixthly. That agreements on the part of bankrupts in office to assign a part of their salaries and emoluments to their creditors, be binding in law, and give the creditors a right to have the same retained for their benefit.

On motion of Mr. BENTON, the bill was then ordered to be printed, and read a second time.

Mr. WRIGHT presented a petition from W. M. Quackenboss and others, sureties of the late collector for the port of New York, (Mr. Swartwout,) asking that a law might be passed authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to compromise with said sureties their liabilities to the United States. Mr. W. remarked that this matter had been before the Senate three or four consecutive sessions, and a bill had been invariably passed, but failed in the House for want of time. He hoped, as this was a short session, and as it was to the interest of all parties that the matter should be settled, that the Committee on the Judiciary would give the subject the earliest consideration possible, and report a bill without delay. He moved the reference of the petition to the Judiciary Committee; but, as no such committee was yet appointed, it was ordered to lie on the table for the present.

Mr. TALLMADGE submitted the following resolution, which lies over, under the rule, viz:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of instructing the Secretary of State to communicate with the judicial officers of the United States who have had the execution of the bankrupt law, and ascertain from them the number of applications under the act, both voluntary and involuntary; the number of discharges, the points decided under any provision of the act, the opinions of the judges as to any amendments or modifications of the act; and such other information as he may deem necessary to show the effects and operations of the act; and that he report the same to the Senate on the first day of the next session.

Mr. BARROW gave notice that he would on to-morrow ask leave to introduce a bill for the relief of Thomas W. Chinn.

THE EXPUNGING RESOLUTION.

Mr. BAYARD rose and said he would take this early opportunity, in conformity with the notice which he had given on the last day of the last session, to introduce a resolution which he had been instructed by the Legislature of his State to introduce four years ago; and he would take occasion to say that it was his design to ask its consideration at as early a day as practicable. The Senate having nothing of a very important nature to occupy its attention at present, he hoped they would be able to take the matter into consideration within the present month, as the adoption of the resolution would be, in his opinion, a happy consummation with which to close the year. It was to rescind the resolution of the 16th January, 1837, commonly called the "expunging resolution." Mr. B.'s resolution was then sent to the Chair, and read as follows:

Whereas the Senate of the United States, in the exercise of its functions as a deliberative assembly, did, on the 28th day of March, 1834, adopt the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the President, in the late Executive proceedings in relation to the revenue, has assumed upon himself authority and power not conferred by the Constitution and laws, but in derogation of both."

And whereas afterward, to wit, on the 16th day of January, 1837, the Senate, in reference to the above resolution, adopted another, as follows:

"Resolved, That the said resolve be expunged from the Journal: and for that purpose, that the Secretary of the Senate, at such time as the Senate may appoint, shall bring the manuscript Journal of the session of 1833-'4 into the Senate, and, in the presence of the Senate, draw black lines round the said resolve, and write across the face thereof, in strong letters, the words following: Expunged by order of the Senate, this 16th day of January, in the year of our Lord 1837."

And whereas the Constitution of the United States expressly requires that each House of Congress shall keep a journal of its proceedings, meaning thereby to preserve a faithful and permanent record of those proceedings:

And whereas the Senate of the United States, independently of its legislative, executive, and judicial functions, has the inherent right, as a deliberative assembly, to express its opinions, which can be done only by resolution—which opinions, when thus expressed, become part of its proceedings, of which the Constitution provides that a permanent record shall be kept:

And whereas the resolution of the 16th of July, 1837, and the act of the Secretary of the Senate in compliance with it, in legal contemplation destroyed, and in fact defaced, the record of the proceeding to which it refers: wherefore,

Resolved, That the resolution of the 16th of January, 1837, commonly called the expunging resolution, be, and the same is hereby, rescinded, and shall be forever hereafter held as naught; and that, in all future publications of that portion of the Journal which contains the resolution of 1833-'4, and in all copies which may hereafter be made of the same for any official or legal purpose, the said resolution of 1833-'4 shall be published and copied as it was originally entered on the said Journal, without any notice whatever of the superscription which was erroneously made, in pursuance of the resolution of the 16th of January, 1837.

The resolution was then ordered to be printed.

On motion by Mr. BAYARD, it was ordered that, when the Senate adjourn, it adjourn till Monday next.

JUDGES OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. TAPPAN gave notice that he would, on Monday next, ask leave to introduce a resolution, proposing to amend the Constitution of the United States, in relation to the appointment of judges of the United States courts.

On motion, the Senate then adjourned till Monday next.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, December 8, 1842.

Mr. TALIAFERRO offered the following resolution, which was considered and adopted:

Resolved, That the several memorials, petitions, and resolutions presented to the House of Representatives, during the present Congress, which have not been finally acted on; also, all bills which went from this House to the Senate, and which were lost there; and such bills as were referred to the several committees of this House, and not reported on; be again referred to the committee to which the same were heretofore referred, as soon as the said committees shall be organized—a written request to that effect being handed by any member to the Clerk, whose duty it shall be to enter the same in the journal, as if presented in the House.

ABOLITION.

The resolution submitted by Mr. ADAMS, to rescind the 21st rule, so as to admit the reception of abolition petitions, resolutions, &c., on which the previous question had been moved and seconded, came up as the first business in order.

Mr. JOHN W. JONES moved to lay it on the table; and called for the yeas and nays on the question; which were ordered, and resulted in yeas 92, nays 95, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Arrington, Atherton, Barton, Beeson, Bidlack, Bowne, Boyd, Charles Brown, Burke, William Butler, Green W. Caldwell, Patrick C. Caldwell, Thomas J. Campbell, Casey, Clifford, Clinton, Mark A. Cooper, Cross, Daniel, Dawson, Dean, Deberry, Eastman, John C. Edwards, Charles A. Floyd, Fornance, Gamble, Gerry, Gilmer, Goggin, William O. Goode, Harris, Hastings, Hays, Hopkins, Houck, Houston, Hubbard, Hunter, Charles J. Ingersoll, Jack, Wm. Cost Johnson, Cave Johnson, John W. Jones, Isaac D. Jones, Keim, John P. Kennedy, Abraham McClellan, McKay, Mallory, Marchand, Matthews, Medill, Meriwether, Miller, Mitchell, Moore, Newhard, Owsley, Payne, Pearce, Pickens, Plumer, Powell, Rayner, Reding, Rencher, Reynolds, Rhett, Riggs, Rogers, Saunders, Shepperd, William Smith, Snyder, Sprigg, Steenrod, Summers, Sweney, Taliaferro, John B. Thompson, Richard W. Thompson, Triplett, Turney, Van Buren, Ward, Warren, Washington, Watterson, Weller, Westbrook, Wise, and Wood—92.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Allen, Sherlock J. Andrews, Aycrigg, Babcock, Baker, Barnard, Birdseye, Blair, Boardman, Borden, Botts, Brewster, Briggs, Brockway, Bronson, Jeremiah Brown, Burnell, Calhoun, Childs, Chittenden, John C. Clark, Staley N. Clarke, James Cooper, Cowen, Cranston, Cushing, Garrett Davis, Richard D. Davis, John Edwards, Egbert, Everett, Fessenden, Fillmore, John G. Floyd, A. Lawrence Foster, Giddings, Patrick G. Goode, Gordon, Granger, Hall, Halsted, Henry, Howard, Hudson, Joseph R. Ingersoll, James Irvin, William W. Irwin, James, Linn, Littlefield, Lowell, Robert McClellan, McKennan, McKeon, Alfred Marshall, Samson Mason, Mathiot, Mattocks, Maxwell, Maynard, Morgan, Morris, Morrow, Osborne, Parmenter, Patridge, Pendleton, Ramsay, Benjamin Randall, Randolph, Ridgway, Rodney, Roosevelt, Wm. Russell, James M. Russell, Saltonstall, Sanford, Simonton, Slade, Truman Smith, Stanly, Stokely, Stratton, Tillinghast, Toland, Tomlinson, Trumbull, Underwood, Van Rensselaer, Joseph L. White, Thomas W. Williams, Winthrop, Yorke, and A. Young—95.

So the House refused to lay the resolution on the table.

The question then recurring, "Shall the main question be now put?"

Mr. UNDERWOOD renewed the point of order raised by him yesterday; and contended that, although the effect of the second to the previous question was to put an end to debate, yet the refusal of the House to order the main question to be put, authorized debate after the next day. He understood from the Manual, that the decision of the House refusing to order the main question to be put, carried the question over to the next day; but, when that day came, if the main question was not ordered, the second was imperative. If the decision of the Chair was correct, the House might go on, from day to day, refusing to lay the resolution on the table, and refusing to order the main question to be put; and thus the question would never be settled. Certainly, a construction of the rules leading to such consequences could not be correct. It had been suggested by some one behind him, that the difficulty could be obviated by reconsidering the question; and he therefore hoped that some gentleman who voted with the majority would move a reconsideration.

The SPEAKER reaffirmed his decision, and pointed out two authorities, which he read to the House, sustaining his decision.

Mr. EVERETT suggested to the gentleman from Kentucky to take an appeal from the decision of the Chair; stating that, if the gentleman did not appeal, he would appeal himself. [Mr. UNDERWOOD said that he would take an appeal, in order to try the sense of the House on the subject.] Neither of the cases read by the Chair, Mr. E. said, gave the decision of the Speaker or of the House on the question now at issue; in both cases, the difficulty having been got over by the members moving a reconsideration, instead of taking an appeal. The error of the Chair seemed to him to consist in this: that he took the second to the previous question for the order of the House. By the parliamentary law, the previous question could be seconded by a single member; and under the rules of the House, it required a majority for a second; but in both cases it was only a second, and not the order of the House. He contended, therefore, that when the question fell, the second fell with it. It was now too late to move the reconsideration, and the first question to be put would be on ordering the main question. If that should be lost, the House would be just where it was the day before; and so they might thus go on from day to day, refusing to lay the resolution on the table, and refusing to order the main question to be taken. Mr. E. concluded by appealing from the decision of the Chair.

After some remarks from Mr. BRIGGS, and a reply by the CHAIR, neither of which were distinctly understood by the reporter,

Mr. BRIGGS was proceeding with his remarks, when

Mr. TURNEY called him to order, on the ground that the appeal was not debatable.

Mr. J. R. INGERSOLL referred to some authorities sustaining the decision of the Chair.

Mr. TURNEY objected to debate on the appeal, and moved to lay it on the table; which motion was carried without a division.

The question was then taken on ordering the main question, and decided in the negative—yeas 95, nays 100, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Allen, Sherlock J. Andrews, Aycrigg, Babcock, Baker, Barnard, Birdseye, Blair, Boardman, Borden, Botts, Briggs, Brockway, Bronson, Jeremiah Brown-

ary, the navigation of said river shall be free and open to both parties, and shall in no way be obstructed by either: that all the produce of the forest, in logs, lumber, timber, boards, staves, or shingles, or of agriculture not being manufactured, grown on any of those parts of the State of Maine watered by the river St. John, or by its tributaries, (of which fact reasonable evidence shall, if required, be produced,) shall have free access into and through the said river and its said tributaries, having their source within the State of Maine, to and from the seaport at the mouth of the said river St. John, and to and round the falls of said river, either by boats, rafts, or other conveyance; that when within the Province of New Brunswick, the said produce shall be dealt with as if it were the produce of the said Province: that, in like manner, the inhabitants of the territory of the Upper St. John, determined by this treaty to belong to her Britannic Majesty, shall have free access to and through the river for their produce, in those parts where the said river runs wholly through the State of Maine: Provided, always, That this agreement shall give no right to either party to interfere with any regulations not inconsistent with the terms of this treaty, which the Governments, respectively, of Maine or of New Brunswick may make respecting the navigation of the said river, when both banks thereof shall belong to the same party.

ARTICLE IV.

All grants of land heretofore made by either party, within the limits of the territory which by this treaty falls within the dominions of the other party, shall be held valid, ratified, and confirmed to the persons in possession under such grants, to the same extent as if such territory had by this treaty fallen within the dominions of the party by whom such grants were made; and all equitable possessory claims, arising from a possession and improvement of any lot or parcel of land by the person actually in possession, or by those under whom such person claims, for more than six years before the date of this treaty, shall, in like manner, be deemed valid, and be confirmed and quieted by a release to the person entitled thereto, of the title to such lot or parcel of land, so described as best to include the improvements made thereon; and in all other respects the two contracting parties agree to deal upon the most liberal principles of equity with the settlers actually dwelling upon the territory falling to them, respectively, which has heretofore been in dispute between them.

ARTICLE V.

Whereas, in the course of the controversy respecting the disputed territory on the Northeastern boundary, some moneys have been received by the authorities of her Britannic Majesty's Province of New Brunswick, with the intention of preventing depredations on the forests of the said territory, which moneys were to be carried to a fund called the "disputed territory fund," the proceeds whereof it was agreed should be hereafter paid over to the parties interested, in the proportions to be determined by a final settlement of boundaries: It is hereby agreed, that a correct account of all receipts and payments on the said fund shall be delivered to the Government of the United States, within six months after the ratification of this treaty, and the proportion of the amount due thereon to the States of Maine and Massachusetts, and any bonds or securities appertaining thereto, shall be paid and delivered over to the Government of the United States; and the Government of the United States agrees to receive for the use of, and pay over to, the States of Maine and Massachusetts, their respective portions of said fund; and further to pay and satisfy said States, respectively, for all claims for expenses incurred by them in protecting the said heretofore disputed territory, and making a survey thereof in 1838; the Government of the United States agreeing with the States of Maine and Massachusetts to pay them the further sum of three hundred thousand dollars, in equal moieties, on account of their assent to the line of boundary described in this treaty, and in consideration of the conditions and equivalents received therefor from the Government of her Britannic Majesty.

ARTICLE VI.

It is furthermore understood and agreed, that, for the purpose of running and tracing those parts of the line between the source of the St. Croix and the St. Lawrence river, which will require to be run and ascertained, and for marking the residue of said line by proper monuments on the land, two commissioners shall be appointed—one by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof, and one by her Britannic Majesty; and the said commissioners shall meet at Bangor, in the State of Maine, on the 1st day of May next, or as soon thereafter as may be, and shall proceed to mark the line above described, from the source of the St. Croix to the river St. John; and shall trace on proper maps the dividing line along said river, and along the river St. Francis, to the outlet of the Lake Pohenagamook; and from the outlet of the said lake, they shall ascertain, fix, and mark, by proper and durable monuments upon the land, the line described in the first article of this treaty; and the said commissioners shall make to each of their respective Governments a joint report or declaration, under their hands and seals, designating such line of boundary, and shall accompany said report or declaration with maps, certified by them to be true maps of the new boundary.

ARTICLE VII.

It is further agreed, that the channels in the river St. Lawrence, on both sides of the Long Sault Islands, and of Barnhart Island; the channels in the river Detroit, on both sides of the Island Bois Blanc, and between that island and both the American and Canadian shores; and all the several channels and passages between the various islands lying near the junction of the river St. Clair with the lake of that name, shall be equally free and open to the ships, vessels, and boats of both parties.

ARTICLE VIII.

The parties mutually stipulate that each shall prepare, equip, and maintain in service, on the coast of Africa, a sufficient and adequate squadron, or naval force of vessels, of suitable numbers and description, to carry in all not less than eighty guns, to enforce separately and respectively the laws, rights, and obligations of each of the two countries for the suppression of the slave-trade; the said squadrons to be independent of each other, but the two Governments stipulating, nevertheless, to give such orders to the officers commanding their respective forces as shall enable them most effectually to act in concert and co-operation, upon mutual consultation, as exigencies may arise, for the attainment of the true object of this article: copies of all such orders to be communicated by each Government to the other, respectively.

ARTICLE IX.

Whereas, notwithstanding all efforts which may be made on the coast of Africa for suppressing the slave-trade, the facilities for carrying on that traffic, and avoiding the vigilance of cruisers, by the fraudulent use of flags, and other means, are so great, and the temptations for pursuing it, while a market can be found for slaves, so strong, as that the desired result may be long delayed, unless all markets be shut against the purchase of African negroes,—the parties to this treaty agree that they will unite in all becoming representations and remonstrances with any and all powers within whose dominions such markets are allowed to exist; and that they will urge upon all such powers the propriety and duty of closing such markets at once and forever.

ARTICLE X.

It is agreed that the United States and her Britannic Majesty shall, upon mutual requisitions by them, or their ministers, officers, or authorities, respectively made, deliver up to justice all persons who, being charged with the crime of murder, or assault with intent to commit murder, or piracy, or arson, or robbery, or forgery, or the utterance of forged papers, committed within the jurisdiction of either, shall seek an asylum, or shall be found, within the territories of the other: provided, that this shall only be done upon such evidence of criminality as, according to the laws of the place where the fugitive or person so charged shall be found, would justify his apprehension and commitment for trial, if the crime or offence had there been committed; and the respective judges and other magistrates of the two Governments shall have power, jurisdiction, and authority, upon complaint made under oath, to issue a warrant for the apprehension of the fugitive or person so charged, that he may be brought before such judges or other magistrates, respectively, to the end that the evidence of criminality may be heard and considered; and if, on such hearing, the evidence be deemed sufficient to sustain the charge, it shall be the duty of the examining judge or magistrate to certify the same to the proper executive authority, that a warrant may issue for the surrender of such fugitive. The expense of such apprehension and delivery shall be borne and defrayed by the party who makes the requisition, and receives the fugitive.

ARTICLE XI.

The eighth article of this treaty shall be in force for five years from the date of the exchange of the ratifications, and afterwards, until one or the other party shall signify a wish to terminate it. The tenth article shall continue in force until one or the other of the parties shall signify its wish to terminate it, and no longer.

ARTICLE XII.

The present treaty shall be duly ratified, and the mutual exchange of ratifications shall take place in London, within six months from the date hereof, or earlier if possible.

In faith whereof, we, the respective plenipotentiaries, have signed this treaty, and have hereunto affixed our seals.

Done in duplicate, at Washington, the ninth day of August, anno Domini one thousand eight hundred and forty-two.

DANIEL WEBSTER, [SEAL.]
ASHBURTON, [SEAL.]

And whereas, the said treaty has been duly ratified on both parts, and the respective ratifications of the same having been exchanged, to wit: at London, on the thirteenth day of October, one thousand eight hundred and forty-two, by EDWARD EVERETT, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States, and the right honorable the Earl of ABERDEEN, her Britannic Majesty's principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, on the part of their respective Governments:

Now, therefore, be it known, that I, JOHN TYLER, President of the United States of America, have caused the said treaty to be made public, to the end that the same, and every clause and article thereof, may be observed and fulfilled with good faith by the United States, and the citizens thereof.

In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done at the city of Washington, this tenth day of November, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and forty-two, and [L. S.] of the independence of the United States the sixty-seventh.

JOHN TYLER.

By the President:
DANIEL WEBSTER, Secretary of State.

TWENTY-SEVENTH CONGRESS

THIRD SESSION.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, December 5, 1842.

This being the day set apart by the Constitution of the United States for the annual meeting of Congress,

The PRESIDENT pro tem (Mr. MANGUM) took the chair, and called the Senate to order at the hour of 12 o'clock. He stated that he had been informed by the sergeant-at-arms that there was not a quorum of the Senators present.

Mr. HUNTINGTON observed, that that being the case, it was apparent that no business could be transacted to-day; he therefore moved that the Senate adjourn till to-morrow at 12 o'clock.

The question was put, and carried in the affirmative; and the Senate accordingly adjourned.

The following Senators appeared in their seats, viz:

From Maine.—Messrs. Williams and Evans.

From New Hampshire.—Messrs. Woodbury and Wilcox.

From Massachusetts.—Mr. Bates.

From Connecticut.—Mr. Huntington.

From Vermont.—Mr. Crafts.

From Louisiana.—Mr. John B. Dawson.

From Indiana.—Messrs. Richard W. Thompson and Joseph L. White.

From Illinois.—Messrs. Zadok Casey and John Reynolds.

From Alabama—Mr. Reuben Chapman.

From Missouri.—Messrs. John C. Edwards and John Miller.

On motion by Mr. CUSHING,

Ordered, That a message be sent to the Senate, informing that body that a quorum of the House had assembled, and were ready to proceed to business.

Mr. CUSHING submitted the usual joint resolution for the appointment of a joint committee to wait on the President of the United States, and inform him that a quorum of the two Houses of Congress had assembled, and were ready to receive any communication he might make.

The resolution having been adopted, Messrs. CUSHING, KENNEDY of Maryland, and TILLINGHAST were appointed as the committee on the part of the House.

On motion by Mr. KENNEDY, he was excused from serving, on account of indisposition; and Mr. HUNT of New York was appointed in his place.

On motion by Mr. CUSHING,

Ordered, That the daily hour of the meeting of the House be at 12 o'clock noon, till further ordered.

Mr. EVERETT gave notice that he would, tomorrow, ask leave to introduce a bill to repeal the bankrupt law.

Mr. ADAMS gave notice that he would tomorrow offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the 21st rule for conducting business in this House, in the following words: "No petition, memorial, resolution, or other paper praying the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, or any State or Territory, or the slave-trade between the States or Territories of the United States in which it now exists, shall be received by this House, or entertained in any way whatever," be, and the same is hereby, rescinded.

Mr. WISE objected to the reception of the resolution.

The SPEAKER said it was only offered as a notice.

Mr. WISE inquired if this notice took precedence of the other orders of the House.

The SPEAKER replied that it did not.

Mr. WM. COST JOHNSON asked if it was susceptible of amendment.

The SPEAKER said that the resolution could be amended when it came properly before the House; at present, it was only offered in the shape of a notice.

Mr. BRIGGS offered a joint resolution providing for the appointment of two Chaplains of different denominations, one by each House, to serve during the session, and to interchange weekly: adopted.

On motion by Mr. BRIGGS, the usual order for the supply of members with newspapers was adopted.

Mr. TILLINGHAST asked leave to offer the following joint resolution:

Resolved, (the honorable Senate concurring herein,) That a joint committee of three members of this House, with a like number from the Senate, be appointed to direct and superintend the expenditure of all money appropriated for the purchase of books for the Library of Congress, and all such other matters pertaining to said library as are not otherwise provided for by law.

Mr. CHARLES BROWN suggested to the mover to strike out the word "honorable," as it was not usual in such resolutions: agreed to, and the resolution was adopted.

On motion of Mr. McKENNAN,

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, December 6, 1842.

The PRESIDENT pro. tem. took the chair at 12 o'clock, and stated that he had been informed by the Sergeant-at-arms that there was still no quorum present. Such being the fact,

On motion of Mr. KERR, the Senate adjourned till to-morrow morning at 12 o'clock.

Messrs. MOREHEAD and CRITTENDEN, of Kentucky, and Mr. SMITH, of Connecticut, appeared in their seats to-day, who, in addition to those announced on yesterday, made twenty-six Senators in attendance.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, December 6, 1842.

Mr. WM. COST JOHNSON gave notice that he would to-morrow, or at an early day thereafter, ask leave to introduce a bill entitled "An act for the relief of the several States and Territories of the United States and the District of Columbia."

Mr. HALSTED gave notice that he would to-morrow ask leave to introduce a bill entitled "An act regulating the taking of testimony in cases of contested elections."

On motion of Mr. WM. COST JOHNSON,

Ordered, That a select committee on a National Foundry be appointed by the Chair, to consist of the same number of members as composed the similar committee of the last session.

Mr. TALIAFERRO offered a resolution authorizing the door-keeper of the House to appoint an additional messenger; but, at the suggestion of Mr. HOPKINS, the resolution was laid over till to-morrow.

Mr. ADAMS submitted the following resolution, of which he gave notice yesterday:

Resolved, That the 21st rule for conducting business in this House, in the following words: "No petition, memorial, resolution, or other paper praying the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, or any State or Territory, or the slave-trade between the States or Territories of the United States in which it now exists, shall be received by this House, or entertained in any way whatever," be, and the same is hereby, rescinded.

Mr. WISE inquired if the resolution was in order?

The SPEAKER replied that it was; but he suggested to the gentleman from Massachusetts the probability of a debate arising on it, and that he had better let it lie over for the present.

Mr. WISE asked if there was not unfinished business on the calendar of the last session that took precedence of this resolution? There certainly was a vast deal of unfinished business; and, in his view, it had the precedence over all new business of this session.

Mr. ADAMS observed, that he offered the resolution now, because, by the rules of the House, the first thirty days of the session were allotted for the reception of petitions—a rule that had been observed since the commencement of the Government. This Government (Mr. A. said) was made for receiving the petitions of the people, and attending to their wants; and to deprive them of the right of presenting them was as unconstitutional as unjust. He made this motion now, because the first business to be transacted should be the attending to the petitions of the people; and there was a large class of petitions excluded by the rule he proposed to rescind, and that class coming from a particular section of the Union. He did not wish to debate his motion, but would be willing, if the House thought proper, to take the question on it now by yeas and nays. It was a duty he owed to his constituents, to endeavor to restore to them the constitutional rights of which they had been deprived.

Mr. WISE stated his point of order to be this: Under the rules of the House, the first business of the session was to call the States for petitions; petitions had priority and precedence; petitions were to be called for first, and the unfinished business of the last session must lie over for six days: but, if the House was ready to proceed to business, he contended that the Speaker could find much better business than the introduction of this everlasting subject of agitation, at this short session, when they ought to be entering on and disposing of the public business. If, then, petitions had priority, they would necessarily exclude the resolution of the gentleman from Massachusetts, if nothing else did; at all events, it did not come in of right. He

(Mr. WISE) objected to it yesterday, when the notice was given, and he repeated his objection today; and he supposed the question would be on the reception of the resolution. "Shall it be received?" was the question; and he contended that this required a majority of two-thirds.

A member was heard to observe that the question was on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. WISE. I contend that it is not received.

The SPEAKER made some observations, which were very indistinctly heard; but he was understood to say that the resolution came properly before the House, one day's notice having been given by the gentleman from Massachusetts, yesterday, as the rules prescribed. But he further observed that the committees were not appointed; and, therefore, if petitions were called for from the several States, they could not be referred.

Mr. WISE said he would suggest to the Speaker that the non appointment of the mere members of the committees was no reason why the States should not be called for petitions; for, if the members were not appointed, the committees were. The rules provided that there should be certain standing committees; and all a gentleman had to do, on presenting a petition, was to move that it be referred to a committee, and not to A, B, C, and D, constituting the committee. The committees, then, were in existence, though the members were not all there who were to be named on those committees; and they could refer petitions to day, when the members were not named by the Speaker, as well as to-morrow, or a future day, when they should be named.

Mr. WELLER moved that the resolution be laid on the table; and on that motion called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

The yeas and nays were taken, and resulted—yeas 85, nays 93, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Arrington, Atherton, Barton, Bidlack, Bowne, Boyd, Burke, William Butler, William O. Butler, Patrick C. Caldwell, Casey, Chapman, Clifford, Clinton, Coles, Mark A. Cooper, Daniel, Garrett Davis, Dawson, Dean, Deberry, Eastman, John C. Edwards, Charles A. Floyd, Fornance, Gerry, Gilmer, Goggin, Gustine, Harris, Hastings, Hays, Holmes, Hopkins, Houck, Houston, Hubard, Hunter, Charles J. Ingersoll, Jack, William Cost Johnson, John W. Jones, Keim, John P. Mr. EVERETT then rose and said, as it was important that this resolution should be decided upon, as it might otherwise affect the presentation of petitions, he would move the previous question.

The motion was seconded, and the next question in order was, "Shall the main question be now put?"

Mr. WISE inquired if it was in order, as the members were not all there, to move to postpone the question to a day certain.

The SPEAKER was understood to reply in the negative.

Mr. WISE said the Speaker had postponed the appointment of committees, on the ground that the members had not all arrived; and on the same ground he asked for a short postponement of this important subject. However, if his motion was not in order, he would call for the yeas and nays on the pending question—'Shall the main question be now put?"

The yeas and nays were ordered, and resulted—yeas 84, nays 99, as follows:

So the main question was not then put.

DEATH OF THE HON. J. W. WILLIAMS.

Mr. JOHN T. MASON rose to announce the death of the Hon. J. W. WILLIAMS of Maryland, and spoke as follows:

Mr. SPEAKER: I rise to announce the death of the Hon. JAMES W. WILLIAMS, a member of this House from the State of Maryland. Mr. WILLIAMS died suddenly, on the morning of the 21 inst., with a stroke of paralysis, which attacked him in his carriage while on his way to the seat of Government. Although he had been for a long time in feeble health, yet the very sudden and unexpected termination to which his disease finally came was well calculated to add new pangs to the grief of his family and friends, which, without that circumstance, would have been deep and poignant at the loss of a parent and husband so devoted, a friend so faithful, and a man so estimable. The profound and unaffected sorrow with which his neighbors and friends received the sad intelligence of his death, the undivided voice with which his many virtues are acknowledged by those with whom he has been associated here, and the confidence which has been reposed in him from time to time by the citizens of his State, constitute a more eloquent and effective encomium upon him than anything I can say. In one respect—perhaps in none other—it is well that I have been selected to pay this last tribute to the memory of the deceased. No one, perhaps, on this floor knew so well, and none could speak with the same knowledge, of those traits which characterized him, and which so exalted him in the estimation of the large circle of his acquaintance. During the whole time that I have been in public life—now four years—whether in our State Legislature, or as a member of this body, Mr. WILLIAMS has been associated with me. At first an adviser, and always a friend, I have had every opportunity of finding out his character, and of appreciating his worth. A more bland and amiable gentleman—a more upright man—a more faithful public servant—and a more sagacious statesman, I have never met with. The friendship and respect of all who knew him; the confidence of his neighbors; his frequent exaltation to responsible public stations; and the extraordinary verification of his prophecy of the civil revolution in Maryland in 1836, and of her present financial embarrassments—made long before any one else had the wisdom to foresee them—are all-abundant evidences of the truth of what I have said. On occasions like these, it is not unusual, I am aware, to pass high encomiums upon the character of the deceased—a mode of proceeding the less requisite in the present instance, as the character of Mr. WILLIAMS was too well established, and held in too high esteem, to have anything to hope from praise, or fear from censure. His mild and gentle spirit rendered it nearly impossible for him to have any enemies. The innocence and simplicity of his behavior, the sensibility of his heart, the fidelity with which he discharged the duties of life, the equanimity with which he bore its rebukes and sufferings, will leave a lasting impression on the minds of his friends and acquaintances.

We have just met to enter upon a new session; and the first thing almost that claims our attention—coming, as it were, as a message from the Executive on high, interrupting the salutations of friends, marring the pleasure of the occasion, and checking the ardor of our hopes—is another example, in the death of our friend, of the uncertainty of human life. It could not have come on a more fit occasion. We have entered upon a new portion of time, and such occasions are peculiarly favorable to moral reflection. On an entrance on a new scene, or a new period in our life, a contemplative mind will be naturally employed in estimating its acquisitions, comparing its improvements, retracing past occurrences, and revolving future prospects. The example of the deceased is not only before you for such a wholesome exercise of the mind; but to it may be added his voice, which may now be considered as addressing you from the tomb, and enjoining upon you the duty of preparation for another life. What an example of mortality is presented on the present occasion! Without the slightest warning, without the opportunity of a moment's immediate preparation, away from home, and alone, the destroyer met him—no tender assiduities of friendship, no well-known voice, no wife, nor son, nor daughter was near to soothe his sorrows or close his eyes in death. May this solemn event have a wide-spread influence. Instead of murmuring at such afflictive dispensations which separate us from those we love and esteem, let us employ them as motives to set our affections upon the more lasting things of another world—remembering that, whatever ties of affection are broken by death, whatever pleasures are lost to us here, are only taken from the enjoyments of time, to be added to those of eternity.

Mr. WILLIAMS was a native of Maryland, and was aged about fifty five years. He was for many years a prominent member of the Legislature of his State, and was at one time Speaker of the House of Delegates. During the whole time he was a member, he opposed with firmness and unabating zeal that system of internal improvements which has eventuated in overwhelming the State in endless taxation. Those who are now lamenting over what they regard the evils which that policy has brought upon them, will cherish in high respect his sagacity in predicting those evils, and the pertinacity with which he resisted the system which has entailed them on us. Those who still believe the policy to have been a wise one, must do him the justice to admit that his opposition to it was as honest as it was unyielding. In May, 1841, Mr. WILLIAMS was elected to Congress, and continued a member of this body up to the time of his death. Here, as he was in the Legislature of his State, he was vigilant and regular in his attendance upon his public duties.

In him the State of Maryland has lost a faithful public servant; his family a devoted and affectionate head; and his friends one who was always ready to make any sacrifice to advance their interests.

In conclusion, Mr. MASON offered the following resolutions, which were unanimously adopted:

Resolved, That this House have learned, with feelings of deep sensibility, the intelligence of the decease of the honorable JAMES W. WILLIAMS, late a member of this Congress; and as an evidence of the sympathy which the members entertain and hereby tender to his surviving relatives and personal friends, they will wear crape on the left arm for thirty days.

Resolved, also, (as a further mark of respect for the memory of the deceased,) that this House do now adjourn.

Ordered, That the Clerk communicate to the Senate information of the death of JAMES W. WILLIAMS, and of the proceedings of this House thereon.

The House then adjourned.

[We omitted to state, in our report of yesterday's proceedings, that the Hon. ROBERT C. WINTHROP, a Representative elect from the State of Massachusetts, to supply the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of the Hon. NATHAN APPLETON, appeared, was qualified, and took his seat.]

CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

PUBLISHED BY BLAIR AND RIVES, AT ONE DOLLAR PER SESSION, IN ADVANCE.

27TH CONG.....3D SESS. WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 14, 1842. VOLUME 12....No. 3.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, December 7, 1842.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. took the chair at 12 o'clock; and

The proceedings of the two former days being read,

Mr. HUNTINGTON presented the credentials of the Hon. SAMUEL C. CRAFT, Senator elected by the Legislature of Vermont, to fill the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of Judge PRENTISS which were read. Mr. C. was then qualified and took his seat.

Mr. MILLER presented the credentials of the Hon. WM. L. DAYTON, Senator elected by the Legislature of New Jersey, to fill the vacancy occasioned by the death of the Hon. SAMUEL L. SOUTHARD; which were read. Mr. D. was then qualified and took his seat.

On motion by Mr. HUNTINGTON, it was Ordered, That the Secretary of the Senate inform the House of Representatives that a quorum of the Senate have assembled, and are ready to proceed to business.

On motion by Mr. MERRICK, it was

Resolved, That each Senator be supplied daily, during the present session, with three copies of such daily newspapers as he may choose, provided that they be furnished at the usual rates of annual charge for a daily paper; and provided that any Senator thinking proper to take other than a daily paper, shall be entitled to so many such other papers as will be equal to three daily papers.

THE BANKRUPT LAW.

Mr. BENTON gave notice that he would, on to-morrow, ask leave to introduce a bill to repeal the bankrupt law.

BOARD OF EXCHEQUER.

Mr. TALLMADGE gave notice that he would, at an early day, ask leave to introduce a bill to modify the several acts establishing the Treasury of the United States.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, by MATTHEW ST. CLAIR CLARKE, their Clerk, informing the Senate that a quorum of that body had assembled, and were ready to proceed to legislative business; and also informing the Senate that they had passed a resolution, and appointed a committee under it, to join such committee as might be appointed on the part of the Senate, to wait on the President of the United States, and inform him that a quorum of the two Houses of Congress had assembled, and were ready to receive any communication he might make.

On motion of Mr. KERR, the above resolution was concurred in; and the Chair was authorized to appoint a committee of two on the part of the Senate; when Messrs. KERR and KING were appointed said committee.

After a short interval,

Mr. KERR, from the above committee, stated that the joint committee had waited upon the President, and informed him that a quorum of the two Houses had assembled, and were ready to receive from him such communication as he might think proper to submit to them; when the President directed them to inform their respective Houses that he would forthwith submit a message in writing. Thereupon

A message in writing was received from the President of the United States, by the hands of ROBERT TYLER, esq., his private secretary, which was read, as follows:

To the Senate and

House of Representatives of the United States:

We have continued reason to express our profound gratitude to the great Creator of all things for numberless benefits conferred upon us as a people. Blessed with genial seasons, the husbandman has his garners filled with abundance; and the necessaries of life, not to speak of its luxuries, abound in every direction. While in some other nations steady and industrious labor can hardly find the means of subsistence, the greatest evil which we have to encounter is a surplus of production beyond the home demand, which seeks, and with difficulty finds, a partial market in other regions. The health of the country, with partial exceptions, has, for the past year, been well preserved; and, under their free and wise institutions, the United States are rapidly advancing towards the consummation of the high destiny which an overruling Providence seems to have marked out for them. Exempt from domestic convulsion, and at peace with all the world, we are free to consult as to the best means of securing and advancing the happiness of the people. Such are the circumstances under which you now assemble in your respective chambers, and which should lead us to unite in praise and thanksgiving to that great Being who made us, and who preserves us as a nation.

I congratulate you, fellow-citizens, on the happy change in the aspect of our foreign affairs since my last annual Message. Causes of complaint at that time existed between the United States and Great Britain, which, attended by irritating circumstances, threatened most seriously the public peace. The difficulty of adjusting amicably the questions at issue between the two countries, was, in no small degree, augmented by the lapse of time since they had their origin. The opinions entertained by the Executive on several of the leading topics in dispute, were frankly set forth in the Message at the opening of your late session. The appointment of a special minister by Great Britain to the United States, with power to negotiate upon most of the points of difference, indicated a desire on her part amicably to adjust them; and that minister was met by the Executive in the same spirit which had dictated his mission. The treaty consequent thereon, having been duly ratified by the two Governments, a copy, together with the correspondence which accompanied it, is herewith communicated. I trust that, whilst you may see in it nothing objectionable, it may be the means of preserving, for an indefinite period, the amicable relations happily existing between the two Governments. The question of peace or war between the United States and Great Britain, is a question of the deepest interest, not only to themselves, but to the civilized world; since it is scarcely possible that a war could exist between them without endangering the peace of Christendom. The immediate effect of the treaty upon ourselves will be felt in the security afforded to mercantile enterprise, which, no longer apprehensive of interruption, adventures its speculations in the most distant sea; and, freighted with the diversified productions of every land, returns to bless our own. There is nothing in the treaty which, in the slightest degree, compromits the honor or dignity of either nation. Next to the settlement of the boundary line, which must always be a matter of difficulty between States as between individuals, the question which seemed to threaten the greatest embarrassment was that connected with the African slave-trade.

By the 10th article of the treaty of Ghent, it was expressly declared that "whereas the traffic in slaves is irreconcilable with the principles of humanity and justice; and whereas both his Majesty and the United States are desirous of continuing their efforts to promote its entire abolition; it is hereby agreed that both the contracting parties shall use their best endeavors to accomplish so desirable an object." In the enforcement of the laws and treaty stipulations of Great Britain, a practice had threatened to grow up, on the part of its cruisers, of subjecting to visitation ships sailing under the American flag, which, while it seriously involved our maritime rights, would subject to vexation a branch of our trade which was daily increasing, and which required the fostering care of the Government. And although Lord Aberdeen, in his correspondence with the American envoys, at London, expressly disclaimed all right to detain an American ship on the high seas, even if found with a cargo of slaves on board, and restricted the British pretension to a mere claim to visit and inquire; yet it could not well be discerned by the Executive of the United States how such visit and inquiry could be made without detention on the voyage, and consequent interruption to the trade. It was regarded as the right of search, presented only in a new form, and expressed in different words; and I therefore felt it to be my duty distinctly to declare, in my annual Message to Congress, that no such concession could be made, and that the United States had both the will and the ability to enforce their own laws, and to protect their flag from being used for purposes wholly forbidden by those laws, and obnoxious to the moral censure of the world. Taking the Message as his letter of instructions, our then Minister at Paris felt himself required to assume the same ground in a remonstrance which he felt it to be his duty to present to M. Guizot, and, through him, to the King of the French, against what has been called the Quintuple Treaty; and his conduct, in this respect, met with the approval of this Government. In close conformity with these views, the eighth article of the treaty was framed, which provides that "each nation shall keep afloat in the African seas a force of not less than eighty guns, to act separately and apart, under instructions from their respective Governments, and for the enforcement of their respective laws and obligations." From this it will be seen that the ground assumed in the Message has been fully maintained, at the same time that the stipulations of the treaty of Ghent are to be carried out in good faith by the two countries, and that all pretence is removed for interference with our commerce, for any purpose whatever, by a foreign Government. While, therefore, the United States have been standing up for the freedom of the seas, they have not thought proper to make that a pretext for avoiding a fulfilment of their treaty stipulations, or a ground for giving countenance to a trade reprobated by our laws. A similar arrangement by the other great powers could not fail to sweep from the ocean the slave-trade, without the interpolation of any new principle into the maritime code. We may be permitted to hope that the example thus set will be followed by some, if not all of them. We thereby also afford suitable protection to the fair trader in those seas; thus fulfilling at the same time the dictates of a sound policy, and complying with the claims of justice and humanity.

It would have furnished additional cause for congratulation, if the treaty could have embraced all subjects calculated in future to lead to a misunderstanding between the two Governments. The territory of the United States, commonly called the Oregon Territory, lying on the Pacific ocean, north of the forty-second degree of latitude, to a portion of which Great Britain lays claim, begins to attract the attention of our fellow-citizens; and the tide of population, which has reclaimed what was so lately an unbroken wilderness in more contiguous regions, is preparing to flow over those vast districts which stretch from the Rocky mountains to the Pacific ocean. In advance of the acquirement of individual rights to these lands, sound policy dictates that every effort should be resorted to by the two Governments to settle their respective claims. It became manifest, at an early hour of the late negotiations, that any attempt, for the time being, satisfactorily to determine those rights, would lead to a protracted discussion, which might embrace in its failure other more pressing matters; and the Executive did not regard it as proper to waive all the advantages of an honorable adjustment of other difficulties of great magnitude and importance, because this, not so immediately pressing, stood in the way. Although the difficulty referred to may not, for several years to come, involve the peace of the two countries, yet I shall not delay to urge on Great Britain the importance of its early settlement. Nor will other matters of commercial importance to the two countries be overlooked; and I have good reason to believe that it will comport with the policy of England, as it does with that of the United States, to seize upon this moment, when most of the causes of irritation have passed away, to cement the peace and amity of the two countries, by wisely removing all grounds of probable future collision.

With the other powers of Europe our relations continue on the most amicable footing. Treaties now existing with them should be rigidly observed; and every opportunity, compatible with the interests of the United States, should be seized upon to enlarge the basis of commercial intercourse. Peace with all the world is the true foundation of our policy, which can only be rendered permanent by the practice of equal and impartial justice to all. Our great desire should be to enter only into that rivalry which looks to the general good, in the cultivation of the sciences, the enlargement of the field for the exercise of the mechanical arts, and the spread of commerce (that great civilizer) to every land and sea. Carefully abstaining from interference in all questions exclusively referring themselves to the political interests of Europe, we may be permitted to hope an equal exemption from the interference of European Governments in what relates to the States of the American continent.

On the 23d of April last, the commissioners on the part of the United States, under the convention with the Mexican Republic of the 11th of April, 1839, made to the proper department a final report in relation to the proceedings of the commission. From this it appears that the total amount awarded to the claimants by the commissioners and the umpire appointed under that convention, was two million twenty-six thousand and seventy-nine dollars and sixty-eight cents. The arbiter having considered that his functions were required by the convention to terminate at the same time with those of the commissioners, returned to the board, undecided for want of time, claims which had been allowed by the American commissioners, to the amount of nine hundred and twenty-eight thousand six hundred and twenty dollars and eighty-eight cents. Other claims, in which the amount sought to be recovered was three million three hundred and thirty-six thousand eight hundred and thirty-seven dollars and five cents, were submitted to the board too late for its consideration. The Minister of the United States at Mexico has been duly authorized to make demand for the payment of the awards, according to the terms of the convention, and the provisions of the act of Congress of the 12th of June, 1840. He has also been instructed to communicate to that Government the expectations of the Government of the United States in relation to those claims which were not disposed of according to the provisions of the convention, and all others of citizens of the United States against the Mexican Government. He has also been furnished with other instructions, to be followed by him in case the Government of Mexico should not find itself in a condition to make present payment of the amount of the awards, in specie or its equivalent.

I am happy to be able to say that information which is esteemed favorable, both to a just satisfaction of the awards, and a reasonable provision for other claims, has been recently received from Mr. Thompson, the Minister of the United States, who has promptly and efficiently executed the instructions of his Government in regard to this important subject.

The citizens of the United States who accompanied the late Texan expedition to Santa Fé, and who were wrongfully taken and held as prisoners of war in Mexico, have all been liberated.

A correspondence has taken place between the Department of State and the Mexican Minister of Foreign Affairs, upon the complaint of Mexico that citizens of the United States were permitted to give aid to the inhabitants of Texas in the war existing between her and that republic. Copies of this correspondence are herewith communicated to Congress, together with copies of letters on the same subject, addressed to the diplomatic corps at Mexico, by the American Minister and the Mexican Secretary of State.

Mexico has thought proper to reciprocate the mission of the United States to that Government, by accrediting to this a minister of the same rank as that of the representative of the United States in Mexico. From the circumstances connected with this mission, favorable results are anticipated from it. It is so obviously for the interest of both countries, as neighbors and friends, that all just causes of mutual dissatisfaction should be removed, that it is to be hoped neither will omit or delay the employment of any practicable and honorable means to accomplish that end.

The affairs pending between this Government and several others of the States of this hemisphere formerly under the dominion of Spain, have again, within the past year, been materially obstructed by the military revolutions and conflicts in those countries.

The ratifications of the treaty between the United States and the Republic of Ecuador, of the 13th of June, 1839, have been exchanged, and that instrument has been duly promulgated on the part of this Government. Copies are now communicated to Congress, with a view to enable that body to make such changes in the laws applicable to our intercourse with that Republic as may be deemed requisite.

Provision has been made by the Government of Chili for the payment of the claim on account of the illegal detention of the brig Warrior at Coquimbo, in 1820. This Government has reason to expect that other claims of our citizens against Chili will be hastened to a final and satisfactory close.

The empire of Brazil has not been altogether exempt from those convulsions which so constantly afflict the neighboring republics. Disturbances which recently broke out are, however, now understood to be quieted. But these occurrences, by threatening the stability of the Governments, or by causing incessant and violent changes in them, or in the persons who administer them, tend greatly to retard provisions for a just indemnity for losses and injuries suffered by individual subjects or citizens of other States. The Government of the United States will feel it to be its duty, however, to consent to no delay, not unavoidable, in making satisfaction for wrongs and injuries sustained by its own citizens. Many years having, in some cases, elapsed, a decisive and effectual course of proceeding will be demanded of the respective Governments against whom claims have been preferred.

The vexatious, harassing, and expensive war which so long prevailed with the Indian tribes inhabiting the peninsula of Florida, has happily been terminated; whereby our army has been relieved from a service of the most disagreeable character, and the treasury from a large expenditure. Some casual outbreaks may occur, such as are incident to the close proximity of border settlers and the Indians; but these, as in all other cases, may be left to the care of the local authorities, aided, when occasion may require, by the forces of the United States. A sufficient number of troops will be maintained in Florida, so long as the remotest apprehensions of danger shall exist; yet their duties will be limited rather to the garrisoning of the necessary posts, than to the maintenance of active hostilities. It is to be hoped that a territory, so long retarded in its growth, will now speedily recover from the evils incident to a protracted war, exhibiting, in the increased amount of its rich productions, true evidences of returning wealth and prosperity. By the practice of rigid justice towards the numerous Indian tribes residing within our territorial limits, and the exercise of a parental vigilance over their interests, protecting them against fraud and intrusion, and at the same time using every proper expedient to introduce among them the arts of civilized life, we may fondly hope not only to wean them from their love for war, but to inspire them with a love for peace and all its avocations. With several of the tribes, great progress in civilizing them has already been made. The schoolmaster and the missionary are found side by side; and the remnants of what were once numerous and powerful nations may yet be preserved as the builders up of a new name for themselves and their posterity.

The balance in the treasury on the 1st of January, 1842, (exclusive of the amount deposited with the States, trust funds, and indemnities,) was $230,483 68. The receipts into the treasury during the first three quarters of the present year, from all sources, amount to $26,616,593 78; of which more than fourteen millions were received from customs, and about one million from the public lands. The receipts for the fourth quarter are estimated at nearly eight millions; of which four millions are expected from customs, and three millions and a half from loans and treasury notes. The expenditures of the first three quarters of the present year exceed twenty-six millions, and those estimated for the fourth quarter amount to about eight millions; and it is anticipated there will be a deficiency of half a million on the 1st January next; but that the amount of outstanding warrants (estimated at $800,000) will leave an actual balance of about $224,000 in the treasury. Among the expenditures of the year, are more than eight millions for the public debt, and $600,000 on account of the distribution to the States of the proceeds of sales of the public lands.

The present tariff of duties was somewhat hastily and hurriedly passed near the close of the late session of Congress. That it should have defects, can, therefore, be surprising to no one. To remedy such defects as may be found to exist in many of its numerous provisions, will not fail to claim your serious attention. It may well merit inquiry, whether the exaction of all duties in cash does not call for the introduction of a system which has proved highly beneficial in countries where it has been adopted. I refer to the warehousing system. The first and most prominent effect which it would produce, would be to protect the market alike against redundant or deficient supplies of foreign fabrics; both of which, in the long run, are injurious as well to the manufacturer as to the importer. The quantity of goods in store being at all times readily known, it would enable the importer, with an approach to accuracy, to ascertain the actual wants of the market, and to regulate himself accordingly. If, however, he should fall into error, by importing an excess above the public wants, he could readily correct its evils by availing himself of the benefits and advantages of the system thus established. In the storehouse, the goods imported would await the demands of the market; and their issues would be governed by the fixed principles of demand and supply. Thus an approximation would be made to a steadiness and uniformity of price, which, if attainable, would conduce to the decided advantage of mercantile and mechanical operations.

The apprehension may be well entertained, that, without something to ameliorate the rigor of cash payments, the entire import trade may fall into the hands of a few wealthy capitalists in this country and in Europe. The small importer, who requires all the money he can raise for investments abroad, and who can but ill afford to pay the lowest duty, would have to subduct in advance a portion of his funds, in order to pay the duties, and would lose the interest upon the amount thus paid for all the time the goods might remain unsold; which might absorb his profits. The rich capitalist abroad, as well as at home, would thus possess, after a short time, an almost exclusive monopoly of the import trade; and laws designed for the benefit of all, would thus operate for the benefit of the few—a result wholly uncongenial with the spirit of our institutions, and anti-republican in all its tendencies. The warehousing system would enable the importer to watch the market, and to select his own time for offering his goods for sale. A profitable portion of the carrying trade in articles entered for the benefit of drawback, must also be most seriously affected, without the adoption of some expedient to relieve the cash system. The warehousing system would afford that relief, since the carrier would have a safe recourse to the public storehouses, and might, without advancing the duty, reship within some reasonable period to foreign ports. A further effect of the measure would be to supersede the system of drawbacks, thereby effectually protecting the Government against fraud, as the right of debenture would not attach to goods after their withdrawal from the public stores.

In revising the existing tariff of duties, should you deem it proper to do so at your present session, I can only repeat the suggestions and recommendations which, upon several occasions, I have heretofore felt it to be my duty to offer to Congress. The great primary and controlling interest of the American people is union; union, not only in the mere forms of government—forms which may be broken—but union founded in an attachment of States and individuals for each other. This union in sentiment and feeling can only be preserved by the adoption of that course of policy which, neither giving exclusive benefits to some, nor imposing unnecessary burdens upon others, shall consult the interests of all, by pursuing a course of moderation, and thereby seeking to harmonize public opinion, and causing the people everywhere to feel and to know that the Government is careful of the interests of all alike. Nor is there any subject in regard to which moderation, connected with a wise discrimination, is more necessary than in the imposition of duties on imports. Whether reference be had to revenue—the primary object in the imposition of taxes—or to the incidents which necessarily flow from their imposition, this is entirely true. Extravagant duties defeat their end and object, not only by exciting in the public mind an hostility to the manufacturing interests, but by inducing a system of smuggling on an extensive scale, and the practice of every manner of fraud upon the revenue, which the utmost vigilance of Government cannot effectually suppress. An opposite course of policy would be attended by results essentially different, of which every interest of society—and none more than those of the manufacturer—would reap important advantages. Among the most striking of its benefits would be that derived from the general acquiescence of the country in its support, and the consequent permanency and stability which would be given to all the operations of industry. It cannot be too often repeated, that no system of legislation can be wise, which is fluctuating and uncertain. No interest can thrive under it. The prudent capitalist will never adventure his capital in manufacturing establishments, or in any other leading pursuit of life, if there exists a state of uncertainty as to whether the Government will repeal to-morrow what it has enacted to-day. Fitful profits, however high, if threatened with a ruinous reduction by a vacillating policy on the part of Government, will scarcely tempt him to trust the money which he has acquired by a life of labor upon the uncertain adventure. I, therefore, in the spirit of conciliation, and influenced by no other desire than to rescue the great interests of the country from the vortex of political contention, and in the discharge of the high and solemn duties of the place which I now occupy, recommend moderate duties, imposed with a wise discrimination as to their several objects, as being not only most likely to be durable, but most advantageous to every interest of society.

The report of the Secretary of the War Department exhibits a very full and satisfactory account of the various and important interests committed to the charge of that officer. It is particularly gratifying to find that the expenditures for the military service are greatly reduced in amount; that a strict system of economy has been introduced into the service, and the abuses of past years greatly reformed. The fortifications on our maritime frontier have been prosecuted with much vigor, and at many points our defences are in a very considerable state of forwardness. The suggestions in reference to the establishment of means of communication with our territories on the Pacific, and to the surveys so essential to a knowledge of the resources of the intermediate country, are entitled to the most favorable consideration. While I would propose nothing inconsistent with friendly negotiations to settle the extent of our claims in that region, yet a prudent forecast points out the necessity of such measures as may enable us to maintain our rights. The arrangements made for preserving our neutral relations on the boundary between us and Texas, and keeping in check the Indians in that quarter, will be maintained so long as circumstances may require.

For several years angry contentions have grown out of the disposition directed by law to be made of the mineral lands held by the Government in several of the States. The Government is constituted the landlord, and the citizens of the States wherein lie the lands are its tenants. The relation is an unwise one; and it would be much more conducive to the public interest that a sale of the lands should be made, than that they should remain in their present condition. The supply of the ore would be more abundantly and certainly furnished when to be drawn from the enterprise and the industry of the proprietor, than under the present system.

The recommendations of the Secretary in regard to the improvements of the Western waters, and certain prominent harbors on the lakes, merit, and I doubt not will receive, your serious attention. The great importance of these subjects to the prosperity of the extensive region referred to, and the security of the whole country in time of war, cannot escape observation. The losses of life and property which annually occur in the navigation of the Mississippi alone, because of the dangerous obstructions in the river, make a loud demand upon Congress for the adoption of efficient measures for their removal.

The report of the Secretary of the Navy will bring you acquainted with that important branch of the public defences. Considering the already vast and daily increasing commerce of the country, apart from the exposure to hostile inroad of an extended seaboard, all that relates to the navy is calculated to excite particular attention. Whatever tends to add to its efficiency, without entailing unnecessary charges upon the treasury, is well worthy of your serious consideration. It will be seen, that while an appropriation exceeding by more than a million the appropriations of the present year, is asked by the Secretary, yet that, in this sum, is proposed to be included $100,000 for the purchase of clothing, which, when once expended, will be annually reimbursed by the sale of the clothes, and will thus constitute a perpetual fund, without any new appropriation to the same object. To this may also be added $50,000 asked to cover the arrearages of past years, and $250,000 in order to maintain a competent squadron on the coast of Africa; all of which, when deducted, will reduce the expenditures nearly within the limits of those of the current year. While, however, the expenditures will thus remain very nearly the same as of the antecedent year, it is proposed to add greatly to the operations of the marine, and, in lieu of only twenty-five ships in commission, and but little in the way of building, to keep, with the same expenditure, forty-one vessels afloat, and to build twelve ships of a small class.

A strict system of accountability is established, and great pains are taken to insure industry, fidelity, and economy in every department of duty. Experiments have been instituted to test the quality of various materials, (particularly copper, iron, and coal,) so as to prevent fraud and imposition.

It will appear by the report of the Postmaster General, that the great point which, for several years, has been so much desired, has, during the current year, been fully accomplished. The expenditures of the department for the current year have been brought within its income, without lessening its general usefulness. There has been an increase of revenue equal to $166,000 for the year 1842 over that of 1841, without, as it is believed, any addition having been made to the number of letters and newspapers transmitted through the mails. The Post Office laws have been honestly administered, and fidelity has been observed in accounting for, and paying over by the subordinates of the department, the moneys which have been received. For the details of the service, I refer you to the report.

I flatter myself that the exhibition thus made of the condition of the public administration will serve to convince you that every proper attention has been paid to the interests of the country by those who have been called to the heads of the different departments. The reduction in the annual expenditures of the Government already accomplished, furnishes a sure evidence that economy in the application of the public moneys is regarded as a paramount duty.

At peace with all the world—the personal liberty of the citizen sacredly maintained; and his rights secured under political institutions deriving all their authority from the direct sanction of the people—with a soil fertile almost beyond example, and a country blessed with every diversity of climate and production, what remains to be done in order to advance the happiness and prosperity of such a people? Under ordinary circumstances, this inquiry could readily be answered. The best that probably could be done for a people inhabiting such a country, would be to fortify their peace and security in the prosecution of their various pursuits, by guarding them against invasion from without, and violence from within. The rest, for the greater part, might be left to their own energy and enterprise. The chief embarrassments which, at the moment, exhibit themselves, have arisen from over-action; and the most difficult task which remains to be accomplished is that of correcting and overcoming its effects. Between the years 1833 and 1838, additions were made to bank capital and bank issues, in the form of notes designed for circulation, to an extent enormously great. The question seemed to be, not how the best currency could be provided, but in what manner the greatest amount of bank paper could be put in circulation. Thus, a vast amount of what was called money—since, for the time being, it answered the purposes of money—was thrown upon the country; an over-issue which was attended, as a necessary consequence, by an extravagant increase of the prices of all articles of property, the spread of a speculative mania all over the country, and has finally ended in a general indebtedness on the part of States and individuals, the prostration of public and private credit, a depreciation in the market value of real and personal estate, and has left large districts of country almost entirely without any circulating medium. In view of the fact that, in 1830, the whole bank-note circulation within the United States amounted to but $61,323,898, according to the Treasury statements, and that an addition had been made thereto of the enormous sum of $88,000,000 in seven years, (the circulation on the 1st January, 1837, being stated at $149,185,890,) aided by the great facilities afforded in obtaining loans from European capitalists, who were seized with the same speculative mania which prevailed in the United States—and the large importations of funds from abroad, the result of stock sales and loans—no one can be surprised at the apparent, but unsubstantial, state of prosperity which everywhere prevailed over the land; and while little cause of surprise should be felt at the present prostration of everything, and the ruin which has befallen so many of our fellow-citizens in the sudden withdrawal from circulation of so large an amount of bank issues since 1837—exceeding, as is believed, the amount added to the paper currency for a similar period antecedent to 1837—it ceases to be a matter of astonishment that such extensive shipwreck should have been made of private fortunes, or that difficulties should exist in meeting their engagements on the part of the debtor States. Apart from which, if there be taken into account the immense losses sustained in the dishonor of numerous banks, it is less a matter of surprise that insolvency should have visited many of our fellow-citizens, than that so many should have escaped the blighting influences of the times.

In the solemn conviction of these truths, and with an ardent desire to meet the pressing necessities of the country, I felt it to be my duty to cause to be submitted to you, at the commencement of your late session, the plan of an Exchequer; the whole power and duty of maintaining which, in purity and vigor, was to be exercised by the Representatives of the people and of the States, and, therefore, virtually by the people themselves. It was proposed to place it under the control and direction of a treasury board, to consist of three commissioners, whose duty it should be to see that the law of its creation was faithfully executed; and that the great end of supplying a paper medium of exchange, at all times convertible into gold and silver, should be attained. The board, thus constituted, was given as much permanency as could be imparted to it, without endangering the proper share of responsibility which should attach to all public agents. In order to insure all the advantages of a well-matured experience, the commissioners were to hold their offices for the respective periods of two, four, and six years; thereby securing, at all times, in the management of the Exchequer, the services of two men of experience; and to place them in a condition to exercise perfect independence of mind and action, it was provided that their removal should only take place for actual incapacity or infidelity to the trust, and to be followed by the President with an exposition of the causes of such removal, should it occur. It was proposed to establish subordinate boards in each of the States, under the same restrictions and limitations of the power of removal, which, with the central board, should receive, safely keep, and disburse the public moneys; and in order to furnish a sound paper medium of exchange, the Exchequer should retain of the revenues of the Government a sum not to exceed $5,000,000 in specie, to be set apart as required by its operations, and to pay the public creditor, at his own option, either in specie, or treasury notes of denominations not less than five, nor exceeding one hundred dollars; which notes should be redeemed at the several places of issue, and to be receivable at all times and everywhere in payment of Government dues; with a restraint upon such issue of bills, that the same should not exceed the maximum of $15,000,000. In order to guard against all the hazards incident to fluctuations in trade, the Secretary of the Treasury was invested with authority to issue $5,000,000 of Government stock, should the same at any time be regarded as necessary, in order to place beyond hazard the prompt redemption of the bills which might be thrown into circulation: thus, in fact, making the issue of $15,000,000 of exchequer bills rest substantially on $10,000,000; and keeping in circulation never more than one and one-half dollar for every dollar in specie. When to this it is added that the bills are not only everywhere receivable in Government dues, but that the Government itself would be bound for their ultimate redemption, no rational doubt can exist that the paper which the Exchequer would furnish would readily enter into general circulation, and be maintained at all times at or above par with gold and silver; thereby realizing the great want of the age, and fulfilling the wishes of the people. In order to reimburse the Government the expenses of the plan, it was proposed to invest the Exchequer with the limited authority to deal in bills of exchange, (unless prohibited by the State in which an agency might be situated,) having only thirty days to run, and resting on a fair and bona fide basis. The legislative will on this point might be so plainly announced, as to avoid all pretext for partiality or favoritism. It was furthermore proposed to invest this Treasury agent with authority to receive on deposite, to a limited amount, the specie funds of individuals, and to grant certificates therefor, to be redeemed on presentation, under the idea (which is believed to be well founded) that such certificates would come in aid of the exchequer bills in supplying a safe and ample paper circulation. Or, if in place of the contemplated dealings in exchange, the Exchequer should be authorized not only to exchange its bills for actual deposites of specie, but for specie or its equivalents to sell drafts, charging therefor a small but reasonable premium, I cannot doubt but that the benefits of the law would be speedily manifested in the revival of the credit, trade, and business of the whole country. Entertaining this opinion, it becomes my duty to urge its adoption upon Congress, by reference to the strongest considerations of the public interests, with such alterations in its details as Congress may in its wisdom see fit to make.

I am well aware that this proposed alteration and amendment of the laws establishing the Treasury Department has encountered various objections; and that, among others, it has been proclaimed a Government bank of fearful and dangerous import. It is proposed to confer upon it no extraordinary powers. It purports to do no more than pay the debts of the Government with the redeemable paper of the Government; in which respect, it accomplishes precisely what the Treasury does daily at this time—in issuing to the public creditors the treasury notes, which, under law, it is authorized to issue. It has no resemblance to an ordinary bank, as it furnishes no profits to private stockholders, and lends no capital to individuals. If it be objected to as a Government bank, and the objection be available, then should all the laws in relation to the Treasury be repealed, and the capacity of the Government to collect what is due to it, or pay what it owes, be abrogated.

This is the chief purpose of the proposed Exchequer, and surely, if, in the accomplishment of a purpose so essential, it affords a sound circulating medium to the country and facilities to trade, it should be regarded as no slight recommendation of it to public consideration. Properly guarded by the provisions of law, it can run into no dangerous evil; nor can any abuse arise under it, but such as the Legislature itself will be answerable for, if it be tolerated; since it is but the creature of the law, and is susceptible at all times of modification, amendment, or repeal, at the pleasure of Congress. I know that it has been objected that the system would be liable to be abused by the Legislature —by whom alone it could be abused—in the party conflicts of the day; that such abuse would manifest itself in a change of the law, which would authorize an excessive issue of paper for the purpose of inflating prices and winning popular favor. To that it may be answered, that the ascription of such a motive to Congress is altogether gratuitous and inadmissible. The theory of our institutions would lead us to a different conclusion. But a perfect security against a proceeding so reckless, would be found to exist in the very nature of things. The political party which should be so blind to the true interests of the country as to resort to such an expedient, would inevitably meet with a final overthrow, in the fact that, the moment the paper ceased to be convertible into specie, or otherwise promptly redeemed, it would become worthless, and would, in the end, dishonor the Government, involve the people in ruin, and such political party in hopeless disgrace. At the same time, such a view involves the utter impossibility of furnishing any currency other than that of the precious metals; for, if the Government itself cannot forego the temptation of excessive paper issues, what reliance can be placed in corporations, upon whom the temptations of individual aggrandizement would most strongly operate? The people would have to blame none but themselves for any injury that might arise from a course so reckless, since their agents would be the wrongdoers, and they the passive spectators.

There can be but three kinds of public currency: 1st. Gold and silver; 2d. The paper of State institutions; or, 3d. A representative of the precious metals, provided by the General Government, or under its authority. The sub-treasury system rejected the last, in any form; and, as it was believed that no reliance could be placed on the issues of local institutions, for the purposes of general circulation, it necessarily and unavoidably adopted specie as the exclusive currency for its own use. And this must ever be the case, unless one of the other kinds be used. The choice, in the present state of public sentiment, lies between an exclusive specie currency on the one hand, and Government issues of some kind on the other. That these issues cannot be made by a chartered institution, is supposed to be conclusively settled. They must be made, then, directly by Government agents. For several years past, they have been thus made in the form of treasury notes, and have answered a valuable purpose. Their usefulness has been limited by their being transient and temporary; their ceasing to bear interest at given periods, necessarily causes their speedy return, and thus restricts their range of circulation; and being used only in the disbursements of Government, they cannot reach those points where they are most required. By rendering their use permanent, to the moderate extent already mentioned, by offering no inducement for their return, and by exchanging them for coin and other values, they will constitute, to a certain extent, the general currency so much needed to maintain the internal trade of the country. And this is the Exchequer plan, so far as it may operate in furnishing a currency.

I cannot forego the occasion to urge its importance to the credit of the Government in a financial point of view. The great necessity of resorting to every proper and becoming expedient, in order to place the treasury on a footing of the highest respectability, is entirely obvious. The credit of the Government may be regarded as the very soul of the Government itself—a principle of vitality, without which all its movements are languid, and all its operations embarrassed. In this spirit the Executive felt itself bound, by the most imperative sense of duty, to submit to Congress, at its last session, the propriety of making a specific pledge of the land fund, as the basis for the negotiation of the loans authorized to be contracted. I then thought that such an application of the public domain would, without doubt, have placed at the command of the Government ample funds to relieve the treasury from the temporary embarrassments under which it labored. American credit had suffered a considerable shock in Europe, from the large indebtedness of the States, and the temporary inability of some of them to meet the interest on their debts. The utter and disastrous prostration of the United States Bank of Pennsylvania had contributed largely to increase the sentiment of distrust, by reason of the loss and ruin sustained by the holders of its stock—a large portion of whom were foreigners, and many of whom were alike ignorant of our political organization, and of our actual responsibilities. It was the anxious desire of the Executive that, in the effort to negotiate the loan abroad, the American negotiator might be able to point the money-lender to the fund mortgaged for the redemption of the principal and interest of any loan he might contract, and thereby vindicate the Government from all suspicion of bad faith, or inability to meet its engagements. Congress differed from the Executive in this view of the subject It became, nevertheless, the duty of the Executive to resort to every expedient in its power to negotiate the authorized loan. After a failure to do so in the American market, a citizen of high character and talent was sent to Europe—with no better success; and thus the mortifying spectacle has been presented, of the inability of this Government to obtain a loan so small as not in the whole to amount to more than one-fourth of its ordinary annual income; at a time when the Governments of Europe, although involved in debt, and with their subjects heavily burdened with taxation, readily obtain loans of any amount at a greatly reduced rate of interest. It would be unprofitable to look further into this anomalous state of things; but I cannot conclude without adding, that, for a Government which has paid off its debts of two wars with the largest maritime power of Europe, and now owing a debt which is almost next to nothing, when compared with its boundless resources—a Government the strongest in the world, because emanating from the popular will, and firmly rooted in the affections of a great and free people—and whose fidelity to its engagements has never been questioned;—for such a Government to have tendered to the capitalists of other countries an opportunity for a small investment of its stock, and yet to have failed, implies either the most unfounded distrust in its good faith, or a purpose, to obtain which the course pursued is the most fatal which could have been adopted. It has now become obvious to all men that the Government must look to its own means for supplying its wants; and it is consoling to know that these means are altogether adequate for the object. The Exchequer, if adopted, will greatly aid in bringing about this result. Upon what I regard as a well-founded supposition, that its bills would be readily sought for by the public creditors, and that the issue would, in a short time, reach the maximum of $15,000,000, it is obvious that $10,000,000 would thereby be added to the available means of the treasury, without cost or charge. Nor can I fail to urge the great and beneficial effects which would be produced in aid of all the active pursuits of life. Its effects upon the solvent State banks, while it would force into liquidation those of an opposite character, through its weekly settlements, would be highly beneficial; and, with the advantages of a sound currency, the restoration of confidence and credit would follow, with a numerous train of blessings. My convictions are most strong that these benefits would flow from the adoption of this measure; but, if the result should be adverse, there is this security in connexion with it—that the law creating it may be repealed at the pleasure of the Legislature, without the slightest implication of its good faith.

I recommend to Congress to take into consideration the propriety of reimbursing a fine imposed on General Jackson, at New Orleans, at the time of the attack and defence of that city, and paid by him. Without designing any reflection on the judicial tribunal which imposed the fine, the remission at this day may be regarded as not unjust or inexpedient. The voice of the civil authority was heard amidst the glitter of arms, and obeyed by those who held the sword—thereby giving additional lustre to a memorable military achievement. If the laws were offended, their majesty was fully vindicated; and, although the penalty incurred and paid is worthy of little regard in a pecuniary point of view, it can hardly be doubted that it would be gratifying to the war-worn veteran, now in retirement and in the winter of his days, to be relieved from the circumstances in which that judgment placed him. There are cases in which public functionaries may be called on to weigh the public interest against their own personal hazards; and, if the civil law be violated from praiseworthy motives, or an overruling sense of public danger and public necessity, punishment may well be restrained within that limit which asserts and maintains the authority of the law, and the subjection of the military to the civil power. The defence of New Orleans, while it saved a city from the hands of the enemy, placed the name of General Jackson among those of the greatest captains of the age, and illustrated one of the brightest pages of our history. Now that the causes of excitement existing at the time have ceased to operate, it is believed that the remission of this fine, and whatever of gratification that remission might cause the eminent man who incurred and paid it, would be in accordance with the general feeling and wishes of the American people.

I have thus, fellow-citizens, acquitted myself of my duty under the Constitution, by laying before you, as succinctly as I have been able, the state of the Union, and by inviting your attention to measures of much importance to the country. The Executive will most zealously unite its efforts with those of the Legislative Department in the accomplishment of all that is required to relieve the wants of a common constituency, or elevate the destinies of a beloved country.

JOHN TYLER.

WASHINGTON, December, 1842.

Mr. KERR moved that 1,500 copies of the message and accompanying documents, and 3 500 copies without the documents, in addition to the usual quantity, be printed for the use of the Senate,

The CHAIR said it would be necessary, under the rule of the last session, to refer the motion to the Committee on Printing, unless, by unanimous consent, the printing was ordered.

Mr. KING thought it was not so intended by the rule; but, such being the impression of the Chair, he hoped the unanimous consent of the Senate for the printing would be given. He made that motion; and

The question being put, it was carried in the affirmative.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. laid before the Senate a communication from the Treasury Department, covering the Treasurer's report of his accounts for the third and fourth quarters of 1841, and the first and second quarters of the year 1842; which,

On motion of Mr. EVANS, was laid on the table and ordered to be printed. Referred to the Committee on Printing.

On motion of Mr. EVANS, it was ordered that the daily hour of meeting of the Senate be 12 o'clock, until otherwise ordered.

DEATH OF MR. J. W. WILLIAMS.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, informing the Senate of the death of one of its members, Mr. J. W. WILLIAMS, late a Representative from the State of Maryland; which being read,

Mr. KERR rose, and remarked as follows:

I rise, with feelings of painful regret, to perform the duty of proposing to the Senate some special notice of the communication from the House of Representatives upon the recent and sudden death of the Hon. JAMES W. WILLIAMS, late a member of that body from the State which I have the honor here, in part, to represent.

The first news of this distressing event reached me on my journey hither. The fact was then too confidently related to admit of doubt on my part, and was soon confirmed in all its particulars.

The deceased was travelling, on Friday last, from his home, to the discharge of his high duties in this Capitol, when he was stricken down by the visitation of Providence—apoplexed. In a state of insensibility, he was reconveyed to his own mansion, in time only to draw his last breath in the bosom of his afflicted family.

I will not detain you, Mr. President, by any tedious homily of mine upon this striking example of the uncertainty of the life of man, and of the poor assurance we have of its continuance, from day to day, even in the highest health, amidst the gayest enjoyments that life can supply, and with all the honors to which ambition may prompt us to aspire. We are proudly conscious of "this sensible warm motion" of our being, but little think how soon it may "become a knéaded clod!" We live on, heedless of the continual recurrence of fatal incidents like this, and take no warning from them. We seem, indeed, to live to be ever verifying the well-known aphorism—which is daily repeated—that "Man thinks all men mortal but himself!"

Let us, Mr. President, take to heart this fatal blow on one who, like us, perhaps, was indulging the hope of prolonged life and happiness; and, in doing the formal honor to his virtues and his memory which custom here demands of us, let us apply to ourselves the sad story of his untimely death, in solemn reflection, and keep it in mind, as a token and a proof that we—ay, the wisest and the best of us—must ere long follow him to "that bourne from whence no traveller returns!"

It becomes me, as a friend of the deceased, to say a few words in justice to the character of so worthy and so excellent a citizen.

Mr. WILLIAMS was a native son of Maryland, but born in a section of it distant from that in which he last and long resided. He was educated with unusual care, and great pains were taken to make him a scholar—and a good one; and he rewarded, by an assiduous improvement of his advantages, the kindness of an anxious parent, who bestowed on him the noble boon of a well-regulated education.

Though intended for the profession of the law, he married early, and became an active and distinguished merchant in our commercial emporium, (the monumental city,) but ultimately retired, as most men seem inclined to do, to the pursuit of agriculture. Yet, with the advantages of early study and a cultivated mind, this gentleman was enabled to fulfil with high credit the duties of a Representative in the Legislature of his native State, and, for his superior intelligence and usefulness, was for some time distinguished by the honor of presiding over the deliberations of its popular branch.

In the discharge of all public duties, he was able, steady, and diligent; and it is proof of his elevation in the general confidence and respect, that he was raised by the voice of an intelligent community around him to that high and honorable station, the duties of which he was hastening to discharge, and in which he died.

I do not choose, Mr. President, to advert to the particular religious persuasion to which this gentleman belonged; but he performed his moral duties, and his social and domestic obligations, with fidelity, with kindness, and with uniform courtesy; and all who knew him will ever bear testimony to that amiable demeanor for which he was remarkable in all his private intercourse.

If the deceased had any peculiar faults or foibles, I knew them not; and I trust they were only such as frail humanity is heir to. It were bootless now to weigh them in the rigid scale of justice. Let us not too scrupulously scan that account of him, which we, ourselves, could not render but in asking mercy:

> "No farther seek his merits to disclose,
> Or draw his frailties from their dread abode—
> There they, alike, in trembling hope repose—
> The bosom of his Father and his God!"

I will offer for the adoption of the Senate, and as a memorial for our record, the resolutions which I send to the chair:

Resolved, That the Senate have received with deep sensibility the proceedings of the House of Representatives on the sudden death of the Hon. JAMES W. WILLIAMS, a member of that body from the State of Maryland, and sincerly sympathise in the regrets incident to that mournful occasion.

Resolved, That, in testimony of their high respect for the character of the deceased, the members of the Senate will wear the usual badge of mourning for the space of thirty days; and as a further testimonial of respect for the memory of the deceased, that the Senate forthwith adjourn.

The Senate, accordingly, adjourned.

Mr. Berrien of Georgia, Mr. Miller of New Jersey, and Mr. Barrow of Louisiana, appeared in their seats to-day, in addition to those already announced.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, December 7, 1842.

The minutes of yesterday were read and approved.

THE ONE-HOUR RULE.

Mr. W. C. JOHNSON rose for the purpose of giving notice that to-morrow he should move that the one-hour rule be rescinded.

[Some gentleman was heard to say that the one-hour rule was not in force.]

Mr. J. resumed, and said he had been told that the one-hour rule was not now in operation, as it had been adopted for the concluding portion of the last session only. If, therefore, that were so, his notice would be unnecessary.

The SPEAKER replied that the one-hour rule had been incorporated with the rules of the House.

Mr. W. C. JOHNSON'S notice was then received and entered.

ABOLITION.

Mr. ADAMS called the attention of the House to the position in which a motion made by him to rescind the 21st rule was left yesterday; the House having negatived the question, "Shall the main question be now put?" after the previous question had been seconded. He then expressed his desire that the question should now be taken, and without debate; for it had been very fully discussed heretofore, and was well known to, and understood by, every member of the House.

The SPEAKER said the question would come up as business in order; and, as the previous question had been seconded, debate was necessarily cut off.

Some conversation in relation to the operation of the previous question ensued, in which Mr. ADAMS, Mr. PICKENS, Mr. EVERETT, and the SPEAKER took part.

Mr. W. C. JOHNSON then said, as the gentlemen on the other side were avowedly very anxious to prevent debate, he hoped they would vote with him to lay the whole subject on the table. He then made that motion; on which the yeas and nays were demanded, and ordered.

Mr. BIDLACK moved that he be excused from voting on this subject.

Mr. B. said he had made this motion as the only way in which he could get an opportunity of "defining his position." He had no doubt the previous question would be called and sustained; and he wished to take this occasion, before the vote was taken on the motion now pending, to remind Southern gentlemen, and especially some of the members from Kentucky and Virginia, that he had been very much surprised at their vote on this question yesterday, as well as heretofore.

Mr. B. had been told, when this question was first submitted to him to vote upon at a previous session, that it was a question of "life and death" with the South, upon which "they were all united." Supposing this to be the case, Mr. B. had gone with them upon an abstract proposition, upon the merits of which there was an honest difference of opinion among good men, who were his immediate constituents, as well as elsewhere, at the North. Now, what he wished was to appeal to Southern men to know whether they considered it magnanimous to urge Northern members to a particular course on this question, when Southern members themselves would not unite upon it.

The SPEAKER reminded Mr. B. that the motion was a very narrow one.

Mr. BIDLACK observed he was aware he could not go into the merits of the question, and he would content himself with saying that he was determined to remain consistent, and vote as he had done heretofore, notwithstanding the circumstances to which he had reference. He had obtained his object by referring to the peculiar position of the parties to the question, and would withdraw the motion.

The question was then taken on the motion of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. W. C. JOHNSON] to lay the whole subject on the table; and it was negatived—yeas 90, nays 91, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Arrington, Atherton, Barton, Beeson, Bidlack, Bowne, Boyd, Charles Brown, Burke, William Butler, William O. Butler, Patrick C. Caldwell, Thomas J. Campbell, Casey, Chapman, Clifford, Clinton, Mark A. Cooper, Cross, Daniel, Dawson, Dean, Deberry, Eastman, John C. Edwards, Charles A. Floyd, Fornance, Gamble, Gerry, Gilmer, Gustine, Harris, Hastings, Hays, Holmes, Hopkins, Houck, Houston, Hubard, Hunter, Charles J. Ingersoll, Jack, William Cost Johnson, Cave Johnson, John W. Jones, Keim, McKay, Mallory, Marchand, Mathews, Medill, Miller, Mitchell, Newhard, Owsley, Payne, Pearce, Pickens, Plumer, Powell, Alexander Randall, Rayner, Reding, Rencher, Reynolds, Rhett, Riggs, Rogers, Shaw, Sheppard, William Smith, Snyder, Sprigg, Steenrod, Summers, Sweney, Taliaferro, John B. Thompson, Richard W. Thompson, Triplett, Turney, Van Buren, Ward, Warren, Washington, Watterson, Weller, Westbrook, Wise, and Wood—90.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Allen, Sherlock J. Andrews, Aycrigg, Babcock, Baker, Barnard, Birdseye, Blair, Boardman, Borden, Botts, Brewster, Briggs, Brockway, Bronson, Jeremiah Brown, Burnell, Calhoun, Childs, Chittenden, John C. Clark, Staley N. Clarke, James Cooper, Cowen, Cranston, Garrett Davis, Richard D. Davis, Doig, John Edwards, Egbert, Everett, Ferris, Fessenden, Fillmore, John G. Floyd, A. Lawrence Foster, Giddings, Patrick G. Goode, Gordon, Granger, Hall, Halsted, Henry, Hudson, Joseph R. Ingersoll, James Irvin, William W. Russell, Saltonstall, Sanford, Simonton, Slade, Truman Smith, Stanly, Stokely, Stratton, Alex. H. H. Stuart, Toland, Tomlinson, Trumbull, Underwood, Van Rensselaer, Joseph L. White, Thomas W. Williams, Winthrop, Yorke, and Augustus Young—91.

The SPEAKER announced that the question recurred, Shall the main question be put? On which Mr. ADAMS had demanded the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

The yeas and nays were accordingly taken, and resulted as follows: Yeas 91, nays 93. The question, therefore, being again negatived, went over for the day. The yeas and nays were as follows:

Davis, Richard D. Davis, John Edwards, Everett, Ferris, Fessenden, Fillmore, A. Lawrence Foster, J. R. Giddings, Patrick G. Goode, Granger, Hall, Halsted, Henry, Hudson, Joseph R. H. Stuart, Sweney, Taliaferro, Turney, Underwood, Van Buren, Ward, Warren, Watterson, Weller, Westbrook, Wise, and Wood—93.

Mr. UNDERWOOD rose to a question of order. If the question which had just been disposed of should be negatived to-morrow and subsequent days, as it had been both this and the preceding day, he wished to inquire whether it was to lie over from day to day, to the end of the session. (Cries of "The question is not debatable.") He said he did not desire to debate it; he merely wished to know where they were.

Mr. C. JOHNSON and others objected to debate on the subject.

The SPEAKER also stated that the House having disposed of the subject for this day, the gentleman from Kentucky was not in order.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, then, I will bring it before the House to-morrow.

The subject was then laid over.

ORGANIZATION OF CONGRESS.

A message was received from the Senate, by A. DICKINS, Esq., its Secretary, informing the House that a quorum of the Senate was assembled, and that that body was ready to proceed to business.

Subsequently another message was received from the Senate, by its Secretary, informing the House that the Senate had appointed a committee on its part to wait on the President, with the committee appointed on behalf of the House, to inform him that the two Houses of Congress were ready to receive from him any communication he might have to make. [The names of the gentlemen appointed by the Senate will be found in our Senate report.]

THE PUBLIC PRINTING.

Mr. WISE moved the reappointment of the select committee of the last session on the public printing, which, during the last session, had made great progress with, and nearly completed its labors.

The motion was agreed to.

NOTICES AND MOTIONS.

Mr. BRIGGS gave notice of a motion for the amendment of the 19th joint rule of the two Houses of Congress, so as to substitute the word "intoxicating" for the word "spirituous." The rule now stands thus: "No spirituous liquors shall be offered for sale, or exhibited, within the Capitol, or on the public grounds adjacent thereto."

Mr. BARNARD gave notice of a motion for leave to introduce a bill to authorize the issue of convertible exchequer bills, and further to amend the laws relating to the Treasury Department.

Mr. MATHIOT gave notice of a bill to grant pensions to certain widows of officers and soldiers of the Revolution.

Mr. BURNELL gave notice of a bill to provide for the enlistment of boys for the naval service, and to extend the term of the enlistment of seamen.

Mr. R. W. THOMPSON gave notice of a bill to make an appropriation for the continuation of the Cumberland road through the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois.

Mr. W. W. IRWIN gave notice of a bill making an appropriation for the construction of seven marine hospitals on the Western waters.

Mr. HARRIS gave notice of a bill to repeal so much of the act entitled "An act to provide revenue from imports, and to change and modify the law imposing duties on imports and for other purposes," as imposes a tax upon salt.

Mr. STEENROD gave notice of a bill to make an appropriation for the continuation of the Cumberland road west of the city of Wheeling, and the construction of a bridge over the Ohio river.

Mr. J. C. EDWARDS gave notice of a bill authorizing drawbacks on goods exported by land to Santa Fe.

Also, of a bill declaring what is the Northern boundary of the State of Missouri.

WAREHOUSING SYSTEM.

Mr. McKEON gave notice that he would to-morrow, or some subsequent day, ask leave to introduce a bill to organize the warehousing system.

HUDSON RIVER.

Mr. BARNARD gave notice that he would to-morrow, or some subsequent day, ask leave to introduce a bill making an appropriation for continuing the improvement of the Hudson river.

STATE DEBTS.

Mr. WM. COST JOHNSON moved that 5,000 copies of the document of the last session, in relation to the debts of the States, be printed for the use of the House: rejected—ayes 57, noes 88.

Mr. CUSHING, from the Joint Committee, appointed to wait on the President of the United States, and inform him that a quorum of the two Houses of Congress had assembled, and were ready to receive any communication he might make, reported that the committee had performed the duty assigned them; and had been answered by the President that he would forthwith make a communication in writing to each of the two Houses.

The annual message of the President was then presented by Mr. ROBERT TYLER, his secretary, and read at the Clerk's table.

[This document will be found in its proper place, in the proceedings of the Senate.]

After the message had been read—

Mr. CUSHING moved that the message be laid on the table, and that 10,000 copies with the documents be printed for the use of the House.

Mr. HOPKINS suggested to the gentleman from Massachusetts to modify his motion, so as to order the printing of 5,000 copies with the documents, and 10,000 without.

Mr. CUSHING declined doing so, saying that this point was fully discussed at the last session, and the House then settled down with the understanding that 10,000 copies with the documents was the number necessary for circulation.

The question was then taken on Mr. CUSHING's motion, and carried.

On motion of Mr. BRIGGS,

The House adjourned.

In addition to the members recorded to have been present on Monday, the following appeared on Tuesday: Messrs. V. Birdseye, Walter Coles, William L. Goggin, George S. Houston, James A. Pearce, G. B. Rodney, John Westbrook, and David Levy, delegate.

And, on Wednesday, the following appeared: Messrs. Cave Johnson, William W. Payne, and Edward Cross.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 8, 1842.

Mr. PORTER of Michigan, and Mr. GRAHAM of North Carolina, in addition to those already announced, appeared in their seats to-day.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. laid before the Senate a communication from the Navy Department, transmitted in compliance with the act of Congress of March, 1819, covering an abstract of the expenditures out of the contingent fund of that department, from the 1st October, 1841, to the 30th September, 1842, inclusive; which,

On motion of Mr. ARCHER, was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Mr. HUNTINGTON submitted a resolution, (which was, by unanimous consent, agreed to,) so far suspending the 34th rule as to authorize the presiding officer to appoint the standing committees for the present session.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, informing the Senate that that body had passed a resolution for the appointment of two chaplains for the present session, of different denominations—one for each House—who are to interchange services weekly; and also passed a resolution for the appointment of a joint committee (consisting of three from each House) to superintend the disbursement of the fund for the increase of the library of Congress; and asking the concurrence of the Senate in each.

On motion of Mr. TAPPAN, the resolutions were concurred in, and the Chair was authorized to appoint the committee on the part of the Senate to superintend the disbursement of the library fund.

On motion by Mr. BATES, the Senate, by unanimous consent, resolved to proceed forthwith to the election of a chaplain.

Mr. BAYARD suggested whether it would not be better to pass a resolution simply appointing the chaplain of the last session.

The CHAIR said that the rule required that the Senate should ballot; and the resolution was therefore inadmissible.

CHAPLAIN.

The Senate then proceeded to ballot; when it was ascertained that only 25 ballots (not a quorum) had been received—of which

Mr. Tuston received . . . 24, and
Mr. Bulfinch . . . . . 1.

At the suggestion of Mr. KING, the Senate was counted; when it was ascertained that a quorum were present.

The Senate proceeded a second time to ballot; when 28 votes were received—of which

Mr. Tuston received . . . 26,
Mr. Bulfinch . . . . . 1, and Blank . . . . . 1.

Mr. Tuston was therefore declared to be duly elected.

THE BANKRUPT ACT.

Mr. BENTON, on leave, and agreeably to notice given, introduced a bill to repeal the bankrupt act; which was read, as follows:

Whereas the bankrupt act of 1841 is unconstitutional and immoral, and violates the rights of the States and of individuals, and is invalid and void, and ought not to be permitted to remain on the statute-book; therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the act passed on the 19th of August, 1841, entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," be, and the same hereby is, repealed, except for the trial of cases now depending under said act; which cases may be prosecuted to termination under the following limitations and conditions, to wit:

First. That no discharge from his debts shall be granted to any bankrupt, except with the consent of two-thirds of his creditors, and upon the judicial certificate of his integrity, as provided for in the 36th section of the bankrupt act of April 4, 1800, which is as follows:

"That no person becoming a bankrupt, according to the intent and provisions of this act, shall be entitled to a certificate of discharge, or to any of the benefits of the act, unless the commissioners shall certify, under their hands, to the judge of the district within which such commission issues, that such bankrupt hath made a full discovery of his or her estate and effects, and in all things conformed him or herself to the directions of this act; and that there doth not appear to them any reason to doubt of the truth of such discovery, or that the same was not a full discovery of the said bankrupt's estate and effects; or unless the said judge should be of opinion that the said certificate was unreasonably denied by the commissioners; and unless two-thirds, in number and in value, of the creditors of the bankrupt, who shall be creditors for not less than fifty dollars, respectively, and who shall have duly proved their debts, under the said commission, shall sign such certificate to the judge, and testify their consent to the allowance of a certificate of discharge, in pursuance of this act; which signing and consent shall be also certified by the commissioners; but the said commissioners shall not certify the same till they have proof, by affidavit or information, in writing, of such creditors, or of the persons respectively authorized for that purpose, signing the said certificate; which affidavit or affirmation, together with the letter or power of attorney to sign, shall be laid before the judge of the district within which such commission issues, in order for the allowing the certificate of discharge; and the said certificate shall not be allowed, unless the bankrupt make oath or affirmation, in writing, that the certificate of the commissioners, and consent of the creditors thereunto, were obtained fairly and without fraud; and any of the creditors of the said bankrupt are allowed to be heard, if they shall think fit, before the respective persons aforesaid, against the making or allowing of such certificates by the commissioners or judge."

Secondly. That the insolvent laws of the States be respected and left in force, to the same degree that they were ordered to be respected by the 61st section of the act of 1800; which section is in the following words:

"That this act shall not repeal or annul, or be construed to repeal or annul, the laws of any State now in force, or which may hereafter be enacted, for the relief of insolvent debtors, except so far as the same may respect persons who are, or may be, clearly within the purview of this act, and whose debts shall amount, in the cases specified in the second section thereof, to the sums therein mentioned. And if any person within the purview of this act shall be imprisoned for the space of three months for any debt or upon any contract, unless the creditors of such prisoner shall proceed to prosecute a commission of bankruptcy against him or her, agreeably to the provisions of this act, such debtor may, and shall be, entitled to relief under any such laws for the relief of insolvent debtors, this act notwithstanding."

Thirdly. That the liens created by State laws on the property of bankrupts be respected and observed in the same full and absolute manner in which they were ordered to be respected and observed by the 64th section of the said act of 1800; which section is in these words:

"That nothing contained in this act shall be taken or construed to invalidate or impair any lien existing at the date of this act upon the lands or chattels of any person who may become bankrupt."

Fourthly. That a person subject to involuntary bankruptcy shall not have the privilege of voluntary bankruptcy; but, on filing a declaration of insolvency, shall be subject to be proceeded against at the will of his creditors, according to the principles of the 6th section of the bankrupt act of George IV, and the 13th section of the insolvent debtors act of the same reign.

Fifthly. That the operation of the act be prospective only, according to the first section of the bankrupt act of the year 1800.

Sixthly. That agreements on the part of bankrupts in office to assign a part of their salaries and emoluments to their creditors, be binding in law, and give the creditors a right to have the same retained for their benefit.

On motion of Mr. BENTON, the bill was then ordered to be printed, and read a second time.

Mr. WRIGHT presented a petition from W. M. Quackenboss and others, sureties of the late collector for the port of New York, (Mr. Swartwout,) asking that a law might be passed authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to compromise with said sureties their liabilities to the United States. Mr. W. remarked that this matter had been before the Senate three or four consecutive sessions, and a bill had been invariably passed, but failed in the House for want of time. He hoped, as this was a short session, and as it was to the interest of all parties that the matter should be settled, that the Committee on the Judiciary would give the subject the earliest consideration possible, and report a bill without delay. He moved the reference of the petition to the Judiciary Committee; but, as no such committee was yet appointed, it was ordered to lie on the table for the present.

Mr. TALLMADGE submitted the following resolution, which lies over, under the rule, viz:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of instructing the Secretary of State to communicate with the judicial officers of the United States who have had the execution of the bankrupt law, and ascertain from them the number of applications under the act, both voluntary and involuntary; the number of discharges, the points decided under any provision of the act, the opinions of the judges as to any amendments or modifications of the act; and such other information as he may deem necessary to show the effects and operations of the act; and that he report the same to the Senate on the first day of the next session.

Mr. BARROW gave notice that he would on to-morrow ask leave to introduce a bill for the relief of Thomas W. Chinn.

THE EXPUNGING RESOLUTION.

Mr. BAYARD rose and said he would take this early opportunity, in conformity with the notice which he had given on the last day of the last session, to introduce a resolution which he had been instructed by the Legislature of his State to introduce four years ago; and he would take occasion to say that it was his design to ask its consideration at as early a day as practicable. The Senate having nothing of a very important nature to occupy its attention at present, he hoped they would be able to take the matter into consideration within the present month, as the adoption of the resolution would be, in his opinion, a happy consummation with which to close the year. It was to rescind the resolution of the 16th January, 1837, commonly called the "expunging resolution." Mr. B.'s resolution was then sent to the Chair, and read as follows:

Whereas the Senate of the United States, in the exercise of its functions as a deliberative assembly, did, on the 28th day of March, 1834, adopt the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the President, in the late Executive proceedings in relation to the revenue, has assumed upon himself authority and power not conferred by the Constitution and laws, but in derogation of both."

And whereas afterward, to wit, on the 16th day of January, 1837, the Senate, in reference to the above resolution, adopted another, as follows:

"Resolved, That the said resolve be expunged from the Journal: and for that purpose, that the Secretary of the Senate, at such time as the Senate may appoint, shall bring the manuscript Journal of the session of 1833-'4 into the Senate, and, in the presence of the Senate, draw black lines round the said resolve, and write across the face thereof, in strong letters, the words following: Expunged by order of the Senate, this 16th day of January, in the year of our Lord 1837."

And whereas the Constitution of the United States expressly requires that each House of Congress shall keep a journal of its proceedings, meaning thereby to preserve a faithful and permanent record of those proceedings:

And whereas the Senate of the United States, independently of its legislative, executive, and judicial functions, has the inherent right, as a deliberative assembly, to express its opinions, which can be done only by resolution—which opinions, when thus expressed, become part of its proceedings, of which the Constitution provides that a permanent record shall be kept:

And whereas the resolution of the 16th of July, 1837, and the act of the Secretary of the Senate in compliance with it, in legal contemplation destroyed, and in fact defaced, the record of the proceeding to which it refers: wherefore,

Resolved, That the resolution of the 16th of January, 1837, commonly called the expunging resolution, be, and the same is hereby, rescinded, and shall be forever hereafter held as naught; and that, in all future publications of that portion of the Journal which contains the resolution of 1833-'4, and in all copies which may hereafter be made of the same for any official or legal purpose, the said resolution of 1833-'4 shall be published and copied as it was originally entered on the said Journal, without any notice whatever of the superscription which was erroneously made, in pursuance of the resolution of the 16th of January, 1837.

The resolution was then ordered to be printed.

On motion by Mr. BAYARD, it was ordered that, when the Senate adjourn, it adjourn till Monday next.

JUDGES OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. TAPPAN gave notice that he would, on Monday next, ask leave to introduce a resolution, proposing to amend the Constitution of the United States, in relation to the appointment of judges of the United States courts.

On motion, the Senate then adjourned till Monday next.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, December 8, 1842.

Mr. TALIAFERRO offered the following resolution, which was considered and adopted:

Resolved, That the several memorials, petitions, and resolutions presented to the House of Representatives, during the present Congress, which have not been finally acted on; also, all bills which went from this House to the Senate, and which were lost there; and such bills as were referred to the several committees of this House, and not reported on; be again referred to the committee to which the same were heretofore referred, as soon as the said committees shall be organized—a written request to that effect being handed by any member to the Clerk, whose duty it shall be to enter the same in the journal, as if presented in the House.

ABOLITION.

The resolution submitted by Mr. ADAMS, to rescind the 21st rule, so as to admit the reception of abolition petitions, resolutions, &c., on which the previous question had been moved and seconded, came up as the first business in order.

Mr. JOHN W. JONES moved to lay it on the table; and called for the yeas and nays on the question; which were ordered, and resulted in yeas 92, nays 95, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Arrington, Atherton, Barton, Beeson, Bidlack, Bowne, Boyd, Charles Brown, Burke, William Butler, Green W. Caldwell, Patrick C. Caldwell, Thomas J. Campbell, Casey, Clifford, Clinton, Mark A. Cooper, Cross, Daniel, Dawson, Dean, Deberry, Eastman, John C. Edwards, Charles A. Floyd, Fornance, Gamble, Gerry, Gilmer, Goggin, William O. Goode, Harris, Hastings, Hays, Hopkins, Houck, Houston, Hubbard, Hunter, Charles J. Ingersoll, Jack, Wm. Cost Johnson, Cave Johnson, John W. Jones, Isaac D. Jones, Keim, John P. Kennedy, Abraham McClellan, McKay, Mallory, Marchand, Mathews, Medill, Meriwether, Miller, Mitchell, Moore, Newhard, Owsley, Payne, Pearce, Pickens, Plumer, Powell, Rayner, Reding, Rencher, Reynolds, Rhett, Riggs, Rogers, Saunders, Shepperd, William Smith, Snyder, Sprigg, Steenrod, Summers, Sweney, Taliaferro, John B. Thompson, Richard W. Thompson, Triplett, Turney, Van Buren, Ward, Warren, Washington, Watterson, Weller, Westbrook, Wise, and Wood—92.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Allen, Sherlock J. Andrews, Aycrigg, Babcock, Baker, Barnard, Birdseye, Blair, Boardman, Borden, Botts, Brewster, Briggs, Brockway, Bronson, Jeremiah Brown, Burnell, Calhoun, Childs, Chittenden, John C. Clark, Staley N. Clarke, James Cooper, Cowen, Cranston, Cushing, Garrett Davis, Richard D. Davis, John Edwards, Egbert, Everett, Fessenden, Fillmore, John G. Floyd, A. Lawrence Foster, Giddings, Patrick G. Goode, Gordon, Granger, Hall, Halsted, Henry, Howard, Hudson, Joseph R. Ingersoll, James Irvin, William W. Irwin, James, Linn, Littlefield, Lowell, Robert McClellan, McKennan, McKeon, Alfred Marshall, Samson Mason, Mathiot, Mattocks, Maxwell, Maynard, Morgan, Morris, Morrow, Osborne, Parmenter, Partridge, Pendleton, Ramsey, Benjamin Randall, Randolph, Ridgway, Rodney, Roosevelt, Wm. Russell, James M. Russell, Saltonstall, Sanford, Simonton, Slade, Truman Smith, Stanly, Stokely, Stratton, Tillinghast, Toland, Tomlinson, Trumbull, Underwood, Van Rensselaer, Joseph L. White, Thomas W. Williams, Winthrop, Yorke, and A. Young—95.

So the House refused to lay the resolution on the table.

The question then recurring, "Shall the main question be now put?"

Mr. UNDERWOOD renewed the point of order raised by him yesterday; and contended that, although the effect of the second to the previous question was to put an end to debate, yet the refusal of the House to order the main question to be put, authorized debate after the next day. He understood from the Manual, that the decision of the House refusing to order the main question to be put, carried the question over to the next day; but, when that day came, if the main question was not ordered, the second was imperative. If the decision of the Chair was correct, the House might go on, from day to day, refusing to lay the resolution on the table, and refusing to order the main question to be put; and thus the question would never be settled. Certainly, a construction of the rules leading to such consequences could not be correct. It had been suggested by some one behind him, that the difficulty could be obviated by reconsidering the question; and he therefore hoped that some gentlemen who voted with the majority would move a reconsideration.

The SPEAKER reaffirmed his decision, and pointed out two authorities, which he read to the House, sustaining his decision.

Mr. EVERETT suggested to the gentleman from Kentucky to take an appeal from the decision of the Chair; stating that, if the gentleman did not appeal, he would appeal himself. [Mr. UNDERWOOD said that he would take an appeal, in order to try the sense of the House on the subject.] Neither of the cases read by the Chair, Mr. E. said, gave the decision of the Speaker or of the House on the question now at issue; in both cases, the difficulty having been got over by the members moving a reconsideration, instead of taking an appeal. The error of the Chair seemed to him to consist in this: that he took the second to the previous question for the order of the House. By the parliamentary law, the previous question could be seconded by a single member; and under the rules of the House, it required a majority for a second; but in both cases it was only a second, and not the order of the House. He contended, therefore, that when the question fell, the second fell with it. It was now too late to move the reconsideration, and the first question to be put would be on ordering the main question. If that should be lost, the House would be just where it was the day before; and so they might thus go on from day to day, refusing to lay the resolution on the table, and refusing to order the main question to be taken. Mr. E. concluded by appealing from the decision of the Chair.

After some remarks from Mr. BRIGGS, and a reply by the CHAIR, neither of which were distinctly understood by the reporter,

Mr. BRIGGS was proceeding with his remarks, when

Mr. TURNEY called him to order, on the ground that the appeal was not debatable.

Mr. J. R. INGERSOLL referred to some authorities sustaining the decision of the Chair.

Mr. TURNEY objected to debate on the appeal, and moved to lay it on the table; which motion was carried without a division.

The question was then taken on ordering the main question, and decided in the negative—yeas 95, nays 100, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Allen, Sherlock J. Andrews, Aycrigg, Babcock, Baker, Barnard, Birdseye, Blair, Boardman, Borden, Botts, Briggs, Brockway, Bronson, Jeremiah Brown-

Burnell, Calhoun, Casey, Childs, Chittenden, John C. Clark, Staley N. Clarke, James Cooper, Cowen, Cranston, Garrett Davis, Richard D. Davis, John Edwards, Egbert, Everett, Ferris, Fessenden, Fillmore, A Lawrence Foster, Giddings, Patrick G. Goode, Granger, Hall, Halsted, Henry, Howard, Hudson, Joseph R. Ingersoll, James Irvin, James, John P. Kennedy, Linn, McKennan, Mathiot, Mattocks, Maxwell, Maynard, Morgan, Morris, Morrow, Osborne, Owsley, Parmenter, Patridge, Pendleton, Ramsey, Benjamin Randall, Alexander Randall, Randolph, Rayner, Reynolds, Ridgway, Rodney, William Russell, James M. Russell, Saltonstall, Sanford, Simonton, Slade, Truman Smith, Stanly, Stokely, Stratton, Summers, John B. Thompson, Richard W. Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, Tomlinson, Triplett, Trumbull, Van Rensselaer, Washington, Joseph L. White, Thomas W. Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Winthrop, Yorke, and Augustus Young—95.

NAYS—Messrs. Arrington, Atherton, Barton, Beeson, Bidlack, Bowne, Boyd, Brewster, Charles Brown, Burke, William Butler, William O. Butler, Green W. Caldwell, Patrick C. Caldwell, Thomas J Campbell, Chapman, Clifford, Clinton, Mark A. Cooper, Cross, Cushing, Daniel, Dawson, Dean, Deberry, Eastman, John C. Edwards, John G. Floyd, Charles A. Floyd, Fornance, Gamble, Garry, Gilmer, Goggin, William O. Goode, Gordon, Green, Gustine, Harris, Hastings, Hays, Hopkins, Houck, Houston, Hubard, Hunter, Charles J. Ingersoll, William W. Irwin, Jack, William Cost Johnson, Cave Johnson, John W. Jones, Keim, Littlefield, Lowell, Abraham McClellan, Robert McClellan, McKay, McKeon, Mallory, Marchand, Alfred Marshall, Mathews, Medill, Meriwether, Miller, Mitchell, Moore, Newhard, Payne, Pearce, Pickens, Plumer, Powell, Read, Reding, Rencher, Rhett, Riggs, Rogers, Roosevelt, Saunders, Shaw, Shepperd, William Smith, Snyder, Sprigg, Steenrod, Alexander H. H. Stuart, Sweney, Taliaferro, Turney, Underwood, Van Buren, Ward, Warren, Watterson, Weller, Westbrook, Wise, and Wood—100.

So the House refused to order the main question to be now put.

THE ONE-HOUR RULE.

Mr. W. C. JOHNSON rose, pursuant to notice given yesterday, to move that the one-hour rule adopted at the last session, (which had been incorporated in the general rules, and was, therefore, in force for the present session,) be now rescinded.

Mr. FILLMORE rose to a point of order; and he inquired from the Speaker whether it was in order to move that resolution at that time. He contended that resolutions were not then in order.

The SPEAKER replied that the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. JOHNSON] had given notice of his motion, and it had been received and entered; and as there was now no other business before the House, it came up in order.

Mr. FILLMORE contended that the notice given by the gentleman from Maryland only authorized the introduction of his resolution when resolutions were in order; but, at present, petitions were in order.

The SPEAKER said there were no committees appointed to which petitions could be referred; and he decided this resolution to be in order.

Mr. W. C. JOHNSON then said it was not his intention to consume the time of the House, but he felt desirous to say that it was indispensable to wise legislation that a reasonable time should be given for the discussion of the questions which should come before this House. It was due to the country that the Representatives of the people should have the opportunity to express their opinions on some of the vast questions that would arise—the currency, for instance. His object, therefore, was not to delay, but to expedite the public business. He was willing that a particular day should be fixed to terminate debate on any particular bill, or that the House should have the control of it by the previous question. But he contended that no party had been benefited by the adoption of this one-hour rule. They had been here during two sessions, and, since the adoption of this rule, no member had had time to express his views fully on any question. He (Mr. JOHNSON) had been thereby compelled to be a silent member of the House—[laughter]—and for one, he should desire, on one or two subjects, to address the House at a greater length than the rule in question would permit. He wished this great body to be the organ of the people; and, as their Representatives, to discuss public measures, and to carry them out after a full examination; and hence he made this motion. But as it was not his intention, as he had before stated, to consume unnecessarily the time of the House, he would now move the previous question.

The previous question was seconded; and as the SPEAKER was about to propose the question, Shall the main question be now put?

Mr. McKENNAN rose and said, believing that to be one of the best rules this House ever adopted, he would move to lay the resolution on the table; and on this motion he called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the motion to lay the rescinding resolution on the table prevailed—yeas 116, nays 70, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Sherlock J. Andrews, Aycrigg, Babcock, Baker, Barton, Beeson, Bidlack, Birdseye, Blair, Boardman, Borden, Botts, Briggs, Brockway, Milton Brown, Jeremiah Brown, Burnell, William Butler, William O. Butler, Calhoun, Thomas J. Campbell, Casey, Chapman, Childs, Chittenden, John C. Clark, James Cooper, Cowen, Cranston, Garrett Davis, Deberry, John Edwards, Fessenden, Fillmore, A. Mr. WELLER moved that when this House adjourns it adjourn to meet again on Monday next; which was carried, the vote being 91 in the affirmative and 60 in the negative.

Mr. FILLMORE moved that the House then adjourn, which was agreed to; and the House adjourned to meet again on Monday next.

The following additional members appeared in their places to-day:

Messrs. SAUNDERS, G. W. CALDWELL, W. O. GOODE, MERIWETHER, MOORE, MAYNARD, and HOWARD.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, December 12, 1842.

The Senate met at 12 o'clock.

The following Senators, in addition to those heretofore announced, appeared in their seats to-day, viz: Messrs. SIMMONS and SPRAGUE, of Rhode Island; Messrs. WHITE and SMITH, of Indiana; Mr. YOUNG, of Illinois; Mr. LINN, of Missouri; Mr. WOODBRIDGE, of Michigan; and Mr. FULTON, of Arkansas.

After the reading of the journal of Thursday last, the President pro tem. announced to the Senate the standing committees; but, previous to such announciation, he was understood to say that the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. RIVES] who was chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations at the last session, had expressed a wish to the President pro tem. to be excused from serving on that committee, and gave reasons for such wish, which were considered ample.

The committees are as follows:

On Foreign Relations.—Messrs. Archer, Berrien, Buchanan, Tallmadge, and Choate.

On Finance.—Messrs. Evans, Graham, Woodbury, Berrien, and Crittenden.

On Commerce.—Messrs. Huntington, Woodbridge, King, Barrow, and Wright.

On Manufactures.—Messrs. Simmons, Archer, Miller, Buchanan, and Morehead.

On Agriculture.—Messrs. Linn, Bates, Crafts, Smith of Connecticut, and Sturgeon.

On Military Affairs.—Messrs. Crittenden, Merrick, Benton, Huntington, and Wilcox.

On the Militia—Messrs. Barrow, Fulton, Smith of Indiana, Williams, and McRoberts.

On Naval Affairs.—Messrs. Bayard, Graham, Williams, Choate, and Barrow.

On Public Lands.—Messrs. Smith of Indiana, Tallmadge, Walker, Huntington, and Conrad.

On Private Land Claims.—Messrs. Henderson, Linn, Tappan, Fulton, and Sprague.

On Indian Affairs.—Messrs. White, Morehead, Sevier, Phelps, and Benton.

On Claims.—Messrs. Graham, Wright, Woodbury, Woodbridge, and Phelps.

On Revolutionary Claims.—Messrs. Phelps, Clayton, Smith of Connecticut, Allen, and Williams.

On the Judiciary.—Messrs. Berrien, Clayton, Dayton, Walker, and Kerr.

On the Post Office and Post Roads.—Messrs. Merrick, Simmons, McRoberts, Conrad, and Miller.

On Roads and Canals.—Messrs. Porter, White, Young, King, and Cuthbert.

On Pensions.—Messrs. Bates, Bagby, Allen, Phelps, and Sevier.

On the District of Columbia—Messrs. Miller, Bayard, King, Kerr, and Young.

On Patents and the Patent Office—Messrs. Kerr, Porter, Henderson, Wilcox, and Sturgeon.

On the Public Buildings.—Messrs. Dayton, Fulton, and Evans.

On the Library.—Messrs. Woodbridge, Tappan, and Choate.

On Engrossed Bills.—Messrs. Conrad, Bagby, and Sturgeon.

On Enrolled Bills—Messrs. Sprague and Williams.

To Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses—Messrs. Tappan, White, and Porter.

On Retrenchment.—Messrs. Morehead, Graham, Miller, Fulton, and Sprague.

On Printing.—Messrs. Clayton, Williams, and Sprague.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented a memorial, numerously signed, from manufacturers of furred hats, in the city of Philadelphia, representing that, previous to the passage of the last tariff, hatters' furs were introduced free of duty; but by that tariff, the same rate of duty (25 per cent.) was imposed on unfinished hats and unmanufactured furs as was imposed on hats finished; which operated as no incidental protection to them at all. They state that if the 25 per cent. duty be retained on furs, it will throw thousands of hatters in this country out of employment, and ruin the business; and, therefore, pray that unmanufactured furs may be admitted free of duty: referred to the Committee on Manufactures.

On motion of Mr. WRIGHT, the memorial of William Quackenboss and others, the sureties of Samuel Swartwout, which he presented on Thursday last, was, in addition to other documents on the same subject, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. W. also presented the petition of the widow of Joseph Conckey, a soldier in the Revolutionary war, for a pension: referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. W. also presented the memorial of Taylor, Morrell, & Co., of New York city, praying that a law might be passed changing the name of the ship Westchester: referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. W. also presented a memorial of a large number of citizens of Seneca county, New York, praying that Congress would repeal the bankrupt law: referred to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. CRITTENDEN presented a memorial from the widow of Joseph Nourse, deceased, praying the payment of a sum of money to her, which was decreed to her deceased husband by the Supreme Court, in a suit against the United States; which, with other documents on the files, was referred to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented the proceedings of a meeting of citizens of Philadelphia, of which Mr. John M. Scott was chairman, accompanied by a memorial urging strongly upon Congress the propriety of their deciding upon the claims for French spoliations prior to 1800: referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. MILLER presented the memorial of Constant R. King and Julia Headley, children of Joseph King, deceased, late a paymaster and clothier in the Revolutionary army, praying to be allowed bounty land on account of the services of their deceased father: referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Also presented a memorial from the representatives of Samuel Nicholson, deceased, late a captain in the naval service, praying to be allowed an amount of pay withheld from him by the United States, while under arrest, of which he was afterwards honorably acquitted: referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. BERRIEN presented a petition from Richard H. Wilde, praying that Congress will pass a law extending to him the benefit of the copyright law of the United States, in the publication of a work of which he is the author, and which he is compelled, from the nature of the work, to have first printed in Europe: referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BARROW, agreeably to notice, on leave, introduced a bill for the relief of Thos. W. Chinn; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. STURGEON presented a petition from Samuel Grice of Philadelphia, praying remuneration for certain losses under a contract with the Navy Department for cutting certain timber, in consequence of interruption by hostile Indians: referred to the Committee on Claims.

JUDGES OF UNITED STATES COURTS.

Mr. TAPPAN, agreeably to notice given, and on leave, introduced a joint resolution so to amend the Constitution of the United States as to limit the term of office of the judges of the Supreme and Inferior Courts of the United States; which was read twice, and made the special order of the day for the first Monday in January, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. YOUNG presented the petition of James Trumbull, of Pike county, Illinois, praying for the privilege of relocating a quarter section of land received on account of military services during the late war; and also for a pension: referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. YOUNG also gave notice that he would, on to-morrow, ask leave to introduce bills of the following titles, to wit:

An act granting an additional quantity of land to the State of Illinois, to aid in the completion of the Illinois and Michigan canal.

An act appropriating the proceeds of the rents of the United States lead-mines in the State of Illinois, and Territories of Wisconsin and Iowa, for the improvement of the navigation at the Rock River and Des Moines rapids, in the Mississippi river.

An act making further appropriations for the continuation of the Cumberland road, in the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois; and

An act making a further appropriation for the completion of the public works, and rebuilding the light-house at the harbor of Chicago.

Mr. GRAHAM presented the petition of Daniel Murray, praying certain allowances for carrying the United States mail: referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. WOODBURY presented petitions from Olive Thompson and Margaret Gould, widows of revolutionary soldiers, praying pensions: referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. W. also presented the petition of William Russell, of the schooner Perch, praying for fishing bounty: referred to the Committee on Commerce.

On motion of Mr. WOODBURY, leave was granted D. T. Maurice to withdraw from the files of the Senate certain documents.

FINE ON GENERAL JACKSON.

Mr. LINN gave notice that he would on to morrow ask leave to introduce certain bills; among which was a bill to indemnify General Andrew Jackson the fine of $1,000, with costs, imposed on him for discharging his official duties, by Judge Hall of New Orleans.

Mr. BATES presented a petition from Lucy Davis, a widow of a soldier of the Revolution, praying for a pension: referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. ARCHER presented the memorial of the legal representatives of Richard Harris and Nimrod Farrow; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE presented the petition of Lemuel Bingham, praying compensation for property taken from him by a band of Pottawatomie Indians: referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

THE EXPUNGING RESOLUTION.

Mr. BENTON gave notice that, when the resolution introduced by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] to rescind the expunging resolution, came up for consideration, he would move to amend it with the following as a substitute:

That the resolution expunging from the Senate Journal the sentence of condemnation against President Jackson for removing the public deposites from the Bank of the United States, commonly called "the expunging resolution," was an act done by the Senate in conformity to the will of the people, authentically expressed in the popular elections, and in the instructions from the General Assemblies of the States, after a full and fair submission of the question to the people and the States for their consideration and decision. And the said "expunging resolution" having been thus adopted, in accordance with such expressed will and instructions, it is incompatible with the principles of representative Government, and inconsistent with the respect due to the people and the States, and unbecoming the Senate, to act upon any proposition for rescinding the said "expunging resolution," while the said instructions of the States and the said expressed will of the people remain unrevoked and unaltered by any subsequent instruction or expression of the public will.

Resolved, That the thanks of the country are due to General Jackson, ex-President of the United States, for having, by his courage, patriotism, and sagacity, in removing the public deposites from the Bank of the United States, in 1833, and in placing his veto upon the renewed charter of that bank, in 1832, thereby saved the Government and people of the United States from the pecuniary loss, the political corruption, and the moral pollution, which a longer connexion with that institution must have brought upon them.

Mr. BENTON then submitted the following resolution; which lies over one day under the rule, viz:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to inform the Senate as follows:

1. The number and estimated value of vessels which will be required in the African squadron under the late British treaty.
2. The probable annual cost of repairing said vessels.
3. The number of men and officers which the equipment of the squadron will require.
4. The probable annual loss of men from deaths, desertion, and other casualties, on board said squadron.
5. The probable annual expenditure of said squadron, under all the heads of expenditure incident to the service.
6. Whether it is intended to make the squadron consist of more than eighty guns, and the calibre of the guns to be used.
7. The whole number of guns which it is expected to have afloat in the United States navy during the year 1843, and the estimated expense of the naval establishment for the year, including all expenses incident to keeping up the navy.

Mr. CLAYTON gave notice that he would on to-morrow ask leave to introduce a bill, to be entitled An act to amend the act of 1842, supplementary to the acts to establish the judicial system of the United States.

Mr. FULTON presented the petition of sundry citizens of Scott county, Arkansas, praying Congress for a donation of a quarter section of land on which to erect their county buildings: referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

On motion of Mr. LINN,

The Senate adjourned.

Mr. CHARLES BROWN presented the petition of sixty hatters, of Philadelphia, praying that the duty recently imposed on foreign furs be repealed: referred to the Committee on Manufactures.

ABOLITION.

Mr. FILLMORE rose and said, as the standing committees had been appointed, and as this was a short session, he would move that the President's message be taken up for reference.

Mr. ADAMS objected; the business in order being his resolution to rescind the 21st rule, on which, for three previous days of the session, the House had refused to order the main question.

Mr. FILLMORE urged the necessity of referring the President's message; and observed that the resolution of the gentleman from Massachusetts would come up when the message was disposed of.

Mr. ADAMS persisted in his objection.

Mr. WM. COST JOHNSON said, if the resolution of the gentleman from Massachusetts was thus to obstruct the public business, he would move that it be laid upon the table.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON called for the yeas and nays; which being ordered, resulted—yeas 106, nays 102, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Landaff W. Andrews, Arrington, Atherton, Barton, Beeson, Bidlack, Black, Bowne, Boyd, Milton Brown, Charles Brown, Burke, William Butler, William O. Butler, Green W. Caldwell, Patrick C. Caldwell, John Campbell, Wm. B. Campbell, Thomas J. Campbell, Caruthers, Cary, Casey, Clifford, Clinton, Mark A. Cooper, Cross, Daniel, Dean, Deberry, Doan, Eastman, John C. Edwards, Charles A. Floyd, Fornance, Gamble, Gerry, Gilmer, Goggin, Wm. O. Goode, Harris, Hastings, Hays, Holmes, Hopkins, Houck, Houston, Hubard, Charles J. Ingersoll, Jack, William Cost Johnson, Cave Johnson, John W. Jones, Isaac D. Jones, Keim, Abraham McClellan, McKay, Mallory, Marchand, Thomas F. Marshall, Mathews, Medill, Meriwether, Miller, Mitchell, Moore, Newhard, Owsley, Payne, Pearce, Pickens, Plumer, Pope, Powell, Rayner, Reding, Reucher, Reynolds, Riggs, Rogers, Saunders, Shaw, Shepperd, William Smith, Snyder, Sollers, Sprigg, Steenrod, Summers, Sumter, Sweney, Taliaferro, John B. Thompson, Jacob Thompson, Triplett, Turney, Van Buren, Ward, Warren, Washington, Watterson, Weller, Westbrook, Christopher L. Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Wise, and Wood.—106.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Allen, Sherlock J. Clarke, James Cooper, Cowen, Cranston, Cravens, Cushing, Garret Davis, R. D. Davis, Doig, John Edwards, Egbert, Everett, Ferris, Fessenden, Fillmore, John G. Floyd, A. Lawrence Foster, Gates, Giddings, Patrick G. Goode, Gordon, Granger, Hall, Halsted, Henry, Howard, Hudson, Hunt, Joseph R. Ingersoll, James Irvin, W. W. Irwin, James, John P. Kennedy, Andrew Kennedy, Lane, Linn, Littlefield, Lowell, Robert McClellan, McKennan, McKeon, Alfred Marshall, Samson Mason, Mathiot, Mattocks, Maxwell, Maynard, Morgan, Morris, Morrow, Osborne, Parmenter, Patridge, Pendleton, Ramsey, Benjamin Randall, Read, Ridgway, Rodney, Roosevelt, Wm. Russell, James M. Russell, Salstonstall, Slade, Truman Smith, Stanly, Stokely, Stratton, Alexander H. H. Stuart, Richard W. Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, Tomlinson, Trumbull, Van Rensselaer, Wallace, Joseph L. White, Winthrop, Yorke, and John Young—102.

The resolution was, therefore, laid on the table.

THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE—THE EXCHEQUER.

Mr. FILLMORE submitted the motion which he had before intimated his desire to offer. It was in the following terms:

Resolved, That so much of the President's annual message and accompanying documents as relates to our intercourse with foreign nations, be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

That so much thereof as relates to the treasury and financial concerns of the Government, including the exchequer plan and the tariff, be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

That so much thereof as relates to the warehousing system, be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

That so much thereof as relates to the army and military defences of the country, be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

That so much thereof as relates to the public lands, be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

That so much thereof as relates to the navy and maritime defences of the country, be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

That so much thereof as relates to the Post Office Department, be referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

That so much thereof as relates to the reimbursing a fine imposed on General Jackson at New Orleans, be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. PICKENS suggested to the gentleman from New York the propriety of amending his resolution, so as to move that the House go into Committee of the Whole on the President's message. A practice had grown up, which had subverted the old order of things; but he hoped the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means would take such steps as would bring the House back to the good old Republican custom of responding to the President's message.

Mr. FILLMORE said the reason why he had not moved to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the President's message was, because the experience of the last few years had shown that such a course was only to waste a large portion of the time of the session with a debate resulting in nothing. For two or three sessions, the President's message was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and he believed at one of those sessions the message never came out of the committee, and was not referred to the standing committees for their consideration. In consequence, at the last session the message was taken up in the House, and referred to the committees. The utility of that course was felt at that time, when they were commencing a long session; but the propriety of it, he thought, was much greater now, when they were commencing a short session.

Mr. PICKENS said the experience of the House was directly against the motion of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means. If they agreed to a motion to go into Committee of the Whole, the object would be a general discussion, which must take place on some question; and, if it took place now, at an early period of the session, the House would be then prepared for efficient legislation. It was well known that hardly any business was ever done before the holydays; and, therefore, if the President's message were now referred to the Committee of the Whole, gentlemen could express their views in defence of, or reply to, the topics of the message; and the House would be then ready for business. This course, it must be obvious, would expedite the public business. He thought this was the more appropriate mode, and that the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means would find its adoption the best policy.

Mr. W. C. JOHNSON said, as this was to be a short session, it would be better to refer the different portions of the message to the committees; and those members of the House who desired to make speeches upon it would have time to mature their views, and the discussion would then be interesting. If, however, there were any gentlemen that would rise on that floor and say they were anxious to go into a discussion of the message generally, he, for one, as far as his vote would go, would go against the previous question; but, if there was no gentleman anxious to go into such a discussion, he (Mr. JOHNSON) would vote for the proposition of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, considering it the wisest course to pursue, especially at a short session.

Mr. CUSHING inquired if there was any, and what, disposition to be made of that part of the message respecting the proposed amendment of the laws relating to the Treasury Department.

Mr. FILLMORE said there was, and that it was proposed to refer that portion of the message to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. CUSHING said he should propose that that portion of the message be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and his reason was, that, by the rules of the House, the bills of the last session were continued to this; and that amongst those bills, there was one on the calendar on this very subject. His anxious wish was—he did not know how far the House would participate with him—that the House should reach this subject as soon as possible, that the country might know whether there was any prospect of a favorable disposition of it. The most expeditious and the fairest way was to take up the bill now on the calendar, at the earliest moment, and in anticipation of the ordinary bills of the session from the Committee of Ways and Means, and to associate therewith the portion of the President's message to which he had alluded; and the House could then proceed to the discussion and consideration of that question, in relation to which there was so much expectation throughout the country.

The SPEAKER put the question on the motion of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. PICKENS] to refer the message to the Committee of the Whole House; and it was negatived.

The Clerk again read the propositions of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, which it was suggested should be acted upon separately.

When the motion for the reference of so much of the President's message as related to the Treasury Department came up in order, (the preceding proposition having been agreed to,)

Mr. CUSHING renewed his motion for a division of the resolution, so that the portion he had specified, and for the reasons he had given, might go to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. FILLMORE said the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts had been put upon a ground which was not tenable. He (Mr. FILLMORE) had no desire to throw any obstacles in the way, for, on the contrary, he regretted that the subject was not discussed at the last session. The bill, however, was now on the calendar as one of the orders of the day, and, therefore, it would be in order any day to move to go into committee on that bill. The reference of the message, as he proposed, would throw obstacles in the way of the gentleman from Massachusetts; for that bill was by no means the plan of the Executive Department. This part of the President's message then might be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and the House might still go on with the consideration of the bill.

Mr. CUSHING said, if the plan of the gentleman from New York, for the simultaneous consideration of the message and the bill by the Committee of Ways and Means and the Committee of the Whole, were agreed to, and he (Mr. CUSHING) should move to-morrow to go into committee on the bill, he should be met with the cry of "Oh! wait; for this matter is in the hands of a standing committee; wait until we get their report." The gentleman's course was an illogical one.

If they referred this subject to a standing committee, notwithstanding the bill was before the House, they must expect to get something from that committee. But, suppose he was not encountered with this objection, on moving to go into Committee of the Whole; in that committee he should be encountered with the objection that this matter was in the hands of a standing committee, and that that committee would give them a report which ought to be received and considered before this subject was disposed of; and there would thus be an impediment to the despatch of this bill. But, for a further reason, what was the precise object of the gentleman's motion? There was in Committee of the Whole a matured bill, which had been before the House and the country for nearly a year; but the gentleman from New York said that was not the identical plan of the Executive, nor the precise scheme recommended by the President's message. Now, it was immaterial whether there was more or less difference; it was a bill reported by a committee, to whom a similar recommendation was submitted; and he urged upon the House to follow out that course. The House, at the last session, referred this matter to a committee of the friends of the measure, and they deliberated and reported this bill to the House; and now, what was it the gentleman from New York proposed? Did he propose to refer it to a committee of the friends of the measure? If he were proposing to refer it to a committee of the friends of the measure, he would be performing a work of supererogation, for they had before them the ideas of such a committee. What, then, was the object of the gentleman? Was it to refer it to its enemies that it might be crushed and damned? Was that the gentleman's object? If it were, he (Mr. CUSHING) submitted that the course proposed was not a just or a fair one; it was against the rules of all fair proceedings, as laid down in the books on parliamentary law; and he therefore adhered to his original views, and to a course which was both straightforward and equitable. He hoped the House would refer this portion of the message to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, that they might proceed to its consideration with the bill now in the committee.

Mr. PICKENS was disposed to favor the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. CUSHING,] as he wished to give the Administration a fair hearing before the country on this great measure, upon which they had staked themselves. He was willing that the reference should be made to the Committee of the Whole, where a full discussion might be had upon its merits. He thought it due to the President, and but an act of fairness and justice. He was opposed to its going to the Committee of Ways and Means, although he was a member of that committee; not because they were its enemies, (as the gentleman from Massachusetts had said,) for of that he knew nothing; but because he desired the friends of the President, who were here in a minority, to have ample scope for a fair appeal to the country upon a measure to which, as he understood it now, he (Mr. P.) was utterly opposed. He did not know what shape it would assume; but he could not go for the principles of a measure which looked to making Government paper, as a permanent system, for circulation.

Mr. EVERETT was very desirous that the plan of the Executive should have a fair examination. It had been referred to a committee of its friends, and they damned it; and he now wished it to be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and he should have no objection that they be instructed to report the bill of the Executive, that a direct vote might be taken upon it.

Mr. CHARLES J. INGERSOLL, after a few remarks, which were inaudible at the reporter's desk, observed that he wished to give this measure the direction which its friends preferred; but he first desired to know from the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. CUSHING,] whether there was any difference between the bill reported by the select committee at the last session, and the plan reported by the Secretary of the Treasury, and recommended by the President; and, if so, in what the difference consisted.

Mr. CUSHING said that that was one of those questions which could not be answered by yes or no; it must be answered by a statement of facts; and, if the House would permit him, he would make such an explanation as he doubted not would be satisfactory to the gentleman.

Mr. INGERSOLL wished to know whether the plans were the same in principle.

Mr. CUSHING said that he would be glad to answer that question, if the House would permit him. No objection being made, Mr. C. went on to say, that the bill recommended by the President, and the one reported by the select committee, were substantially the same in proposing a certain plan of finance. They differed, however, in two points; and these were in regard to the proportion the bills to be issued are to bear to the specie on hand, and in regard to exchanges. The bill of the House allowed the issue only of notes, dollar for dollar of specie on hand; while the plan of the Secretary of the Treasury allowed the issue of three dollars of notes for every dollar of specie. Again: the bill of the select committee excluded all dealings in exchange, except such as might be ordered by the Secretary of the Treasury, for the purposes of the Government; while the Treasury plan proposed to authorize the dealing in exchanges.

Mr. BOTTS called Mr. C. to order, on the ground that he was going into the merits of the question.

The CHAIR decided that the gentleman from Massachusetts had been permitted, by the general consent of the House, to make an explanation in detail; and that, therefore, he had a right to go on.

Mr. CUSHING observed that he had explained what the two material differences were in the two exchequer bills; and he would only add that there were a few other differences, which were questions merely of machinery, details, &c.

Mr. C J. INGERSOLL expressed his thanks to the gentleman from Massachusetts for giving him all the explanation he desired. He would then say that he would vote for the reference to the Committee of Ways and Means of the President's project, as he was decidedly and immovably opposed to it; but he had no objection to the reference of the bill of the select committee to the Committee of the Whole House, because he believed that something might be made of it. He was opposed to it for another reason: he was opposed to any treasury plan that originated with the Executive; for he thought it high time that this House should resume the right, of which it had divested itself, of beginning such matters here.

Mr. EVERETT moved to amend the motion of the gentleman from New York, so as to commit the subject to the Committee of Ways and Means, with instructions to report a bill in strict conformity with the plan of finance presented by the Secretary of the Treasury at the last session, and recommended by the President; and also that the committee report their opinion whether said bill ought to pass.

Mr. HOLMES expressed his astonishment that, on a measure which, of all others, required the most mature deliberation—a measure which was proposed for remedying all the evils which have afflicted the country, and a measure which, if it should ever come up for discussion, would draw to it all the financial ability and the acumen of the greatest minds in the House—a proposition should be made, by way of instructions, which was to decide it at once. He was decidedly opposed to the motion, as, in principle, it violated all the established practices of the House. He wished a decision on this important subject to be made after a free and ample discussion, and not in advance, by giving instructions to a committee.

Mr. W. C. JOHNSON preferred a reference to the Committee of the Whole, for the simple reason that the bill and message should go to the same committee. If the reference should be made to the Committee of the Whole, it would be then in the power of the gentleman from Vermont to move to refer the plan of the Select Committee to the Committee of the Whole; and thus the two plans could be under discussion at the same time, and the one selected that might be found to be the most desirable.

In regard to the exchequer scheme, he thought there should be some decision on it, one way or other, before the close of the session.

Mr. CUSHING here modified his motion, so as to strike out the second resolution of Mr. FILLMORE, and insert his amendment as a substitute.

Mr. EVERETT then observed that it would then be in order for him to move to amend the original resolution before it was stricken out, and he therefore offered his amendment at this time.

Mr. WISE observed that the motion of the gentleman from Vermont struck him as a singular mode of offering an amendment. At the very moment, said Mr. W., we are for referring the matter to a committee, for the purpose of considering and reporting which plan of finance is the best, the gentleman from Vermont was for deciding it at once, by instructing the Committee of Ways and Means to take one particular plan, and no other. Instead of deliberating on this important question, the gentleman proposed that they should dispense with deliberation; and yet, forsooth, he did not propose to offer any opinion on the subject. If he wanted to make experiments on this body, why not put it at once into the receiver, as proposed by his friend from Massachusetts? The gentleman could best accomplish his objects by concurring in the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts, and going into a discussion of the subject in Committee of the Whole. Gentlemen seemed to have waked up, all at once, to the exchequer bill. This time twelve months ago, the President recommended the exchequer plan; and it was (parliamentary law being, in that instance, observed) referred to a committee of its friends, under the vain hope that they never would be able to agree upon a report. A report, however—and an elaborate one, too—was made; and from that time to this, no further action had been had on it. We do not (said Mr. W.) ask you to adopt the plan of the select committee; but we do say that it is just as good a nucleus—just as good a foundation to build on—as any that could be proposed, unless gentlemen wished to mature a plan out of the House, instead of in the House. He cared not, personally, how this subject was disposed of; but he submitted to the House that the views presented by the gentleman from Massachusetts, urging the justice and propriety of considering in Committee of the Whole the report of the select committee of the last session, was the most conducive to the despatch of business.

Mr. EVERETT remarked that the gentleman seemed to suppose that there was danger lest the Committee of Ways and Means should form a bill out of the House. He had no apprehension of any such danger. The only plan that would be reported, would be that of the Executive. He thought that the Executive had not been fairly dealt by, and had reason to complain. Therefore he wished the plan of exchequer system of the President to be brought before the House for its action.

Mr. W. COST JOHNSON suggested that, if it was the object of the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. EVERETT] to bring the House to a test at once, he had better modify his proposition, by moving to instruct the Committee of the Whole, instead of the Committee of Ways and Means. The committee might report the bill; and if there was a majority for it, in one hour it might be passed. Yet he (Mr. J.) was not anxious to force others to a decision at once. He had not himself examined the plans and reports, except that of the Secretary of the Treasury, for which he might be inclined to give his vote, if for either.

After some conversation between Messrs. EVERETT and JOHNSON,

Mr. PICKENS inquired whether he was to understand the gentleman from Vermont as moving to instruct the committee to report the bill prepared by the select committee of last session, or that by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. EVERETT said that he meant the bill of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. PICKENS remarked that, if so, by voting for the instructions proposed by the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. EVERETT,] he should be construed as having committed himself in favor of the measure. (Cries of No.) Gentlemen might think otherwise; but such he imagined would be the inference from the House journals twenty years hence.

The SPEAKER suggested that there was no instance of the Committee of the Whole having been instructed to report a particular bill. It was the custom of the Committee of the Whole to report bills which had previously come from the standing or select committees of the House.

Mr. McKENNAN rose to appeal to the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. EVERETT] to withdraw his amendment to the resolution of reference. He saw no good that could be answered by such positive instructions to the Committee of Ways and Means. That committee would have the whole subject before them, and he thought their hands should not be bound. He was in favor of giving them an opportunity to make a report.

Mr. J. G. FLOYD, after an inquiry as to the question before the House, proceeded to say that, as he understood the parliamentary rule, it was customary that propositions from the Executive shou'd be referred to committees friendly to their adoption. Indeed, this was the only practicable method of legislation. Now, this was a proposition to refer the recommendations contained in the message of the President to the Committee of Ways and Means—a committee which was well understood to be unfavorable to their adoption. He was opposed to this course; neither did he think it just to instruct the committee to report the identical measure formerly recommended by the President. The more proper course was, to refer that part of the message relating to the exchequer plan to a committee of its friends, who would give it the fairest consideration, and bring out every argument in its favor.

He would refer the House to a passage in the speech of a former distinguished member, which contained, as he conceived, the proper doctrine. This speech was made by the Hon. John Bell, at the commencement of the first session of the 26th Congress, and was in reply to the remarks of the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. PICKENS,] in relation to the appointment of committees. The ground taken was, that the Executive should have proper committees to report upon its recommendations. [He here read the passage alluded to.] It had thus seemed to the distinguished member from Tennessee [Mr. Bell] that there were certain committees which came more in contact with the Executive than others; and these committees should be constituted of a majority of its friends. It was not for him to inquire how far the present incumbent of the chair had conformed to this idea of Mr. Bell, of appointing committees with a view to their co-operation with the Executive. He had only designed to cite this authority, and refer to the former practice of the House. With these views, he should vote against the proposition to refer to the Committee of Ways and Means, and in favor of that to refer to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. EVERETT rose, and withdrew his motion to refer to the Committee of Ways and Means, with instructions to report the exchequer bill prepared by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. C. J. INGERSOLL here called for a division of the question of striking out the Committee of Ways and Means, as proposed by Mr. FILLMORE, and inserting the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, as proposed by Mr. CUSHING; so as to take the vote first on striking out, and then upon inserting.

The SPEAKER, however, subsequently decided that, according to the 48th rule of the House, a motion to strike out and insert was indivisible.

Mr. TILLINGHAST said he would make an explanation as to the vote he should give on the present occasion, which, he had no doubt, would apply to others as well as himself. It was true, that it was parliamentary to refer executive propositions to their friends; but this rule did not here apply. The reason of the rule was to prevent the suppression of important measures, by referring them to inimical committees. In the present case, the measure had already been referred to a committee of its friends, and a bill reported. He could not say how he should vote upon the measure—whether for or against it: that would depend upon the details which it might contain. He thought it best to submit it to as much examination as possible, both for and against it.

Mr. CUSHING inquired whether the gentleman contemplated that the House should wait until the Committee of Ways and Means had made a report before it proceeded to take action upon the subjects recommended in the message of the President.

Mr. TILLINGHAST said, No. The House might go on and discuss the measure; but might be relieved by the report, which would come in during the discussion. It was a matter of vast importance to the country, and he saw no objection to having it examined by men both in favor of, and opposed to, its adoption.

The question was then taken on Mr. CUSHING's motion to strike out "the Committee of Ways and Means," and insert "the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union," as the committee whose duty it should be to consider the portion of the message relating to a re-organization of the Treasury Department, and the establishment of an exchequer system. The House refused to strike out and insert—yeas 100, nays 105, as follows:

The remaining resolutions of reference (except the last) were adopted nem. con.

Mr. W. W. IRWIN moved to refer so much of the message as relates to the remission of General Jackson's fine, to a select committee, instead of the Committee on the Judiciary, as proposed by Mr. FILLMORE's resolution.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON proposed an amendment, instructing the committee to report a bill.

Mr. C. J. INGERSOLL suggested that a bill had already been reported at the last session, and now remained on the calendar.

Mr. IRWIN modified his motion so as to propose the reference of the subject to the Committee of the Whole House, which now had charge of the bill reported for the remission of the fine.

Mr. C. J. INGERSOLL said he should like to have the motion amended. He moved that the committee be instructed to act without delay. [Laughter.]

The question recurring on the motion to refer to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON called for the yeas and nays; which were taken, and resulted—yeas 97, nays 103, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Arrington, Atherton, Beeson, Bidlack, Black, Bowne, Boyd, Brewster, Milton Brown, Charles Brown, Burke, William O. Butler, Green W. Caldwell, Patrick C. Williams, Winthrop, Yorke, Augustus Young, and John Young—103.

So the House refused to refer to the Committee of the Whole; and Mr. FILLMORE's last resolution, referring the subject to the Committee on the Judiciary, was adopted.

Mr. READ asked leave to offer a series of resolutions, but withdrew them upon objection being made to their consideration.

Mr. W. W. IRWIN offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That so much of the President's message as relates to the continuance of the improvements of the navigation of our Western waters and the lake harbors, so far as relates to unfinished works, be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means; and so far as the same may relate to new works on the Western waters, to the Committee on Roads and Canals; and to new improvements in lake and other harbors, to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. R. W. THOMPSON moved to strike out "Roads and Canals," and insert "a select committee."

Mr. SPRIGG offered an amendment, (the purport of which could not be definitely gathered,) and briefly explained its object.

Mr. PICKENS observed that the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky was too complicated to be appended to the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. IRWIN.] He would therefore suggest that the gentleman from Kentucky should withdraw it, or move that it be laid upon the table until it could be printed. It seemed, however, to him, (Mr. P.,) that if the gentleman wished to get the information, he had better direct his amendment as a resolution to the heads of departments, from whom the information could be obtained more expeditiously.

Mr. WISE said the amendment embraced a subject foreign to the original proposition, and therefore was not in order.

Mr. W. W. IRWIN made some observations on the propriety of referring this whole subject to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. R. W. THOMPSON regretted to see a proposition so interesting to his State embarrassed and encumbered with such an amendment; and he predicted that the session would pass away before its object could be accomplished, if the design of its mover should prevail. There was much in the amendment about which he should like to hear all that could be said; but to append it to the motion before the House, would only create embarrassment. He, therefore, hoped the gentleman would withdraw his proposition. He (Mr. T.) then moved the reference of the subjects embraced in the original motion to a select committee, to be composed of gentlemen from the several portions of the Union immediately interested in it, that there might be obtained an expression of opinion from Western and Southwestern gentlemen.

Mr. FILLMORE explained, and justified the reference to the three enumerated standing committees.

Mr. W. W. IRWIN accordingly agreed so to modify his resolution.

Mr. SPRIGG explained.

Mr. HOLMES said, whatever diversity of opinion there might exist in that House as to the propriety or impropriety of improving the several points of the country by Federal money, there could be no difference of opinion on this point—that it was better to preserve the country before they improved it. From the President's message, they learned that there was a deficiency of ten millions of dollars in the treasury; and, therefore, it should first occupy their attention how they were to provide, and whether they could provide enough to carry on their great system. But, with this deficit in the treasury before them, gentlemen were starting their projects of improvements in the harbors and the Western waters, without once considering whether they could exist as a Union—not for want of sentiment to rally around the Union, but for want of aliment to sustain it. Considering the present position of the treasury, and the deficiency of ways and means, he moved to lay the resolution and all the amendments on the table.

The yeas and nays were called for, but not ordered; and the motion to lay on the table was negatived.

The motion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. THOMPSON] to refer the subject to a select committee was also negatived.

Mr. SPRIGG withdrew his amendment; and, after a few words from Mr. R. W. THOMPSON, Mr. PICKENS, and Mr. McKENNAN,

Mr. IRWIN's resolution was agreed to.

The House then adjourned.

In addition to the members already announced as present, the following appeared in their places to day:

Messrs. LANDAFF W. ANDREWS, E J. BLACK, GEORGE B. CARY, (erroneously stated to have been present on the first day of the session,) CARUTHERS, JOHN CAMPBELL, W. B CAMPBELL, I D. JONES, LANE, T. F. MARSHALL, JOHN POPE, J. T. STUART, DAVID WALLACE, JOHN YOUNG, PHILIP TRIPLETT, and A. C. DODGE, delegate.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, December 13, 1842.

Mr. CONRAD, of Louisiana; Mr. CHOATE, of Massachusetts; and Mr. McROBERTS, of Illinois, appeared in their seats to-day.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. laid before the Senate the petition of Benjamin Franklin, praying for a naval pension: referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Also laid before the Senate a communication from Charles F. Mayer of Baltimore, covering a copy of the proceedings of a meeting held in that city, of the claimants for indemnity for spoliations committed by the French prior to 1800; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Also laid before the Senate a communication from the Navy Department, in compliance with the joint resolution of Congress of 29th May, 1830, enclosing a letter from the Commissioner of Pensions, containing a list of the names of persons who have applied for relief under the naval pension laws, and whose claims were rejected, and the reasons for rejecting the same; which was, on motion of Mr. BAYARD, ordered to be printed.

Also, laid before the Senate a communication from Alexander Vattemare, in relation to certain documents printed by order of the Chamber of Peers of France, and by them ordered to be transmitted to the Senate of the United States.

On motion of Mr. WOODBURY, referred to the Committee on the Library, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. ARCHER presented a memorial from the Board of Common Council of the city of Alexandria, praying certain amendments to their charter; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

On motion of Mr. KERR, it was Ordered, That the papers of Francis Cazeau be taken from the files of the Senate, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WRIGHT presented a memorial from the Chamber of Commerce of the city of New York, praying Congress to pass a law adopting the warehousing system as a part of the revenue system. Mr. W. remarked that the memorial, coming from practical merchants, no doubt contained many suggestions which might be valuable to Congress in its action upon this subject; he therefore moved that it be printed, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HUNTINGTON hoped the Senator from New York would withdraw the motion for reference for the present. The warehousing system was a subject of great importance, and, primarily, was a subject of commercial policy, and not of finance; and should therefore, when referred, go to the Committee on Commerce. He hoped the Senator would let the matter be printed, and leave the question of reference for future consideration.

Mr. WRIGHT had no objection to the course suggested; and the question of reference was postponed until after the document shall have been printed.

BOARD OF EXCHEQUER.

Mr. TALLMADGE, agreeably to notice, and on leave, introduced a bill amendatory of the several acts establishing the Treasury Department; which was read twice, and ordered to be printed; and,

On the further motion of Mr. T., who said the bill was precisely of the same character as that introduced by him at the last session, it was postponed till Tuesday two weeks, and made the special order for that day.

THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

The President's message was then taken up, and referred as follows:

On motion by Mr. EVANS, so much as related to finance was referred to the Committee on Finance.

On motion by Mr. ARCHER, so much as related to foreign affairs to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

On motion by Mr. LINN, so much as related to improvements in the Western waters to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

On motion by Mr. HUNTINGTON, so much as related to commerce and navigation to the Committee on Commerce.

On motion by Mr. SMITH of Indiana, so much as related to the public domain to the Committee on Public Lands.

On motion by Mr. BAYARD, so much as related to naval affairs to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

On motion by Mr. CRITTENDEN, so much as related to military affairs to the Committee on Military Affairs; and

On motion by Mr. WHITE, so much as related to Indian affairs to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. BAYARD presented a petition from Commander Charles Ridgely, praying that certain allowances may be made to him in the settlement of his accounts in the Navy Department; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Messrs. EVANS, LINN, GRAHAM, CHOATE, FULTON, and KING, severally gave notice that they would, on to-morrow, ask leave to introduce certain bills.

Mr. CONRAD presented a memorial from Elizabeth Lawson, only child and heir of the late Gen. E. W. Ripley, praying the payment of the amount of a certain verdict obtained against the United States by her father: referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. TAPPAN presented a memorial from citizens of Washington county, Pennsylvania, praying the establishing of a post-route from Washington, Pennsylvania, to Steubenville, Ohio: referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

BILLS INTRODUCED ON LEAVE.

Mr. GRAHAM, agreeably to notice, and on leave, introduced a bill for the relief of Stalker & Hill; which was read twice, and referred to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. PORTER, agreeably to notice, and on leave, introduced a bill relating to the offices of surveyors general of the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Michigan; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. GRAHAM, agreeably to notice, and on leave, introduced the following joint resolution; which was read, and laid over for the present, viz:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That the following be added to the joint rules of the two Houses:

Whenever a claim against the United States, of any description, has been, or shall be, presented to either House, and referred to a committee, and such committee shall have made a report in writing against the allowance of the claim, and the same shall have been concurred in by such House, it shall not be in order to revive the consideration of such claim in that House, at the same or any future session of Congress, either by bill, resolution, petition, or otherwise; except upon a memorial of the claimant, first setting forth, upon affidavit, that he has discovered new evidence in support of his claim since the decision against it, and a statement of the substance of such evidence; or, second, assigning specific errors in the report of the committee adverse to it, and a certificate of a member of that House that he believes that the former decision was erroneous as charged in said memorial: Provided, That an order discharging a committee from the further consideration of a claim, shall in nowise require compliance with the rule.

BANKRUPT LAW.

The resolution introduced some days ago by Mr. TALLMADGE, instructing the Committee on the Judiciary to inquire into the propriety of calling on the Secretary of State to elicit from the Judiciary department, and report to Congress at its next session, all the information that might be obtained as to the operation of the bankrupt act, came up in its order; when

Mr. KING said it appeared to him that, if they were to wait for the information called for by this resolution, the whole session would probably be consumed before they could act upon the subject of the repeal of that law. A very great delay in procuring the information sought for would be inevitable; and the matter would necessarily go over to the next session of Congress. He asked if it was the design of the honorable Senator to give the matter the go-by, in this manner, until the next session? Such, in his (Mr. KING's) opinion, would be the effect of the adoption of this resolution; and he could not, therefore, vote for it in its present form.

Mr. TALLMADGE said, in presenting the resolution, he had designed it as a resolution of inquiry, for information to be laid before the Judiciary Committee at the next session. That was the original form of the resolution; but, at the suggestion of some honorable gentlemen, that the information had better be obtained as speedily as possible, he had modified it in accordance with those suggestions. He did not anticipate any such delay as the honorable Senator from Alabama seemed to apprehend. He thought it was very important that the information should be obtained. If the Senate, however, should consider it desirable to proceed without it, it would be equally in their power to do so as if the resolution had not been passed. He hoped, therefore, that there would be no objection to its adoption.

Mr. CRITTENDEN said there was one particular in the resolution which appeared to him somewhat objectionable, inasmuch as it would lead to a very voluminous report, as it required from the Secretary of State a report of all the points which have been decided by the courts under the late bankrupt act. That seemed to him to be a matter for the employment of lawyers, rather than for the consideration of the Senate. The report would be a very costly one, and a very useless one, as far as the public were concerned. He considered, nevertheless, it was important that they should possess the information called for by the resolution, whether the law were repealed at this session or not; and he would therefore vote for the resolution, indulging, at the same time, the anticipation that the law would be repealed; for he was well convinced that the public opinion was against it, especially in his own State. There had been strong indications in that State that the public opinion was against it. As for himself, he had supposed that a temporary bankrupt law was better suited to the condition of the country than a permanent system, and had consequently preferred originally a bill limited in point of duration. This bill had had a limited duration, and it had accomplished, in his opinion, the purposes of humanity. He desired to be informed what number had been relieved by it. That there had been abuses, he had no doubt, as must be the case in the operation of all human laws. This being the case, and opinion prevailing very much against the law, he should feel himself constrained to vote for its repeal. Yet he was perfectly willing to vote for this resolution, provided it were amended so as to prevent the necessity for procuring a voluminous report of the various points argued and determined under the operation of the law.

Mr. TALLMADGE said the resolution did not call for arguments of the court, or details of opinion on the various points decided; but simply the points themselves. The law officers, no doubt, would give these in the most concise form. He had inserted in the resolution the words "points decided;" and, in doing so, he meant to have excluded opinions and decisions in detail. He would not then detain the Senate in any discussion as to whether the law had fulfilled its humane objects, or as to whether public opinion was in favor of its repeal; but when the subject again came up for consideration, he would show that, wherever its practical operation was known and felt, the law did not meet with public disapprobation; so far from it, many who were opposed to its passage, having witnessed its practical operation, had come to be decidedly in favor of it.

Mr. BERRIEN suggested to the Senator from New York [Mr. TALLMADGE] the propriety of accepting the modification recommended by the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CRITTENDEN.] He conceived the object which his friend from New York had in view would be fully attained by the call on the judicial officers for information relative to the number and decisions of cases acted upon. Those officers cannot make the required reports without adverting to the points of decision. He (Mr B.) was desirous that the Senator from New York should accept the proposed modification of the resolution, because it would certainly simplify the inquiry, and facilitate the making of the reports. It was of great importance to obtain, as speedily as possible, the fullest information in relation to the actual operation of the law. For, besides the advocates of that measure, and those not originally its advocates, but now desirous of its continuance, there are many who are in favor of a permanent bankrupt law, who do not approve of the present act, and are anxious to have some considerable modifications made—such as its practical operation may have suggested the necessity of. It was for the purpose of enabling such persons to present their views upon information promptly furnished, and without being subjected to the delay which would arise from the effects of the resolution in its original form, that he wished to see it modified according to the proposition of the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. TALLMADGE said he would accept the modification suggested.

The resolution, as modified, was then read.

Mr. BERRIEN suggested a further modification, in effect requiring the Secretary of State to report to Congress, from time to time, the reports and responses to the resolution, as soon as received by him.

This modification was also accepted; and the resolution, as modified, was then read as follows, and adopted:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State do communicate, with all convenient despatch, with the judicial officers of the United States who have had the execution of the bankrupt law, and ascertain from them the number of applications under the act, both voluntary and involuntary; the number of discharges; the opinions of the judges as to any amendments or modifications of the act; and such other information as he may deem necessary to show the effects and operations of the act; and that he report the same to the Senate, from time to time, as soon as the information shall be received.

CORPS OF REPORTERS.

Mr. BAYARD submitted the following resolution, which was read, viz:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to employ a corps of reporters, not exceeding five in number, for the residue of the present session, and at the commencement of each succeeding session of Congress, to report the proceedings and substance of the debates of the Senate, who shall be sworn or affirmed faithfully to discharge the duties of their office, and shall be allowed a compensation, to be paid out of the fund for contingent expenses, not exceeding sixty dollars per week for the principal reporter, and fifty dollars per week for each of the others. The business of reporting shall be so conducted, that the entire report of the proceedings and debates of each day shall, within three hours after the adjournment, be placed in the hands of the printer. The publication of the report shall be committed to the publishers of such one of the daily papers as will engage, free from all charge, first, to publish the entire report in their daily paper; secondly, to furnish proof slips thereof to any other paper in the District of Columbia; and, thirdly, to furnish two copies of the report for the use of each member of the Senate, and five copies for the office of the Secretary of the Senate, by 9 o'clock on the ensuing morning.

Resolved, That a seat on the floor of the Senate shall be assigned to the reporter actually on duty, by the President of the Senate.

Mr. BAYARD said that the resolution was the same as that introduced by him at the last session. He then gave his opinions at large on the propriety of its passage, which were no doubt remembered, and which were unnecessary to be repeated. He did not wish the resolution to be referred—as the subject had been referred twice—to select committees; and the committee at the last session had fully examined into it, and a report was made approving the plan, and showing its practical operations. As the Senate was thin, he did not desire to press the resolution then. It lies over.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana submitted the following resolution, which was read and adopted, viz:

Resolved, That the Committee on Roads and Canals be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation of a sum sufficient to complete the Cumberland road through the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, upon the most substantial and economical plan, using gravel in lieu of broken rock, where the former material can be procured at less expense than the latter; making said appropriations payable by annual instalments to the several States, so as to insure continuous operations, and surrendering the road to them, binding them to complete and keep the same in repair, levying no more tolls than may be necessary for that purpose.

Resolved, further, That said committee be instructed to inquire into the expediency of adopting the turnpike road from Springfield, Ohio, to Dayton, and from thence, via Eaton, to the Indiana State line, as a part of the Cumberland road: Provided, Said turnpike road can be obtained on terms to justify the same, taking into consideration the increase of distance and probable cost of completing the old route, as compared with the sum for which the turnpike already completed may be obtained.

EXPUNGING RESOLUTION.

The resolution of Mr. BAYARD to rescind the expunging resolution, came up in order on the calendar of business.

Mr. BAYARD said he was not desirous to take up the resolution for consideration at that time, as the Senate was not full, and as the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON,] who proposed an amendment, was not in his place. He therefore preferred that it should be laid on the table for the present. The resolution was accordingly laid on the table.

On motion of Mr. FULTON, the papers of Ephraim D. Dixon were ordered to be taken from the files, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

THE BANKRUPT LAW.

The bill introduced by Mr. BENTON, for the repeal of the bankrupt law, came up in order as in committee of the whole.

Mr. GRAHAM moved that it be postponed until to-morrow, as the Senator from Missouri [Mr. BENTON] was not in his seat. The question was put, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. G. gave notice, that when the bill again came up for consideration, he would move to amend it, by striking out all after the fifth line, and inserting the following; which was ordered to be printed, viz:

"Provided, nevertheless, That all petitions in bankruptcy instituted before the first day of the present session of Congress shall proceed to hearing and determination in the same manner, and under the same rules, regulations, and restrictions, as if the act aforesaid had not been repealed."

On motion by Mr. MOREHEAD,

The Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, December 13, 1842.

The proceedings of the House this day were opened with a prayer from the Rev. SEPTIMUS TUSTON, the chaplain of the Senate. The minutes of esterday were then read and approved.

On the motion of Mr. FILLMORE, the Committee of Ways and Means were authorized to employ a clerk.

DIGEST OF LAWS.

On the motion of Mr. J. R. INGERSOLL, the Judiciary Committee was authorized to inquire into the expediency of the Clerk of the House subscribing for a limited number of Gordon's Digest of the Laws of the United States, and of the Revenue Laws.

PRIVILEGE.

Mr. BOTTS rose, as he observed, to a question of privilege. He said he held in his hand a copy of the daily Albany Argus of October 25th, containing a letter written and signed by the Hon. John C. Spencer, a distinguished member of another branch of this Government, as the Secretary of War. That letter purported to have been written, first, for the purpose of furnishing a general defence of the Administration; but particularly for the justification of the somerset which he (the writer) had recently turned, and which might bring him into enviable distinction with any harlequin on the stage.

Mr. WISE. I ask if my colleague rises to a privileged question?

Mr. BOTTS. I do.

Mr. WISE. Then I ask that it may be stated; for I should like that we should all be heard on the question.

Mr. BOTTS continued. He would repeat that this letter appeared to have been written for the general purpose of defending this administration; also, for the justification of the political somerset which that Secretary had recently taken, and which might bring him into envious distinction with any harlequin.

Mr. CUSHING rose to a question of order.

The SPEAKER was understood to say that the gentleman from Virginia was not strictly in order.

Mr. WISE said if his colleague was about to comment on that letter, he would not be in order in doing so.

Mr. BOTTS continued, without regarding the interruption, and finished his sentence thus—but particularly to operate on the elections which were about to occur in the State of New York.

Mr. WISE said he would not rise to a question of order, if anything like equality in attack and defence would be entertained; but he made the point of order, that his colleague was commenting on a letter which had nothing to do with the business of this House. His colleague said he was about to comment on a letter addressed to the people at large.

Mr. BOTTS begged his colleague to have a little patience; he was about to comment on a paragraph relating to this House, and which contained a foul calumny, from which he, as a member of this House, felt bound to purge himself. It was a calumny on him, (Mr. BOTTS,) and on this House, which he meant to contradict.

Mr. WISE inquired if he was to understand that the Speaker entertained that as a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER said he knew not yet what it was; and he called upon the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BOTTS] to make his motion, and to state its ground.

Mr. BOTTS said he found in the letter the two following paragraphs:

"I may now advert to a fact long known to me, which has been promulgated in the newspapers of the day, vouched for by at least one Whig editor, stated by a Representative in Congress from Massachusetts, in a speech lately delivered at Newburyport, upon authority, and hitherto not denied. That fact is, that previous to returning the second bank bill to Congress with his objections, in full view of the assaults to be made upon him, and with the purpose of removing all cause of agitation, as well as to secure himself against unjust imputations, the President submitted to his then cabinet, whether he should, in the message then about to be transmitted to Congress, announce a resolution to retire from public life at the expiration of the existing term, and that, against his doing so, all the members of the cabinet protested, on the ground that such an announciation would not have the effect to produce peace or quiet, but would only change the direction of faction; that no one had a right to expect such a step from him, as he had not been elected President, and no obligation existed that should interpose any barrier between him and a direct vote of the people.

That question he should leave to the members of the cabinet to answer for themselves; one of whom [Mr. GRANGER] was then on that floor. Then came the second paragraph, to which he wished to call the special attention of the House:

"In connexion, and yet in contrast with the preceding, is another fact of an extraordinary character, which, though known by many, has lately been distinctly promulgated. It is shadowed in a letter of Mr. Ewing's, in the statement by him of a proposition having been made to the President, that the majority who had passed the first bank bill would consent to postpone the second to the next session of Congress, if they could receive assurances that, in the mean time, no hostile movement would be made on the part of the President. The full meaning of this statement has now been developed by the declaration of a member of Congress, that a message was carried from the Whig leaders in Congress to the President, to the effect that if he would engage not to disturb any members of his then cabinet in the enjoyment of their offices, the second bank bill should be postponed.

"The answer to such a proposition may be easily conceived. The effect of that proposition was to prove the identity of the members of the cabinet, whose places were deemed in jeopardy, with the hostile members of Congress; and, if the design was to precipitate matters, it was most effectual.

"You will require no aid to determine which of the actors in these scenes exhibited a lofty, disinterested patriotism, and which evinced any tenacity for place or desire for power. These facts are full of instruction, and furnish a key to many mysterious transactions."

Mr. WISE again rose to order. The paragraphs read by his colleague did not involve a question of privilege for that House; and he submitted that question for the consideration of the Speaker.

The SPEAKER inquired if the gentleman from Virginia wished to submit a resolution?

Mr. BOTTS replied that he intended to submit a proposition to the House on this question. Here was a publication emanating from a high——

Mr. WISE. I call my colleague to order.

The SPEAKER made some observation, which was not distinctly heard.

Mr. BOTTS inquired whether the Speaker decided that the publication which he had read—namely, a letter from the Secretary of War, impugning the motives of that House—he had no right to discuss.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has made no decision. Does the gentleman submit a proposition?

Mr. BOTTS. I submit a proposition for a committee of inquiry. The Chair is exceedingly rigid; but I will comply with its exactions.

Mr. WISE. I wish it to be understood that I object to entertaining this subject.

Mr. W. W. IRWIN. I object to the reception of the resolution. [Laughter.]

Mr. BOTTS submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee of be appointed to inquire into the truth of the charge entertained in the letter of the Hon. John C. Spencer, dated the 26th October, addressed to Lewis K. Faulkner and others, versus the Whig party, of having submitted a proposition to the President of the United States, at the extra session of Congress, to postpone the consideration of a great national measure, intimately connected with the best interests of the country, on condition of a pledge from him that he would not disturb the then members of his cabinet in office.

Mr. WISE. I rise to this written point of order, which I send to the Chair.

Mr. BOTTS. You had better take the thing slowly and deliberately.

The SPEAKER stated that this subject was proposed as a question of privilege. Now, there was a great difference between a question of privilege and a privileged question; and it was the duty of the Chair to decide all such questions.

A question of privilege was one which involved the character and the rights of members of the House; and the Chair would inform the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] that his question of order did not reach the point. It was for the House to determine whether it should be entertained; and if no gentleman made a motion for that purpose, it was the duty of the Speaker to test the sense of the House. He should therefore propound the question, "Shall the resolution be considered?" Because, for the Chair to decide in such a case, would be a usurpation on its part. What the Chair might deem a breach of privilege, the House might not deem so, and vice versa; and therefore he should propound the question which he had stated; to do which, he had the authority of the 5th rule, which said:

"When any motion or proposition is made, the question, "Will the House now consider it?" shall not be put unless it is demanded by some member, or is deemed necessary by the Speaker."

Mr. WISE said he had made two points of order, and he asked the Clerk to read both.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON. Mr. Clerk, read both the original resolution and the points of order.

The Clerk then read Mr. BOTTS's resolution, as given above, and also Mr. WISE's points of order, as follows:

"Mr. WISE submits that it is not in order to entertain the proposition of Mr. BOTTS, without a vote of two-thirds of the House, unless it be a privileged question; and he submits that the paragraphs read by Mr. BOTTS from a letter purporting to be written by John C. Spencer, Secretary of War, do not involve any question of the privileges of this House."

Mr. WISE. I desire to say a word on that point of order.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Will the House entertain the proposition?

Mr. WISE. There is a rule of the House, if the Speaker will permit me to remark, that requires that no proposition——

Mr. BOTTS again called Mr. W. to order, and insisted that he had no right to raise a point of order.

The SPEAKER replied, that the gentleman from Virginia on his right had risen to a point of order, and he was waiting to hear it stated.

Mr. WISE. I am about stating my point of order; and am sure that, when the Speaker understands it, there will be no difficulty between us.

Mr. BOTTS again rose and claimed the floor.

The SPEAKER said that he had heard the gentleman from Virginia on his left, [Mr. BOTTS,] and, in courtesy, wished to hear the point of order of his colleague. He considered both gentlemen out of order, though he was willing very calmly to hear both of them—one at a time.

Mr. WISE proceeded to explain his point of order. The resolution of his colleague was nothing but new matter before the House, which was excluded by other business, having precedence over it, and which, if no objection had been made, could have been entertained by general consent. But, objection was made; and, therefore, it required a vote of two-thirds to entertain it. On that rule, Mr. W. said, he relied. His colleague must move to suspend the rules, and get a vote of two-thirds, unless he could show that it is a privileged question. Then, did it appear, on the face of the proposition, that it was a privileged question? No. It was simply a proposition to raise a committee of inquiry. Suppose he were to offer a resolution to raise a committee to inquire into the affairs of the Post Office, the War or the Navy Departments: would he not require the consent of every member around him? and if there was a single objection, must he not move for, and obtain, a suspension of the rules, before he could get in his resolution? If, however, he should rise in his place, and state that it was a privileged question, and the Speaker should decide it to be such, then it would have precedence over all other business. Now, he submitted that this was a resolution of mere ordinary inquiry, and, being objected to, required a suspension of the rules before it could be received. If his colleague made it a question of privilege, the Speaker was bound to decide whether it was such or not; and the only mode of getting the sense of the House on that point was, by appealing from his decision. This distinction of the Speaker, between a question of privilege and a privileged question, was a distinction without a difference. It was like the difference between "Jemmy, come out," and "Come out, Jemmy." In regard to the paragraph of which his colleague complained, he would say to him that there was not that sanctity thrown around the majesty of that House, that the Secretary of War could not say all that was said in that letter—and more too—without being guilty of contempt of the House. If official legislative corruption had been charged by the Secretary, then the resolution was a privileged question, and would have precedence over all other business until every stain was wiped out. But the resolution stated that the letter of the Secretary merely charged a party in the House of Representatives. And when did a party ever get the privileges of the House? This was the first time that it ever was made a privileged question—that a party was arraigned. Mr. W. said, he submitted to the Speaker, as the officer of order of the House, whether it could, by any construction, be considered a privileged question, that the Secretary of War, or anybody else, had impugned a party in this country. If his colleague would undertake to say that the Secretary of War had charged the House with malfeasance in legislation, he would agree that it was a question of privilege. He asked the Clerk to read the resolution.

His points of order were these: First, that the business of Congress, the business of the country, and the business of the people, important and vital, had precedence over the business of the Whig party. That was his first point; and before the Whig party could get in a resolution to inquire about the slanders or truths contained in the Secretary's letter, they must have a vote of two-thirds. His second point was, that his colleague could not torture that paragraph—in which an accusation was made against the Whig party, not against Congress—into a question of privilege. His colleague could not make out of this a question of privilege, so as to give it a priority over the business of the people. He was not forced (Mr. W. said) to ask the House whether it would entertain this proposition or not. The Speaker himself must decide it, or must oblige his colleague to make a motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. BOTTS observed that he was not disposed to interrupt his colleague while he was stating his points of order; but he would now say that this was the first time since he had been a member of the House that he had ever known a gentleman to get up and discuss a decision of the Chair without taking an appeal. His colleague commenced with the declaration, that they were not such magnates of the land as to be authorized to inquire into scandalum magnatum, coming from any quarter. Now, he did not know how high his colleague rated his privileges as a member of the House, but he (Mr. B.) was disposed to give him higher claims—claims which he made for himself and for every member of the House. He (Mr. B.) was that magnate of the land that claimed the privilege of inquiring into scandalum magnatum, when made against the members of the House. His colleague objected to the resolution, because it stated that a party, only, was arraigned in the Secretary's letter; but had not his colleague ascertained what party constituted the majority in that House? Was not an accusation against the Whig party, an accusation against the majority of the House—that party constituting the majority? [General laughter.] His colleague said that a charge of corruption against a single member of the House would be a question of privilege; but a charge made by a distinguished officer of one branch of the Government, of corruption against a majority of another branch of the Government—there, forsooth, was scandalum magnatum; but, not being directed against a single individual, was not a proper subject of inquiry. He had understood that in the case of the lamented Mr. Cilley—whose name he never heard without regret—a communication having appeared in the Courier and Enquirer, of New York, charging corruption against a single member, his colleague offered a resolution raising a select committee to inquire into the subject.

Mr. WISE begged leave to correct his colleague. The case his colleague alluded to had nothing to do with that of Mr. Cilley. A resolution of inquiry was offered, as stated; but it having been ascertained that the accusation was made against a member of the Senate, [Mr. Ruggles,] a committee of inquiry was raised in that body, the subject fully inquired into, and the member honorably acquitted.

Mr. BOTTS. This was a case of a single paragraph in one of the newspapers of the day.

Mr. WISE. No, sir. It was a charge made by a letter-writer, who was well known in the House, and throughout the country, [Matthew L. Davis,] in which he alleged that it could be proved that a member of Congress had taken a money bribe from a patentee of mail-bag locks, for some service rendered him. It was not a party charge, and had nothing to do with the case of Mr. Cilley. As soon as he (Mr. W.) saw that paragraph—not a common newspaper item, but contained in one of the letters of the Spy in Washington, who was well known as a responsible individual—he rose and offered a resolution, setting forth that a charge had been made against a member of Congress, and proposing that a committee should be raised to inquire into it. He would further say, in order to put his colleague in possession of all the facts, that the individual himself [Matthew L. Davis] told him (Mr. W.) that he could prove the charge he had made.

Mr. BOTTS understood, then, that it was not a newspaper paragraph, but a letter written by a respectable and responsible individual, and it was therefore entitled to respectful consideration; but, in this case, the letter was written by the Secretary of War, a member of Mr. Tyler's cabinet, and therefore was not entitled to respect.

Mr. WISE was sure that his colleague would not, in candor, say that such was his understanding of his remarks.

Mr. BOTTS would not say that his colleague meant to convey such an impression; but he must, in candor, say that such was a fair deduction from what he said.

Mr. WISE asked his colleague, in courtesy, to allow him to explain himself so as to be understood. His colleague had stated that his (Mr. W.'s) proceeding was founded on a newspaper paragraph. This he denied, and explained that it was founded on an accusation made by a known and responsible individual against a member of Congress. From nothing that he had said, could a fair deduction be made that the Secretary of War was not a respectable and responsible character. The distinction which his colleague and everybody else must have understood him to draw between the letter of the Secretary of War and the accusation of Matthew L. Davis, was this: The Secretary in his letter did not accuse anybody of crime, but it was a mere political accusation of corruption against one of the parties of the day; while the charge of Mr. Davis was of crime against a particular individual. Mr. W. said he had himself made accusations of corruption against a party, and had heard the same accusations made against the party with which he acted; but he never dreamed of such accusations being made the subject of inquiry in the House.

Mr. BOTTS again rose and remarked, that, as one good turn deserved another, he would appeal to the courtesy of his colleague not to interrupt him.

Mr. WISE. I shall not interrupt my colleague, unless he egregiously misrepresents or misquotes me.

Mr. BOTTS. I hope my colleague does not intend to charge me with a design to misrepresent him.

Mr. WISE observed, that he could not enter into what were the designs of his colleague; but he could say that his colleague could not more effectually misrepresent him than by proceeding as he had.

Mr. BOTTS resumed. His colleague had contended that, in the former instance, when he [Mr. WISE] moved the resolution of inquiry, the charge against a member of Congress was preferred by a responsible individual, [Matthew L. Davis,] known as the "Spy in Washington." Now, if a charge adduced by such a man—a respectable letter-writer—was competent to cause Congress to order a committee of investigation, the case was much stronger, and the reason for a committee of investigation greater, when a grave charge was made by the Secretary of War. If it was true that the Whig party was willing to postpone the consideration of great national questions, only to secure certain individuals in office, they would indeed be subjected to a grievous charge. He (Mr. B.) would not accuse the Secretary of War of fabricating the charge; yet he had endorsed it, and it was but right that the names of those who had made the charge, or given information to the Secretary, should be surrendered. Was there a Whig here, who knew any foundation for such an accusation? If there was, he demanded that such should stand up and speak. He pronounced it a foul and atrocious calumny on the Whig party, put forth on the eve of an election, and calculated to operate to the prejudice of that party. He (Mr. B.) did not claim to be a leader of the Whig party; yet he was on terms of intimacy, and closely connected in his personal and political relations with—

Here Mr. CUSHING called to order, and suggested that the remarks of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BOTTS] did not relate to the question of order pending before the House, but treated of things which would have to be considered after the House shall have ordered the inquiry asked for by the gentleman.

Mr. BOTTS said that the gentleman from Massachusetts had not raised any objection to the remarks of his colleague [Mr. WISE] as being out of order.

The CHAIR said that he had indulged both of the gentlemen from Virginia out of order.

Mr. WISE. I ask the Speaker never to indulge me out of order. I was not conscious of being out of order. I ask for no indulgences. I never get any.

After a brief, but inaudible explanation from the SPEAKER—

Mr. BOTTS resumed. He was going on to say, when interrupted, that, though not a leader of the Whig party, yet such were his intimate personal and political associations with the members of that party, that he did not believe it could have been possible for such a proposition as that charged by the Secretary of War to have been made to the President, without his having heard something of it. The letter of the Secretary of War was more adroitly written, more ingenious, and better calculated to produce an impression against the Whig party, than anything he had ever seen. He maintained that the House should inquire into the truth of the charge which it made. If true, let the Secretary of War stand exonerated; let those who informed him stand exonerated, and the burden of the accusation be thrown upon such members of the House as might have furnished the information. If, however, the charge was false—if the Secretary had no authority for making it, let the falsehood be branded on the forehead of the fabricator. This would be the consequence: it was for this purpose that he desired investigation. Would the members of the late cabinet have consented to retain their places upon such terms as those stated by the Secretary of War? He (Mr. B.) knew of but one who would have consented to such conditions, and the Whig party did not hold themselves responsible for him. They had no sympathy for him in the course he was pursuing.

Here some conversation ensued between the SPEAKER, Mr. WISE, and Mr. BOTTS. The latter had resumed his remarks, and was discussing the objects of the Whig party at the extra session, when he was called to order for irrelevancy. He then concluded by submitting his resolution to the consideration of the House.

The SPEAKER, after remarking upon the sudden manner in which this point of order had sprung up for decision, and repeating his averment that there was a difference between "a question of privilege" and "a privileged question," remarked that he could find no instance on record where the Chair had entertained of himself, and settled, what was a question of privilege; on the contrary, he found numerous instances where the House had settled it. The question must come up, "Shall the resolution be received as a question of privilege?" If no member called for the question, it would be the duty of the Chair to submit it.

Mr. WISE inquired whether it would require a majority, or two-thirds, to receive the resolution as a question of privilege?

The SPEAKER answered, A majority.

Mr. WM. COST JOHNSON moved to lay the whole subject on the table; but withdrew his motion at the request of Mr. GRANGER, who expressed a desire to speak.

Amid many cries of "hear him," much confusion, and an objection on the part of Mr. BOWNE,

The SPEAKER decided that the gentleman could only proceed by general consent.

Mr. WISE inquired whether an opportunity would be afforded him of replying to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. GRANGER.] [Cries of Yes.]

Mr. BOWNE then withdrew his objection; after which,

The SPEAKER said the gentleman from New York [Mr. GRANGER] might proceed by universal consent.

Mr. WISE wished it to be understood that he united in this universal consent only on condition that an opportunity should be afforded him to reply. Without this, he should positively object to the gentleman's proceeding.

Mr. GRANGER. Considering the peculiar relation of the gentleman [Mr. WISE] to the President, I take my seat under objection from that quarter.

Mr. WISE made some remarks not heard above the noise prevailing, but understood to be an expression of his willingness that the gentleman from New York should proceed, provided his remarks did not call for a reply.

Mr. W. W. IRWIN rose and objected; at which stage of the proceedings,

Mr. FESSENDEN moved to lay the whole subject on the table.

This motion was rejected—yeas 86, nays 99, as follows:

Mr. BOTTS now submitted a modification of his proposition, by striking out the words "the Whig party" in the original resolution, and inserting "the members of Congress." [Laughter.]

Mr. WISE remarked that his colleague's resolution purported to be partly an extract from the letter of Mr. Spencer, in which the words "the Whig party" were used, and not "the members of Congress." He therefore called for the reading of the portion of the letter referred to, and also the resolution offered by his colleague.

They were read accordingly.

Mr. PICKENS desired to know if the Speaker presented the question of reception as involving a privileged question? For if the Chair put it to the House to decide whether the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BOTTS] involved a privileged question, it then became a grave question of the deepest interest, in which the rights and honor of the House were concerned, and a decision should be made that could stand the test of time. He agreed with the Chair, that it was for the House, and not for the Speaker, to decide as to its privileges. He (Mr. P.) did not wish to interfere in this controversy at all; but whether it involved the privileges of the House or not, was a question above all party interests.

The SPEAKER gave an affirmative answer.

Mr. BIDLACK made a few remarks, not distinctly heard.

Mr. WISE asked to be excused from voting. He was placed in a dilemma, by the form in which the question would be put to the House. Were the question as to whether the resolution of his colleague was a question of privilege, put separately from the question of reception, he should vote with pleasure. As it was, if he voted ay, he should be voting that the resolution was a question of privilege, which he did not think; yet, he was anxious to receive the resolution, although not as a privileged question. With these remarks, he withdrew his request to be excused from voting.

Mr. C. J. INGERSOLL inquired what would be the effect of the reception of this resolution as a question of privilege? Would it come up for the immediate consideration of the House?

The SPEAKER said Yes; and that it would override all other business.

The question was then taken, Shall the resolution be received as a question of privilege? and decided in the negative—yeas 85, nays 106, as follows:

REPEAL OF THE BANKRUPT LAW.

Mr. EVERETT asked leave, pursuant to notice, to introduce a bill to repeal the bankrupt law; and he wished it to be put on its second reading, and printed. [Objections were made from all parts of the House.] He would move, then, the suspension of the rules, that it might be received.

Mr. HOPKINS called for the yeas and nays on the motion to suspend; and they were ordered, and, being taken, resulted—yeas 137, nays 63, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Landaff W. Andrews, Arrington, Atherton, Barton, Beeson, Bidlack, Birdseye, Boardman, Botts, Bowne, Boyd, Brewster, Brockway, Bronson, Aaron V. Thompson, Jacob Thompson, Tillinghast, Triplett, Trumbull, Turney, Underwood, Van Buren, Wallace, Ward, Watterson, Weller, Westbrook, Wise, Wood, and Augustus Young—137.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Sherlock J. Andrews, Arnold, Aycrigg, Baker, Barnard, Blair, Borden, Briggs, Chittenden, John C. Clark, S. N. Clarke, J. Cooper, Cranston, Cushing, Dawson, Fessenden, Fillmore, Gates, Giddings, Granger, Halsted, Henry, Howard, Hudson, Joseph R. Ingersoll, James Irvin, James, William Cost Johnson, Isaac D. Jones, John P. Kennedy, Lane, Mathiot, Maxwell, Maynard, Meriwether, Moore, Morgan, Morrow, Pearce, Pendleton, Powell, Benjamin Randall, Ridgway, Rodney, William Russell, James M. Russell, Stanly, Stratton, Toland, Tomlinson, Van Rensselaer, Warren, Washington, Joseph L. White, Christopher H. Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Winthrop, Yorke, and John Young—63.

The rules were therefore suspended by a majority of two-thirds.

Mr EVERETT then introduced his bill, which was read a first and second time. It was as follows:

A BILL TO REPEAL THE BANKRUPT ACT.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That an act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," approved on the nineteenth day of August, eighteen hundred and forty one, be, and the same hereby is repealed; Provided, That this act shall not affect any case or proceeding in bankruptcy commenced before the fifth day of December, eighteen hundred and forty two; or any pains, penalties, or forfeitures, incurred under such act.

Mr. EVERETT moved that the bill be printed, and that it be made the special order for Tuesday next.

After some conversation between Mr. EVERETT, Mr. BARNARD, and the SPEAKER,

Mr. BARNARD moved that the bill be committed to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. EVERETT said, in his opinion, it would not be necessary to commit it.

Mr. J. R. INGERSOLL suggested that a day more distant than the one named by the gentleman from Vermont should be fixed, that gentlemen might have an opportunity to hear from their constituents, whose opinions might possibly regulate the judgment of some gentlemen. He, therefore, moved to strike out "Tuesday next," and insert "Tuesday week."

Mr. EVERETT thought the time he had fixed long enough.

Mr. PAYNE gave notice that, at the proper time, he should move to strike out the proviso.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON said the sooner they got rid of this question the better; and, therefore, he moved to make it the special order for to-morrow.

Mr. BARNARD hoped, when it was printed, the House would consent to act with that deliberation in this case which marked their proceedings in others; and that they would consent to commit this bill to a standing committee.

The question was then taken on the motion of Mr. J. R. INGERSOLL, to postpone the bill to this day two weeks; which was lost—only 52 voting in the affirmative.

The motion of Mr. CAVE JOHNSON, to postpone until to morrow, was also lost; the vote being 78 in the affirmative, and 85 in the negative.

The question then recurred on the motion of the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. EVERETT] to print and postpone until Tuesday next; which was agreed to.

TAMPERING WITH THE EXECUTIVE.

Mr. UNDERWOOD said he had voted against the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BOTTS] as a question of privilege; but he was anxious to ascertain the fact, if any gentleman had been tampering with the Executive. If such were the fact, he wished those gentlemen to be exposed to the public indignation; and, therefore, he desired to offer a resolution which he had prepared.

Mr. FILLMORE hoped the gentleman from Kentucky would give way, so that some Executive communications now on the Speaker's table might be received, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. UNDERWOOD said it would occupy but a moment to dispose of his resolution, and the Executive communications could be received immediately after.

Objections were made to the reception of the resolution of the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. UNDERWOOD moved a suspension of the rules for the reception of his resolution.

Mr. CUSHING called for the yeas and nays; which being ordered, resulted as follows—yeas 109, nays 78; which being less than a majority of two-thirds, the motion to suspend the rules did not prevail.

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Landaff W. Andrews, Arnold, Arrington, Aycrigg, Babcock, Barnard, Barton, Bidlack, Birdseye, Blair, Boardman, Borden, Botts, Jeremiah Brown, William Butler, Calhoun, William B. Campbell, Thomas J. Campbell, Caruthers, John C. Clark, Staley N. Clarke, J. Cooper, Mark A. Cooper, Cranston, Cravens, Cushing, Garrett Davis, Deberry, John Edwards, Everett, Fillmore, A. Lawrence Foster, Gamble, Goggin, Gordon, Halsted, Henry, Holmes, C. J. Ingersoll, J. R. Ingersoll, James Irvin, James, Isaac D. Jones, John P. Kennedy, Andrew Kennedy, Lane, Linn, Littlefield, Lowell, Robert McClellan, McKennan, Mallory, Thomas F. Marshall, Samson Mason, Mathiot, Mattocks, Meriwether, Morgan, Morrow, Osborne, Owsley, Payne, Pearce, Pendleton, Powell, Ramsey, Benjamin Randall, Rayner, Reding, Ridgway, Rodney, William Russell, James M. Thompson, Jacob Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, Tomlinson, Triplett, Trumbull, Turney, Underwood, Van Rensselaer, Wallace, Ward, Warren, Washington, Weller, Joseph L. White, Christopher H. Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Wise, Wood, Augustus Young, and John Young—109.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Sherlock J. Andrews, Atherton, Baker, Beeson, Black, Bowne, Boyd, Brewster, Briggs, Aaron V. Brown, Charles Brown, Burke, Burnell, Green W. Caldwell, John Campbell, Cary, Casey, Clifford, Clinton, Cowen, Cross, Richard D. Davis, Dawson, Dean, Eastman, John C. Edwards, Ferris, Fessenden, John G. Floyd, Charles A. Floyd, Gates, Gerry, Gilmer, Patrick G. Goode, William O. Goode, Gustine, Hastings, Hays, Hopkins, Houck, Houston, Hubard, Hudson, Hunter, William W. Irwin, Jack, William Cost Johnson, Cave Johnson, Keim, Abraham McClellan, McKay, McKeon, Marchand, Alfred Marshall, Mathews, Maxwell, Medill, Mitchell, Morris, Newhard, Parmenter, Pickens, Plumer, Read, Reynolds, Rigg, Rogers, Roosevelt, Saunders, Shaw, Snyder, Steenrod, Sumter, Watterson, Westbrook, and Winthrop—78.

JOINT COMMITTEES.

Mr. BRIGGS moved a concurrence in the resolution of the Senate to appoint joint committees on enrolled bills, &c., &c.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Mr. FILLMORE moved that the Executive communications on the Speaker's table be read; which was agreed to.

The CLERK accordingly read a variety of communications from the War and Navy Departments, and from the Treasurer of the United States, and the Commissioner of the Public Buildings; and they were appropriately referred, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. FILLMORE inquired if the estimates for the year had been received from the Treasury Department?

The SPEAKER replied, that they had not yet been placed upon his table.

CONTESTED ELECTION.

The SPEAKER announced that he had received additional testimony in the case of the contested election of the Delegate from Florida, [Mr. LEVY.]

Mr. TURNEY moved that it be laid on the table.

Mr. MORGAN moved that it be referred, together with the testimony previously received, and the report of the committee of the last session, to the Committee of Elections.

The question was taken on the motion to lay on the table, which was negatived—the vote being 52 in the affirmative, and 76 in the negative.

Mr. MORGAN then urged the motion which he had submitted.

Mr. TURNEY objected to that motion. He did not know by what authority this testimony had been taken, nor by which party; but at the extra session time was given both parties to take testimony, under the rules of the House, which prescribed how the testimony should be taken; testimony was accordingly taken, and the whole was referred to a standing committee, by whom a report was made, and the case was disposed of. But new testimony had found its way into the House—by whom or by what authority taken, no human being could tell. It was certain that it was not taken by the authority of the House. Now, he wished to know if, at this late day, the House was again to commit this subject to the Committee of Elections, when the term of the Delegate's service had nearly expired? It appeared to him to be a species of child's play; and if it were to be done, he hoped the gentlemen who voted for it would take upon themselves the trouble which the examination would require. He submitted, as a question of order, whether the report of the last session was now before the House?

The SPEAKER was understood to decide that it was not.

The House then adjourned.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, December 14, 1842.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. laid before the Senate a communication from the State Department, showing the returns made to that department, by collectors of the several collection districts of the United States, of the number of American seamen registered in each district during the year ending September, 1842; which, on motion of Mr. EVANS, was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CHOATE presented the petition of Benjamin K. Churchill, of New Hampshire, who was engaged in the privateer service of the United States during the late war with England, praying for a pension: referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana presented the petition of George Burk, praying for revolutionary bounty land: referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

On motion of Mr. BERRIEN, the petition and papers of Duncan L. Clinch were ordered to be taken from the files of the Senate, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. WRIGHT presented a memorial from Franklin W. Stilwell, relative to qualifying and appointing engineers on board the United States steamships: referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

On motion of Mr. KERR, leave was granted to withdraw from the files of the Senate the petition and papers of R. S. Coxe, assignee of David Beard.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. EVANS, on leave, introduced a bill for the relief of Robert B. Lewis; which was twice read, and appropriately referred.

Mr. BATES, on leave, introduced a bill for refunding to Massachusetts the balances due her for disbursements during the late war with Great Britain; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CLAYTON, on leave, introduced a bill to repeal the act to amend an act approved 23d August, 1842, further supplementary to the act entitled "An act to establish the judicial system of the United States;" which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. PORTER, on leave, introduced a bill to amend an act entitled "An act to establish the northern boundary line of the State of Ohio, and to provide for the admission of Michigan into the Union," approved in 1836; which was read twice, and referred to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. KING, on leave, introduced a bill for the relief of Joseph Bryan, Harrison Young, and Benjamin Young; which was read twice, and, with the papers on the files of the Senate relating to it, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. GRAHAM, on leave, introduced a bill for the relief of claimants to indemnity for certain slaves taken by the British Government from on board of the American brigs the Comet and Encomium, at Nassau and New Providence; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

FINE ON GENERAL JACKSON.

Mr. LINN, on leave, introduced a bill to indemnify Major General Andrew Jackson for damages sustained in discharge of his official duty; which was read twice, and

Mr. L said the bill was very short; and, taking example of the Senator from New York, [Mr. WRIGHT,] he would not move to refer it to any committee. It was fully discussed at the last session; and its provisions being simple, were, no doubt, understood on all sides. He would, therefore, move that the bill be postponed till this day week, and made the order for that day. The motion was agreed to.

Mr. L. also, on leave, introduced the following bills, viz:

A bill authorizing the relinquishment of the sixteenth sections granted for the use of schools, and the entry of other lands in lieu thereof; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

A bill to continue in force the "Act for the final adjustment of private land claims in Missouri," approved 9th July, 1832; and the act supplemental thereto, approved 2d March, 1833; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. FULTON, on leave, introduced a bill to allow a drawback on foreign merchandise exported in original packages to Chihuahua and Santa Fe, in Mexico; which having been read twice,

Mr. FULTON moved to refer it to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. WOODBURY expressed a wish that the Committee on Commerce, to which it was proposed to refer this bill, would take into consideration the propriety of enlarging its provisions, so as to include the whole frontier of the United States. He considered that the privilege of drawback on goods exported in original packages was equally, if not more, important to the Northern and Eastern sections of the country, than to that section which this bill was intended to benefit—the West.

Mr. KING, as one of the committee, had no objection to the reference; but he must say that he was adverse to the passage of any general provision allowing drawback, believing that it would lead to most mischievous consequences, and would defraud the Government of a large portion of its revenue.

Mr. HUNTINGTON said the Committee on Commerce had at the last session examined this bill, and considered it as a case sui generis, and one which ought to pass as a matter of strict justice to those interested in the trade, and as a matter of public policy. The committee then reported favorably to the passage of the bill without a general provision. They thought it ought not to be connected with the subject of drawbacks generally. He believed the interests of the country were very well protected in the bill as then reported from the committee, and that it ought to pass.

Mr. FULTON remarked that the bill at the last session took the very course which the Senator from New Hampshire suggested; and, on account of its being encumbered with the additional weight of a general provision, was lost. He sincerely hoped that this bill, which was intended to provide for a peculiar case, would not again be converted into a general bill. As the bill stood, it was a subject of deep interest to the West; not only so, but to the whole Union. Justice to those interested in this particular trade demanded its passage, whether a general system of drawbacks be established or not.

Mr. WOODBURY said he did not wish to embarrass the action upon this bill; but he hoped that when the committee were considering the subject, they would consider the question of extending the principles of the bill to every section of the Union. He felt bound, at the last session, from a sense of duty, to make the motion to include the whole frontier of the United States in the bill. He would try again to effect that object. It was important not only to the commerce of the country, but to a vast portion of the business passing through the Northern lakes, and on the Northern railroads, during six months in the year, when the navigation was closed. He merely threw out the suggestion to the committee, to consider the propriety of making the bill general, while they were entertaining the subject. As to the objection urged against a general bill, that frauds would grow up under it, he would only say that smuggling can be as effectually guarded against in a general bill as it was possible to do in a partial bill. He would feel compelled, in justice to the whole frontier, to move an amendment in accordance with his views when the bill came before the Senate for action.

The bill was then referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. FULTON, on leave, introduced a bill in relation to a donation of land to certain persons in the State of Arkansas; and

A bill for the relief of sundry citizens of Arkansas, who lost their improvements in consequence of the treaty between the United States and the Choctaw Indians; which bills were read twice, and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

On motion of Mr. LINN, the petition and papers of Dr. Boyd Reilly were ordered to be taken from the files of the Senate, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

On motion of Mr. BARROW, the petition and papers of Garland & Curry were ordered to be taken from the files of the Senate, and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Messrs. BATES and FULTON gave notice that they would, on to-morrow, ask leave to introduce certain bills.

On motion of Mr. EVANS, the following resolution, introduced by Mr. BENTON on Monday last, was taken up for consideration:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to inform the Senate as follows:

1. The number and estimated value of vessels which will be equired in the African squadron under the late British treaty.
2. The probable annual cost of repairing said vessels.
3. The number of men and officers which the equipment of the squadron will require.
4. The probable annual loss of men from deaths, desertion, and other casualties, on board said squadron.
5. The probable annual expenditure of said squadron, under all the heads of expenditure incident to the service.
6. Whether it is intended to make the squadron consist of more than eighty guns, and the calibre of the guns to be used.
7. The whole number of guns which it is expected to have afloat in the United States navy during the year 1843, and the estimated expense of the naval establishment for the year, including all expenses incident to keeping up the navy.

Mr. BENTON modified the resolution, by inserting the words "and other arms" after the word "guns," in the 7th clause. The resolution, as thus modified, was adopted.

Mr. CLAYTON said he found the Chair had placed him on the Committee on Printing. His health was such, that it was utterly impossible to perform the duties which would devolve on him in consequence. He therefore asked to be excused.

The question was put, and he was excused; and the Chair was authorized to appoint another member to fill the vacancy.

CORPS OF REPORTERS.

The resolution for the appointment of such a corps came up in order; but was, at the suggestion of Mr. BAYARD, who introduced it, postponed till Monday next.

CLAIMANTS.

The joint resolution of Mr. GRAHAM came up, and was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That the following be added to the joint rules of the two Houses:

Whenever a claim against the United States, of any description, has been, or shall be, presented to either House, and referred to a committee, and such committee shall have made a report in writing against the allowance of the claim, and the same shall have been concurred in by such House, it shall not be in order to revive the consideration of such claim in that House, at the same or any future session of Congress, either by bill, resolution, petition, or otherwise, except upon a memorial of the claimant, first setting forth, upon affidavit, that he has discovered new evidence in support of his claim since the decision against it, and a statement of the substance of such evidence; or, second, assigning specific errors in the report of the committee adverse to it, and a certificate of a member of that House that he believes that the former decision was erroneous, as charged in said memorial: Provided, That an order discharging a committee from the further consideration of a claim, shall in nowise require compliance with the rule.

Mr. GRAHAM remarked that this resolution was fully discussed and passed the Senate at the last session, but was not acted on in the other House; and unless some Senator wished a postponement, he hoped it would be passed at once.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE said he could not vote for the resolution. He deemed the rules already passed sufficient to guard the Senate against improper applications from claimants. The effect of the rule would be to narrow down and infringe the right of petition of his constituents. He could not see that any good would grow out of it; and was, therefore, opposed to it.

Mr. KING said it appeared to him that his friend from Michigan was mistaken in his views of the proposed rule, when he asserted that it would operate as an infringement of the right of petition. He would find, on examining the proposition, that that right was scrupulously guarded. The great object of the resolution was to prevent a constant return of subjects acted upon year after year, and reported against by the committees, and rejected by the two Houses—matters which were frequently brought up from musty records, and presented to the Senate, with no new grounds by the claimants to recommend them to its consideration. This practice caused a great deal of labor, and was attended with considerable expense to the nation. This rule was to prevent the practice, and enable Congress to devote to the important business of the nation the time thus improperly taken up in reinvestigating, thrice over and over again, claims without merit or shadow of justice. The rule would be an admirable one, and would save a great deal of unnecessary labor, and a great deal of money for the Government. He knew that, year after year, these rejected claims were hunted up by interested agents, and brought forward without any new evidence or new grounds to recommend them to favorable consideration; and, when presented, they were referred to the committees, reinvestigated, at immense labor, reported against, and rejected: and still there was no end to action upon them. The claims of citizens should be fully and fairly examined, and decided upon; but, when that was done, Congress should at least be saved the trouble of going over them again and again.

Mr. LINN inquired whether the resolution required that a report in writing should be made by the committees.

Mr. GRAHAM replied in the affirmative.

Mr. LINN thought that, if the resolution was referred to a committee, and a report was made and published, giving information to the country of the rule, and the reasons for its adoption, it would prevent much abuse of members of Congress. If otherwise, great complaint in regard to members of Congress neglecting the business confided to them would be made; and they would have to write many letters defending themselves against the charge. There had been some discussion upon the subject last year; and he believed there was a resolution adopted, of the nature of this proposed rule, requiring a written report to be made in all cases of private claims, and excluding further action on claims thus unfavorably reported upon. After the passage of such rule, he had been greatly blamed for not pressing claims reported against, without the applicant knowing of the existence of the rule of the Senate. His honorable friend from Alabama certainly stated the case very strongly, and, in the main, correctly. They had been grossly imposed upon. He thought it would be better to refer the matter to some committee; and he would therefore move that it be referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. GRAHAM had no objection to the reference; but supposed the notoriety of the course pursued by Congress, in relation to reiterated claims, would be given as well by the publication of the resolution, as by the publication of the report of the committee. He therefore saw no necessity for the reference desired by the Senator from Missouri. He had been induced to bring forward the subject at the last session, in consequence of the experience he had had, as a member of the committee, with regard to the pertinacity with which claims are reiterated after repeated rejections, and the expenditure of much labor in previous investigations. The committee have had to consider claims repeatedly rejected since 1815-'16, and even since 1808. There is no end to the labor of investigation, if this system is to go on.

Mr. WRIGHT said, in relation to the considerations which had been suggested for the passage of the resolution, it appeared to him that there was another, which rendered it a high and imperious duty upon Congress to adopt such a resolution. With a single word, he would refer to it. They had, during the last three or four years, heard a good deal of abuse about the delays, on the part of Congress, in acting upon private claims. They had heard it asserted that there were a thousand honest and suffering claimants before Congress whose claims were not acted on. He (Mr. W.) had no doubt that, if both Houses were to adopt such a rule, and abide by it, at least nine hundred out of the one thousand claims would disappear at once. There were claims which had been before Congress for twenty years; and, having no merit, they could not be disposed of. To rid themselves, then, of these—he would not say slanders—but these errors in the public judgment, and to show that they did not deserve these reproachful charges of neglecting private claims, it would, he thought, be proper to adopt some honest and fair rule by which, when a bad claim had been once fairly rejected, it should not again be placed upon the calendar, and continued there from day to day, as constructive evidence of improper neglect and delay on the part of Congress.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE made some further remarks against the resolution; and

The question was put on the motion of reference, and disagreed to.

The question was then put on the adoption of the resolution, and carried in the affirmative.

REPEAL OF THE BANKRUPT LAW.

The orders of the day brought up Mr. BENTON's bill for the repeal of the bankrupt act.

The CHAIR announced that it was on its second reading, and would be considered as in committee of the whole; the question pending being on the amendment submitted by the Senator from North Carolina. [Mr. GRAHAM.]

Mr. BERRIEN observed that, if the bill was still subject to such a motion, he would move to refer it to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The CHAIR stated that the motion would be in order.

Mr. BERRIEN observed that he believed it was considered expedient, in obedience to public opinion, to bring forward the repeal of the law at the commencement of this session of Congress.

The law, as it now exists, applies to cases both of voluntary and involuntary bankruptcy. It was proposed to repeal this law, on the ground that public opinion was against it; but, in his (Mr. B.'s) opinion, the public sentiment was directed rather against that portion of the law which relates to voluntary bankruptcy, than against the law itself. With a view, then, to ascertain, by examination, whether such a bill may not be presented to the consideration of the Senate as would steer clear of the objections which apply to the existing law, it seemed desirable that it should be referred to a committee for inquiry. And he was strengthened in this conviction by the fact, that among the numerous petitions which had been presented to Congress at a former session, upon the subject of the bankrupt law, by far the greater portion sought, not its repeal, but a modification of it, by excluding the provisions which relate to voluntary bankruptcy, and by modifying the terms upon which certificates of bankruptcy should be granted. It seemed to him that public opinion, so far as it had been ascertained by the representations made to Congress, was not at all adverse to the existence of a system of mercantile bankruptcy; and with a view of ascertaining whether a bill in such a form might not be substituted for the present law, he thought it was desirable that it should be referred. But it was particularly desirable in another and a general view; inasmuch as it would protect the legislation of the United States Congress from the imputation of instability, and insure that respect which ought to be entertained towards all legislation. Besides, it seemed to him improper to proceed in the consideration of the matter with such rapidity, precluding the possibility of giving it that due deliberation which it required. They should not hurry their investigation upon this subject without making those preliminary inquiries which they were in the habit of making in regard to every ordinary subject. These were the considerations which induced him to propose that the bill be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BENTON objected, in the most strenuous terms, to the reference proposed by the Senator from Georgia. To refer the bill to that committee, would be tantamount to its total rejection. He would tell the Senate plainly, that, if the reference was made, he would consider the proposition to repeal the bankrupt act at once rejected. What would it be, but inviting a committee hostile to the purpose of the bill to go into the question of a universal bankrupt system, or exercise its ingenuity to build up a system like that of the British bankrupt system? and that is not a work that can be performed this session, if it ever can be performed successfully. The committee was under the delusion of the false doctrine which induced the original measure: that delusion was, that insolvency and bankruptcy are one and the same thing. This fallacy has ever been maintained by the Judiciary in the application of the laws, which cannot be administered without gross error. A question cannot arise between two neighbors about a dozen of eggs, without being liable to be taken from the custody of the laws of the States and brought up to the Federal courts. And now, when this doctrine that insolvency and bankruptcy are the same, if a continuance of the law is to be contrived, it must be done in conformity with such a fallacy. The law has proved to be nothing but a great insolvent law, for the abolition of debts, for the benefit of debtors; and would it be maintained that a permanent system ought to be built up on such a foundation as that? No, he could tell the Senate they could not go into any such work. He should resist the motion for these reasons. He resisted it, also, because it was contrary to all parliamentary usage to send a bill to a committee hostile to its principle. To send it to such a committee is to send it where it is foredoomed. There was no occasion for such a course; the law has met the universal condemnation of the country. The present bill was a bill for its repeal, with provisions for bringing the remaining cases within constitutional limits. With this view he had taken the 36th section of the old bankrupt act of 1800, which required the consent of two-thirds of the creditors to the extinction of the bankrupt's debts. The whole of the creditors are treated as a partnership for the purpose of saving their debts—all having an interest, but giving a large majority a decisive voice in the adjustment. The old bankrupt act was in reality a bankrupt system, and respected the insolvent laws of the States. But the present law undertakes to expunge the insolvent laws of the States. The old law was confined to traders; but this extends to every one who wants to get rid of his debts. The old law of 1800 not only respected the insolvent laws of the States, but the lien laws of the States; this presumes to abrogate both. In the provisions of this repeal bill, the necessary clauses of the old law are to be incorporated, in relation to the remaining cases of bankruptcy. This must be done to bring them within the pale of the Constitution. One good effect will be, that, although we may not tell the judges they have been guilty of gross error, we can show them that they have acted unconstitutionally. In England, a bankrupt must have his certificate signed by two-thirds of his creditors, or he is treated as an uncertified bankrupt. And he would tell the Senate that here, now, every person who has been discharged under the act of last session is an uncertified bankrupt; and his claim to be discharged from liability to his debts should be disregarded in any court acting up to the Constitution. If he (Mr. B.) were judge of a court, he would treat as a nullity any certificate under the present law, brought forward as a plea against a claim of debt. He would ask for a certificate signed by two-thirds of the creditors; and if that could not be produced, he would disregard the plea altogether. He would ask, was the Senate now to elongate this iniquitous act? and if it was, for what length of time? He could tell them how long it would admit of remaining cases being continued: just as long as the assets would hold out to pay the officers of the courts and the commissioners.

Some months ago, he read in a Philadelphia paper a notice to creditors to come forward for a dividend of half a cent in the dollar in a case of bankruptcy pending, under the old law of 1800, since the year 1801. And, three or four days ago, he read a notice in a London paper, calling on creditors to come in for a dividend of five-sixths of a penny in the pound, in a case of bankruptcy pending since the year 1793. Here has been a case where the waste of property has been going on for fifty years in England, and another case where it has been going on in this country forty-one or forty-two years. He had been himself twenty-three years in the Senate, and, during that time, various efforts were made to revive the old law of 1800 in some shape or other; but never, till last session, in the shape in which the present law passed. And how could this law be expected to stand, when even the law of 1800 (which was in reality a bankrupt law) could not stand; but was, in the first year of its operation, condemned by the whole country. With regard to the motion of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. GRAHAM] to amend the bill, he should say that it fairly brought up the question properly at issue. It brought up the question of repeal; and, that being decided, it next presented the question of how the pending cases are to be treated. One proposition is to go on, in relation to these cases, with the bankrupt law as if not repealed; the other is, to make these remaining cases subject to the provisions of a constitutional bankrupt law. On this issue, the question is just as fairly presented, and much better presented, than it can be by any report of a committee. The motion of the Senator from North Carolina does all that can be required. It brings up the main subject in all its bearings. All that is necessary, is to fix a day for its consideration. If, however, the motion of reference was persisted in, he should call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. TALLMADGE did not know that the mere question of reference was such a vital one as to commit those who should vote for it. He supposed, from present indications, that the law would be repealed. But those who intended to vote for the repeal, could assuredly vote for the reference, without being thereby committed against the repeal. The question of reference is, simply, whether the Senate shall proceed in the matter deliberately, and upon full information; or precipitately, and without any guide. It was, he considered, all-important that the bill now under discussion should undergo the examination of the appropriate committee. The Senator from Missouri says the question is fairly and fully presented on the motion of the Senator from North Carolina. But there are many Senators who think the question should also embrace a modification of the law; and they, too, wish to see that view presented from the proper source. Let the bill, then, go to the Committee on the Judiciary; and if the law is to be repealed, there will be time enough to effect that object. It seemed, indeed, strange to him that there should be any objection to letting the bill pass through the Judiciary Committee; for the Senate must have the same control of it after it is reported back, that it has now. He hoped there would be no objection to considering the opinion of the committee.

Mr. BERRIEN said it was truly stated by the Senator from Missouri, that the bill he proposes, and the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina, present two questions—the question of repeal, and the question as to the terms of that repeal. But, independently of these, there was a third question. A portion of the Senate desired to have it inquired of, by a committee, whether, instead of an absolute repeal of the law, it might not be so modified as to make it conform to the interests of the country, and to the prevailing public opinion. With a view to ascertain whether such a modification could be proposed, it was asked that the bill might be referred to the Judiciary Committee. And surely, in relation to a matter of this important nature—in relation to the exercise of a power which could alone be exercised by the General Government—notwithstanding gentlemen might entertain the opinion that the bill, even when so modified, would not be acceptable to them, yet it was but one of the ordinary courtesies of legislation to allow gentlemen who may take a different view, an opportunity of presenting their views for the consideration of that body. He (Mr. BERRIEN) denied, therefore, that the reference of the bill to the committee would at all influence the vital question of repeal or no repeal. The only effect of the reference would be, to give those who were in favor of a modification of the law an opportunity of presenting their views in a deliberate form. He would not, however, object to the yeas and nays being taken.

Mr. BENTON said if there was any Senator present who would say that the vote he should give for reference would not commit him, he (Mr. B.) was willing to withdraw the call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. CRITTENDEN said he was disposed to gratify the gentleman by the reference, although he should vote for the repeal of the law.

Mr. MERRICK said he should vote for the reference, without feeling himself committed at all, with respect to the vote he should give on the question of repeal. He intended to vote for the repeal in some form.

Mr. BENTON said he would, then, withdraw his call for the yeas and nays.

The question was then taken on referring the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary, and decided in the affirmative—ayes 17, noes 12; and it was accordingly so referred.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. laid before the Senate a communication from the War Department, transmitting the annual report of the Commissioner of Pensions, containing a list of applicants for pensions, or increase of pension, which applications were rejected during the last year: ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Also, a message from the President, transmitting a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, covering despatches from the Mediterranean, giving correct information of the state of the relations of the United States with Morocco; which, on motion of Mr. BAYARD, was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. also stated that there were communications from the President of the United States of an executive character, on his desk.

Thereupon,

On motion of Mr. KING, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business, and spent the remainder of the day's session therein.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, December 14, 1842.

Mr. McKEON presented the petition of the Chamber of Commerce of the city of New York for a warehousing system; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

JOINT COMMITTEES.

Messrs. JAMES IRVIN, EDMUND BURKE, and P. G. GOODE, were this morning announced as the members, on the part of the House, of the Joint Committee on Enrolled Bills, &c.

CIVIL & DIPLOMATIC APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. FILLMORE, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the half of the calendar year ending the 30th day of June, 1843.

The bill was read a first and second time.

Mr. FILLMORE moved that it be committed to the Committee of the Whole, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CUSHING begged to ask the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means if the bill contained an appropriation for the pay of members of Congress, and the usual contingencies; so that no bill was to be introduced for that purpose, in anticipation of the ordinary civil and diplomatic appropriations.

Mr. FILLMORE replied, that this bill contained a provision for the pay of members of Congress, and the contingencies; and that no bill for that purpose would, therefore, be introduced in anticipation of the civil and diplomatic appropriations.

Mr. CUSHING observed that he was glad the committee had adopted that course.

The bill was then committed, and ordered to be printed.

ELECTION OF CHAPLAIN.

Mr. BRIGGS moved that the House proceed to the election of its Chaplain; which was agreed to.

Mr. BOWNE nominated the Rev. Mr. Tiffany of the Episcopal Church, of the State of New York.

Mr. HENRY nominated the Rev. Mr. Reese of the Methodist Church.

Mr. JAMES COOPER nominated the Rev. Mr. Muller of the Lutheran Church, now resident in the city of Washington.

Mr. PEARCE nominated the Rev. Mr. Sutherland of the Methodist Church.

Mr. MALLORY nominated the Rev. Mr. Clayton of the Methodist Church.

Mr. HUDSON nominated the Rev. Mr. Bullfinch of the Unitarian Church.

Mr. ARNOLD said he had been requested by several of his friends to nominate the Rev. Mr. Maffitt, their late Chaplain, whom he and his friends would rather hear than any other man [laughter] that they could get; and therefore they wanted to vote for him.

Mr. BARTON nominated the Rev. John Collins of the Methodist Church.

The nominations having all been made, Messrs. BOWNE, HENRY, and JAMES COOPER, were appointed tellers to receive the votes.

The vote having been taken,

Mr. BOWNE announced that the number of votes taken was - - - - 194
Necessary to a choice - - - 98
Of which—
Mr. Tiffany received - - - 78
Mr. Muller - - - - 34
Mr. Reese - - - - 29
Mr. Maffitt - - - - 19
Mr. Clayton - - - - 13
Mr. Bullfinch - - - - 13
Mr. Collins - - - - 5
Mr. Sutherland - - - - 3

As no candidate had received a majority of the votes given, there was no choice, and it became necessary to vote again.

Mr. L. W. ANDREWS inquired if it would not be in order to submit a resolution to elect the gentleman having a plurality of votes.

The SPEAKER replied that it would not.

Mr. BARTON withdrew the name of Mr. Collins from nomination.

A second vote was then taken, the result of which

Mr. BOWNE announced to be—
Whole number of votes - - 198
Necessary to a choice - - - 100
Of which—
Mr. Tiffany received - - - 119
Mr. Reese - - - - 39
Mr. Muller - - - - 29
Mr. Maffitt - - - - 10
Mr. Bulfinch - - - - 1

Mr. Tiffany having received a majority of all the votes given, he was declared duly elected to the chaplaincy of the House of Representatives for the present session.

A message was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. JOHN TYLER, jr., his secretary, as follows:

To the House of Representatives:

Two bills were presented to me, at the last session of Congress, which originated in the House of Representatives, neither of which was signed by me; and, both having been presented within ten days of the close of the session, neither has become a law.

The first of these was a bill entitled "An act to repeal the proviso of the sixth section of the act entitled 'An act to appropriate the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, and to grant pre-emption rights,' approved September fourth, one thousand eight hundred and forty-one."

This bill was presented to me on Tuesday, the 30th August, at twenty-four minutes after four o'clock in the afternoon.

For my opinions relative to the provisions contained in this bill, it is only necessary that I should refer to previous communications made by me to the House of Representatives.

The other bill was entitled "An act regulating the taking of testimony in cases of contested elections, and for other purposes."

This bill was presented to me at a quarter past one o'clock, on Wednesday, the thirty-first day of August. The two Houses, by concurrent vote, had already agreed to terminate the session by adjournment at two o'clock on that day—that is to say, within three-quarters of an hour from the time the bill was placed in my hands. It was a bill containing twenty-seven sections, and, I need not say, of an important nature.

On its presentation to me, its reading was immediately commenced; but was interrupted by so many communications from the Senate, and so many other causes operating at the last hour of the session, that it was impossible to read the bill understandingly, and with proper deliberation, before the hour fixed for the adjournment of the two Houses; and this, I presume, is a sufficient reason for neither signing the bill, nor returning it with my objections.

The 17th joint rule of the two Houses of Congress declares that "no bill or resolution that shall have passed the House of Representatives and the Senate shall be presented to the President of the United States, for his approbation, on the last day of the session."

This rule was evidently designed to give to the President a reasonable opportunity of perusing important acts of Congress, and giving them some degree of consideration, before signing or returning the same.

It is true, that the two Houses have been in the habit of suspending this rule, towards the close of the session, in relation to particular bills; and it appears by the printed journal, that, by concurrent votes of the two Houses, passed on the last day of the session, the rule was agreed to be suspended, so far as the same should relate to all such bills as should have been passed by the two Houses at one o'clock on that day. It is exceedingly to be regretted that a necessity should ever exist for such suspension, in the case of bills of great importance, and therefore demanding careful consideration.

As the bill has failed, under the provisions of the Constitution, to become a law, I abstain from expressing any opinions upon its several provisions, keeping myself wholly uncommitted as to my ultimate action on any similar measure, should the House think proper to originate it de novo, except so far as my opinion of the unqualified power of each House to decide for itself upon the election, returns, and qualifications of its own members, has been expressed by me, in a paper lodged in the Department of State, at the time of signing an act entitled "An act for the apportionment of Representatives among the several States, according to the sixth census," approved June the 22d, 1842," a copy of which is in possession of the House.

JOHN TYLER.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 14, 1842.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Department of State, containing an abstract of the returns of the collectors of the customs, made in pursuance of the provisions of the act for the protection of American seamen: referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a communication from the War Department, transmitting the annual report of the Commissioner of Pensions, of the amount of pensions paid for the past year.

Also, a communication from the Navy Department, enclosing a communication from Commodore Morgan, relative to the adjustment of our differences with Morocco: referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

TEMPERANCE.

Mr. BRIGGS called up the resolution submitted by him some days since, to amend the 19th joint rule, by striking out the word "spirituous," and inserting the word "intoxicating."

[The effect of this amendment would be to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors in the Capitol.]

Mr. WELLER asked if the resolution was in order.

The SPEAKER replied in the negative.

Mr. WELLER then objected to its consideration; upon which

Mr. BRIGGS moved a suspension of the rules; and the yeas and nays having been called for by Mr. CALHOUN, they were ordered, and resulted—yeas 125, nays 52—as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, L. W. Andrews, S. J. Andrews, Aycrigg, Baker, Barnard, Barton, Beeson, Bidlack, Birdseye, Blair, Boardman, Borden, Bowne, Briggs, Bronson, Aaron V. Brown, Milton Brown, Jeremiah Brown, Burnell, Wm. Butler, Calhoun, Caruthers, Cary, Casey, Chapman, Chittenden, John C. Clark, Clifford, Mark A. Cooper, Cranston, Cravens, Cushing, Richard D. Davis, Deberry, Doig, John Edwards, Fessenden, Fillmore, John G. Floyd, Fornance, Gamble, Gates, Gerry, Giddings, Gilmer, Patrick G. Goode, Granger, Hall, Halsted, Henry, Houck, Houston, Howard, Hudson, Hunt, Joseph R. Ingersoll, James Irvin, Wm. W. Irwin, James, Wm. Cost Johnson, Keim, John P. Kennedy, Linn, Littlefield, Abraham McClellan, Robert McClellan, McKay, McKennan, Marchand, Alfred Marshall, Samson Mason, Mathiot, Mathews, Mattocks, Maynard, Meriwether, Mitchell, Moore, Morgan, Morris, Newhard, Osborne, Payne, Pendleton, Plumer, Ramsey, Benjamin, Randall, Read, Reding, Rencher, Reynolds, Rhett, Ridgway, Riggs, Rodney, Roosevelt, William Russell, James M. Russell, Saltonstall, Sanford, Shaw, Sheppard, Slade, Truman Smith, Stokely, Stratton, Alexander H. H. Stuart, Summers, Jacob Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, Triplett, Trumbull, Underwood, Van Rensselaer, Warren, Washington, Westbrook, Christopher H. Williams, Winthrop, Wise, Wood, Yorke, Augustus Young, and John Young—125.

NAYS—Messrs. Arnold, Arrington, Atherton, Black, Burke, William O. Butler, Patrick C. Caldwell, Thomas J. Campbell, Clinton, Coles, James Cooper, Cowen, Cross, Garrett Davis, Dawson, Egbert, Everett, Ferris, Charles A. Floyd, A. Lawrence Foster, Goggin, Wm. O. Goode, Gordon, Hays, Holmes, Hunter, Charles J. Ingersoll, Jack, Andrew Kennedy, McKeon, Mallory, Miller, Morrow, Owsley, Patridge, Pearce, Rayner, Rogers, William Smith, Snyder, Stanly, Steenrod, Taliaferro, Turney, Van Buren, Ward, Watterson, Weller, Jos. L. White, and Joseph L. Williams—52.

So the rules were suspended; and, the resolution being before the House,

Mr. AYCRIGG offered the following as an amendment:

Resolved, That the restaurateurs be forthwith removed from the Capitol.

Mr. C. J. INGERSOLL suggested that this would remove the men, and not the places.

The amendment was adopted without opposition; and the resolution of Mr. BRIGGS, as thus amended, passed by acclamation.

WAREHOUSING SYSTEM.

Mr. McKEON asked leave to have referred to the Committee on Commerce a bill in relation to the warehousing system.

Mr. McKENNAN objected.

Mr. McKEON moved a suspension of the rules; but the House refused to suspend.

PETITIONS.

Mr. FILLMORE inquired what was the decision of the Speaker in regard to the offering of petitions.

The SPEAKER replied that the rule was without limit. It was in the power of members to introduce petitions at any time.

Mr. FILLMORE said he was perfectly content with the decision of the Chair.

Mr. BRONSON asked leave to offer a resolution, calling upon the Solicitor of the Treasury for information as to the amount of fees paid the several clerks of the Federal courts in cases of admiralty and bankruptcy.

Mr. BOWNE objected to the reception of the resolution; and it was not considered.

THE TARIFF.

Mr. READ asked leave to offer the following resolutions; which were read for information:

Whereas the act of Congress entitled "An act to provide revenue from imports, and to change and modify existing laws imposing duties on imports, and for other purposes," passed 30th August, 1842, having been passed in the hurry and confusion of the last day of a session, and therefore greatly defective, not only in its details, but in some of its principles, imposing prohibitory duties on a great variety of articles, thereby so far defeating itself, both in regard to revenue and protection—the latter, by administering a powerful stimulant to the smuggling trade; therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to report a bill, supplementary to the said act of the 30th August last, based upon the following principles, viz:

1. To produce an adequate revenue for the economical administration of the Government, and no more—say from twenty to twenty-three millions.

2. Articles classed as "necessaries of life," and entering into general consumption, of a description not grown or produced in the United States, to be admitted free of duty.

3. Articles imported, coming in competition with those grown or produced in the United States, to be taxed so as to give ample protection to our farmers, planters, manufacturers, and mechanics.

4. The measure of such protection to be, in all cases, so much duty as will make the cost of the foreign article in our markets equal to the cost of production in the United States, and no more.

5. If it should be found necessary to impose higher duties for revenue than are required by the said measure of protection, in such case luxuries to pay a higher duty than necessaries.

6. No drawback to be allowed on foreign sugars refined in the United States, nor on spirits distilled from foreign molasses.

7. No drawback to be allowed in any case, unless the goods shall be specially intended for exportation, and actually exported within ninety days from the time of importation.

8. The principle of cash duties to be preserved, except in the case of goods imported and entered for exportation, which may be warehoused.

9. All duties to be levied on the true value of the goods in the principal ports of the United States; such value to be ascertained by a board of commissioners, (to be appointed for that purpose,) in all cases where the importer shall appeal from the valuation or appraisement of the collector of the port.

TRADE WITH AUSTRIA AND PRUSSIA.

Mr. TRIPLETT offered a resolution, which was adopted, after being modified according to the suggestions of Messrs. WISE, McKEON, and ADAMS, in the following form:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to this House, as soon as conveniently may be, if not incompatible with the public interest, the communications to and from our ministers at Berlin and Vienna, subsequent to the last communication sent to this House on the subject of the trade and commerce between those respective countries and the United States.

NAVAL DEPOT AT MEMPHIS.

Mr. C. H. WILLIAMS offered the following resolution; which was adopted, (after an amendment by Mr. WISE, substituting the Committee on Naval Affairs for the Committee on Commerce.)

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a naval depot and dock-yard, at Memphis, in the State of Tennessee.

On motion of Mr. J. P. KENNEDY, the select committee of last session on the subject of international copy-right, (which failed to report for want of time,) was ordered to be revived.

EXTRA PAY.

Mr. C. J. INGERSOLL asked leave to offer a resolution granting to the officers, clerks, folders, pages, &c. of the House, the same extra pay which was allowed to the same in the Senate at the last session of Congress.

Mr. BLACK objected, and the resolution was not received.

Messrs. J. C. CLARK and GIDDINGS severally attempted to introduce resolutions of inquiry; but were defeated by the intervention of objections.

CONTESTED ELECTION.

Mr. MORGAN called for the question on the motion pending at the adjournment yesterday, to refer certain additional testimony, in the case of the contested election of the Delegate from Florida, [Mr. LEVY,] to the Committee on Elections; and, the question being stated by the Speaker,

Mr. BARTON presented still further testimony on behalf of the sitting member; and he moved that it be printed.

The SPEAKER announced the question to be on the motion to refer.

Mr. MORGAN entered into a statement of facts in connexion with the taking of this testimony, and urged the propriety of referring the whole subject back to the Committee on Elections.

Mr. HOPKINS said he did not understand the character of the testimony now presented to the House to be such as to render it necessary to refer the whole subject back. It was important that the question should be settled. The sitting member had invoked a decision; but, if the case were referred back to the Committee on Elections, with this additional correspondence, for re-examination, they might not expect a report until the close of the present short session, when it would be impossible to have a full attendance of the House for a decision of a question like that. There could be no objection to the printing of this additional testimony; and then they would have it before the House, which would be as competent to determine the case as any committee could be.

Mr. BARTON, Mr. HALSTED, Mr. TURNEY, and Mr. MORGAN, entered into statements relative to the admissibility of certain testimony, and discussed the necessity of the proposed reference.

Mr. LEVY begged to be allowed to say a word or two in explanation of the circumstances under which he acted, and of the course which he had deemed it his duty to take. Such action as the House might determine to take on this subject, would be in accordance with its own views of justice and propriety; and he had no suggestion to make in regard it, and no desire to influence its action. He had, from the first, deemed it to be his duty, because most consistent with propriety, to refrain from expressing any opinion, either in regard to the proceedings of the committee, or of the House. He was himself satisfied that he had the right to represent the people of Florida on this floor, and that he was a citizen of the United States. The people of Florida themselves were perfectly satisfied as to these particulars. He would, however, make a brief explanation of facts, in order to give the House a more perfect understanding of the subject. After the election, under which he was returned as the delegate from the Territory of Florida, a few individuals, impelled by personal motives, who had opposed his election, and who had the benefit of their opposition at the polls, made a remonstrance to the House, in which they denied his right to represent the Territory in Congress. There was no contesting candidate appearing here to canvass his right to his seat; but these men, who came as remonstrants, came also as witnesses. They were not only witnesses, but some of them went to the extent of seven depositions each, who were not in Florida at the time the transactions took place about which they undertook to testify. Now he would say to the House, that, having regarded this matter as an inquiry instituted by itself, for its own satisfaction, whether the delegation from Florida had been properly filled by the people of that Territory—taking it as a question between this House and the people of Florida, he had not deemed it consistent with self respect, and with the respect he owed both to the House and the people of Florida, to say anything to influence its action. When the question came up before the House, on the report of the Committee of Elections, he should then ask to be heard. Whether the House would refer this matter back again to the committee, or proceed with the report of the committee of the last session, were questions in regard to which he had not a word to say. As the chairman of the committee, however, had gone into a statement of facts, which might have some effect on the minds of members of the House, he begged leave to make a plain and simple statement in reply to it. So far as notice was concerned, he contended that ample and sufficient notice, and of the best kind, was given of the depositions taken by him. That notice was given in the public papers of Florida, from one end of the Territory to the other. He did not choose to recognise one of these remonstrants more than another, in giving notice; and there being some hundred of them, had he given a notice to one, the other ninety-nine might have had cause of complaint.

Mr. HALSTED inquired of the gentleman whether he was not informed last session that the attorneys of the remonstrants would receive the notices.

Mr. LEVY replied that Mr. Peter Schenk Smith informed him that Mr. Richard S. Coxe of this place, or General Hernandez, or himself, would receive notices; but he should like to know what right one of the remonstrants had to appoint attorneys to act for all of them. With respect to the deposition of his father, (Moses C. Levy,) made in the city of New York, he was ready to make an explanation to the House; though it was painful to him to approach this part of the subject. On receiving notice that this deposition was to be taken, he went on to New York, and endeavored to obtain an interview with his father, without effect. Having been denied this interview, he could not attend the taking of the testimony, but appointed a friend to act in his place, directing him not to subject his parent to a cross-examination. He afterwards, having seen the deposition, drew up and submitted certain interrogatories, necessary to elicit some important facts. God knew that his only object throughout had been to elicit truth, and to lay before the House all the facts of the case. If there were any little technicalities of which gentlemen who were pressing this matter wished to avail themselves, he was willing that they should have the benefit of them. All he wanted was, that all the truth should be brought out. The main ground of this case was his right of citizenship; and to establish this, he depended upon the public records of the country. All other testimony he looked upon as of very little importance. That record was in the State Department, transmitted and deposited there in pursuance of law. It had been acquiesced in, from that time to this; and if the House was now prepared to go behind this record, and inquire into the facts upon which it was made, then he would say that there was very little regard to be paid to public faith. After a few more remarks, Mr. L. said, that the only evidence on which the House was now asked to recommit this matter to the Committee of Elections, was a correspondence between Messrs. Peter Schenk Smith, and Moses C. Levy, his principal witness, in which they dispute about what the former heard the latter say to him. On such testimony as this, the House was asked to send this matter back to the Committee of Elections, to go over all their investigations again.

The question was then taken, and the motion of Mr. HALSTED was rejected.

On motion by Mr. CUSHING, the select committee raised on the petition of Washington Irving and others, on the subject of an international copyright law, was authorized to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. BARTON offered a resolution for the appointment of a select committee to inquire into the expediency of abolishing the military superintendencies at the national armories, and of substituting civil superintendencies in their stead; also to inquire into the abuses alleged to exist in these establishments.

Objected to by several, and the resolution was not received.

The House then adjourned.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 15, 1842.

Mr. CALHOUN appeared in his seat to-day.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented a memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of Philadelphia, praying Congress to adopt the warehouse system as a part of the revenue system. Mr. B. said that, as the Chamber of Commerce represented a large body of the merchants, he would ask that the memorial be printed, and referred to the same committee to which similar memorials had been referred: agreed to.

Mr. BARROW presented a petition from V. Leblanc, praying compensation for services therein mentioned; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

On motion by Mr. LINN, it was ordered that the petition and papers of Benjamin Crawford, asking indemnity for losses sustained in consequence of having his boarding settlement broken up by an officer of the United States army, be taken from the files of the Senate, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana reported back, from the Committee on Public Lands, without amendment, the bill for the relief of sundry citizens of Arkansas, who lost their improvements in consequence of the treaty between the United States and the Choctaw Indians; and

The bill in relation to a donation of land to certain persons in the State of Arkansas.

Also, reported back, with amendments, which were read, the bill authorizing the relinquishment of the sixteenth sections granted for the use of schools, and the entry of other lands in lieu thereof.

On motion by Mr. EVANS, it was ordered that the petition of Thomas Fillebrown be taken from the files of the Senate, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. CONRAD, it was ordered that the memorial and papers of René Vienne be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. WRIGHT presented a memorial from a large number of citizens of Yates county, New York, praying Congress for the instant repeal of the bankrupt law; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BATES, on leave, introduced a bill for the relief of the Steamboat Company of Nantucket; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. RIVES presented a memorial from Mrs. Frances M. Lewis and Mary Neal, widows of late officers in the navy of the United States, who were lost on board of the United States sloop of war "Epervier," praying a restoration of the pension which they heretofore received under the navy pension law, and which has been withheld from them in consequence of the repeal of such law: referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. CONRAD submitted the following resolution; which lies one day under the rule, viz:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to communicate to the Senate whether any, and what, amount of money had been refunded to claimants in virtue of the act entitled "An act in relation to lands held in the Greensburg, late St. Helena district, in the State of Louisiana, and authorizing the resurvey of certain lands in said district," approved August 29, 1842; whether, in any cases, the claimants have received reimbursement of the price paid by them for lands in complying, or offering to comply, with the provisions of said act, and such reimbursement has been refused, and the reasons for such refusal; and whether any, and what, proceedings have taken place under said act.

THE QUINTUPLE TREATY.

Mr. BENTON submitted the following resolution; which lies one day, under the rule, viz:

Resolved, That the President be requested to inform the Senate whether the quintuple treaty, for the suppression of the slave-trade, has been communicated to the Government of the United States in any form whatever? And if so, by whom? for what purpose? and what answer may have been returned to such communication? Also, to communicate to the Senate all the information which may have been received by the Government of the United States, going to show that the "course which this Government might take in relation to said treaty has excited no small degree of attention and discussion in Europe." Also, to inform the Senate how far the "warm animadversions," and the "great political excitement," which this treaty has caused in Europe, have any application or reference to these United States. Also, to inform the Senate what danger there was of having the "laws and the obligations" of the United States, in relation to the suppression of the slave-trade, "executed by others," if we did not "remove their pretext and motive for violating our flag, and executing our laws," by entering into the stipulations for the African squadron, and the remonstrating embassies, which are contained in the eighth and ninth articles of the late British treaty.

Messrs. STURGEON and LINN gave notice that they would, on to-morrow, ask leave to introduce certain bills.

Mr. McROBERTS gave notice that he would ask leave, on to-morrow, to introduce a bill to amend the several laws granting pre-emption rights to settlers on the public lands.

Mr. McR. remarked that there were some suggestions in the President's message in regard to the propriety of disposing of the mineral lands belonging to the United States. He moved that so much of the message as related to that subject be referred to the Committee on the Public Lands: agreed to.

On motion of Mr. LINN, it was

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to return to the General Land Office all the original papers on file in his office, which accompanied the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, of the 10th of January, 1838, and contained in Senate Document 97, of the 2d session of the 25th Congress.

Mr. FULTON, on leave, introduced a bill perfecting titles to land south of the Arkansas river, held under the treaty of New Madrid, and pre-emption rights under the act of 1814; which was twice read, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. BAYARD moved that, when the Senate adjourn, it adjourn to meet on Monday next: agreed to.

On motion of Mr. BAYARD, the Senate then proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and, after some time spent thereon,

Adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, December 15, 1842.

Mr. PARMENTER presented the petition of Mary Page for a revolutionary pension; of Mary J. Babbit for a naval pension; of John C. Clark for increase of pay of captains's clerks in the navy; all of which were referred to the appropriate committees.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The following Executive communications were laid on the table of the House of Representatives on Monday last, to which we were only able then to allude in general terms:

A letter from the Secretary of War, in obedience to a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 30th of August last, transmitting a statement of the private establishments at which fire-arms are manufactured for the Government, where situated, the number annually fabricated, at what prices, &c; which letter and statements were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A letter from the Secretary of War, in answer to the resolution of the House of the 25th May last, transmitting a statement of the number of the officers of the army, with the rates of pay and allowance, &c.: laid on the table.

A letter from the Secretary of War, in answer to a resolution of the House of the 11th August, transmitting a statement of the number of resignations in the army since the 1st of January, 1834, with the causes of the same, so far as known; and how many of the said officers who resigned were educated at West Point, with any further information upon the same subject: laid on the table.

A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report of the Third Auditor of the Treasury, in answer in part to the resolution of the House of the 28th of February last, requiring a report of all cases of extra compensation heretofore allowed to officers of the army for services similar to those rendered by General Scott, for which he is said to have received extra allowance; together with the names of such officers, the time when received, the amount paid to each, &c., and stating his inability to determine when the answer will be completed: laid on the table.

A letter from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting, in obedience to the joint resolution of Congress of the 29th of May, 1830, a report from the Commissioner of Pensions of the names of persons who have applied for relief under the navy pension laws, and whose claims have been rejected, and the reasons for such rejection: laid on the table.

A letter from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting, agreeably to the provisions of the act of Congress of the 3d of March, 1809, an abstract of the contingent expenses of the naval establishment from the 1st of October, 1841, to the 30th of September, 1842, inclusive: laid on the table.

A letter from the Treasurer of the United States, transmitting copies of the Treasurer's accounts with the United States for the third and fourth quarters of 1841, and the first and second quarters of 1842, as adjusted by the accounting officers of the department: laid on the table.

A letter from the Clerk of the House of Representatives, transmitting his report of the expenditure of the contingent fund of the House of Representatives: referred to the Committee of Accounts.

A letter from the Commissioner of Public Buildings, transmitting copies of all contracts made in his office from the 1st of December, 1841, to the present time, with the names of the applicants for said contracts, and the amount of their respective bids: referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

FEES IN BANKRUPTCY.

Mr. BRONSON offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, required to obtain, with as little delay as practicable, a statement of fees taxed by the several clerks of the circuit and district courts of the United States, in admiralty and bankrupt cases: showing the amount of fees taxed by said several clerks, with the items constituting said amount in a case in admiralty; and, also, in a case in bankruptcy, either to the bankrupt, or a creditor, when there is no adverse appearance; and showing the whole amount of fees that have been actually paid to each clerk on petitions, and other proceedings under the bankrupt act, to this date; and, also, the amount received by said clerks for filing papers, &c; and for blank forms and copies, in cases of bankruptcy under said act, and up to this date.

Mr. BOWNE said he would not object to this resolution, if it was not to impede the speedy action of the House on the bill to repeal the bankrupt law; but he wished to know if it was to have such an effect.

Mr. BRONSON replied in the negative.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON inquired if it was not requisite that this resolution should lie over for one day.

The SPEAKER was understood to reply that it must lie over, if objected to.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON then objected, and the resolution was laid over.

CIVIL AND DIPLOMATIC APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. FILLMORE said it was of considerable importance that the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill, which he reported yesterday from the Committee of Ways and Means, should be acted upon immediately; and therefore he moved that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole, for the purpose of taking up that bill.

The motion was agreed to, and Mr. BRIGGS was called to the chair.

The CHAIRMAN directed the Clerk to read the bill No. 615, being "A bill making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the half calendar year ending the 30th day of June, 1843."

The Clerk accordingly read the bill through all its sections. It was then taken up by sections, and the committee proceeded, without objection, through all the sections to the following item in the Treasury Department:

"For extra clerk hire, $750."

Mr. GILMER moved to strike out this item. At the last session of Congress, he said, there were several investigations instituted into the expenditures of the various departments at the seat of Government; and he knew not what effect those investigations produced on the minds of other gentlemen, but he would say, for himself, that they left on his mind no doubt that there were too many clerks—too many regular clerks employed in those various departments. He would not say there were too many in all the offices of the General Government; but, speaking in the aggregate, he was satisfied there were too many employed in the various departments, and that the public service demanded that there should be a reduction rather than an increase in that quarter. He was therefore surprised to see a permanent item for extra clerk-hire introduced into this bill by the Committee of Ways and Means. They had hitherto been told, when efforts were made to reduce the expenditures of the departments, that, in consequence of the calls for information by Congress, the regular clerks were not adequate to keep pace with the public business. Now, if there were any necessity for the employment of extra clerks, he wished to know it. He would not consume the time of the committee with arguments, which must necessarily be but a repetition of the arguments adduced at the last session, not only in the shape of speeches, but also of reports from investigating committees; but he would ask whether the Congress of the United States intended to authorize, as a permanent system, the employment of 600 or 700 permanent clerks in the various departments, and then make an annual appropriation for extra clerk-hire? He knew, from his own personal examination, that, in the various offices in the departments, there were more clerks than could now be profitably employed. He knew there were some who were not employed more than one-fourth of their time. There was, then, a superabundance of labor; and (he was understood to say) it had been suggested that the executive departments should be authorized by law to transfer labor from one office, where there should be found to be a superabundance, to offices where there should be found to be a deficiency; and thus the extra clerk-hire might be dispensed with. The extent of the evil, he further observed, was not set forth in this item; for it would be perceived that this bill made only a temporary appropriation—it was but an appropriation for half the calendar year; and therefore another appropriation would be necessary, as it was evident it was contemplated; and therefore, satisfied as he was that they might produce a slight temporary inconvenience by withholding this appropriation, he believed a great counterbalancing good would ensue if the committee agreed with him, and should strike out this and similar items.

There was another class of appropriations which he had hoped had received their quietus at the last session—he alluded to that class called "miscellaneous." He must be permitted to express the opinion, that, whatever party conflicts there might be in the country, and whatever party might be in power, this would never be an honest Government until it was a cheap one; nor would it ever be satisfactory to the people, until their Representatives caused accounts to be published showing how the revenue was raised, and what were the purposes for which it was appropriated. There were striking defects in the system, which should be corrected by the publication from time to time of statements and accounts of all the receipts and all the expenditures of the Government. There were many items of a million of dollars in the accounts; and he would ask what information did they derive from such an item? None whatever; and therefore they wanted the items, dollar for dollar, specifically stated. A reformation in the Auditors' and Comptrollers' offices was requisite, by which they should be furnished with specific information, instead of being, as at present, compelled to go through the vouchers when filed away. His object was to ascertain distinctly, item by item, how the money of the Government was expended. He desired also to avoid these miscellaneous expenditures, which the people did not understand; but particularly at this time he hoped the committee would see the propriety of suspending this appropriation for extra clerk-hire.

Mr. FILLMORE confessed that he was a little surprised at so long a speech on so small an item. He was as ready, however, to discuss this question now, as he would be at any future time; and he would make such an explanation as he trusted would be satisfactory to the gentleman. The gentleman said that he made the motion to strike out this appropriation for extra clerk-hire merely for the purpose of testing the question whether, in any case, an appropriation should be made for that object in any of the departments. Now, this subject underwent a good deal of discussion at the last session; and he had hoped that it was then definitively settled by the act then passed. If the gentleman would take the trouble to look into the laws of the last session, he would find that these appropriations, being liable to abuse in consequence of their general character, were stricken out of the general appropriation bill, and embodied in a bill framed to provide for them all, and specifying each particular object. The committee, in reporting this bill, did not stop there, but inserted a section, not only for the purpose of guarding against abuses, but for avoiding these annual discussions of small matters. It was, however, necessary that these appropriations should be made. You must (said Mr. F.) either employ a force of permanent clerks sufficiently large, not only to carry on the ordinary business of the departments, but to meet all the extraordinary calls that may be made on them, by Congress or otherwise; or you must employ a force sufficient to carry on all the ordinary business, and allow the departments to employ extra clerks for extraordinary business. The latter mode was unquestionably the more economical.

Mr. F. here handed up to the Chair the law passed at the last session, and directed the Clerk to read the 10th and 11th sections; which was done. These sections provide that no extra clerks shall be employed in any of the executive departments, except during the session of Congress, to enable them to meet the calls of Congress; and then only when the heads of departments shall believe that the employment of such extra clerks is indispensably necessary for the public service.

Mr. GILMER was aware of the law to which the gentleman alluded, and he believed the law was a very good one. But here was no evidence showing that the employment of extra clerks was necessary; and the making the appropriation in advance, was encouraging the departments to employ extra clerks, whether necessary or not. He would ask the gentleman from New York if he had any information showing the necessity of employing extra clerks.

Mr. FILLMORE said that the business which would require the employment of extra clerks could not be foreseen; that depending almost altogether on the calls that might be made by Congress, and therefore the departments could not say how much would be necessary.

Mr. GILMER said, then this appropriation was to provide in advance for the payment of services that might or might not be necessary; and he was therefore opposed to it. The state of the treasury admonished them to avoid useless expense; and if it should be ascertained, before the close of the session, that the public service required the employment of extra clerks, it would be then time enough to make the appropriation.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia inquired of his colleague how the service was to be paid for, if no appropriation was made, should the heads of departments find the employment of extra clerks indispensably necessary for the public service.

Mr. GILMER said that the very law read by the chairman required that no extra clerks should be employed in any of the departments, unless the heads of departments found that their employment was indispensably necessary for the public service. Now, there was nothing here to show that the employment of extra clerks was necessary.

Mr. SMITH said that there was the power given to the heads of departments; but where was the appropriation to pay for the service rendered? Were heads of departments to employ clerks when they found it indispensably necessary to do so, in order to answer the calls that may be made by Congress, and then trust to the contingency of obtaining an appropriation to pay them?

Mr. BLACK said that he would vote for the appropriation with pleasure, if there was any report from the departments showing that it would be necessary. He understood this appropriation was proposed for labor to be done hereafter. But upon what data, on what information, and for what necessity was this appropriation to be made? Whenever the departments should have complied with the act of last session, he should be willing to vote the money.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia said he had a few remarks to make on the subject before the committee. It seemed to him that the appropriation was proper, and should be made. It was for clerks not in regular employment, and who might not and would not be employed unless there was service for them to perform. It was true that no duties now existed to be performed; yet such might arise. Suppose Congress should make calls for information, to be prepared during the recess; it would be absolutely necessary to employ extra clerks. How were they to be paid without an appropriation?

Mr. BLACK had no doubt of the general correctness of the position of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. SMITH;] but he wished to know whether the law of Congress, making it the duty of the departments to report the necessity of employing these extra clerks, had been complied with?

Mr. FILLMORE remarked that the law merely required a report of past expenditures; it had nothing to do with future ones. Next year, the report would come in, stating how the money now proposed to be appropriated had been expended.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia resumed, and read a portion of the law of last session, specifying when extra clerks shall be employed, and what shall be the duty of the departments in relation thereto. It would be perceived that the difficulty of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLACK] was obviated by the fact, that a report of the manner in which this money had been spent would, according to the law, have to be made at the next session of Congress. Again: he knew of a case where a call was made for information two years since, and not complied with, owing to the inadequacy of labor in the department. Would the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLACK] have the clerks in employment without pay? Such would be the case, unless this appropriation were passed.

In making these remarks, he did not hesitate to avow his belief that there were many inefficient clerks in the departments, and much room for reform. It was often the case that clerks who should be attending to their duties, were walking on the avenue during office-hours. This, however, was no reason why temporary clerks would not have to be employed. The object of the appropriation was, to place funds at the disposal of the departments, in case extra hire should be needed. It was necessary, he thought, that the heads of departments should be trusted with the contingent expenditure of this money; and there was no reason to believe that those officers would employ any extra clerks, unless absolutely necessary to carry on the public business.

Mr. CUSHING obtained the floor, but yielded it to

Mr. FILLMORE, who stated that the committee had reduced the amount asked for by the department in a very great degree.

Mr. BLACK rose, and was proceeding to reply to some of the remarks of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. SMITH,] when

Mr. CUSHING claimed the floor, and remarked that he hoped, by a brief explanation, to explain the obscurity which existed in the minds of some of the gentlemen who had addressed the House regarding this matter. He believed it was understood by the House, that, until the last session, there were a number of clerks employed in the departments without authority of law. It was then deemed important that there should be a standing law on the subject; and accordingly a bill was reported by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. J. R. INGERSOLL,] subsequently passed, specifying the number of clerks to be employed, and giving a legal existence to many who had been before but temporary. It then became necessary to make provision for extra clerk-hire, and the regulations were established. The first was, that extra clerks should only be employed under previous regulations; and the second, that there should be a subsequent responsibility for their hire, and for the expenditure so incurred. Thus, whether there be $100 or $100,000 appropriated to this object, not one dollar could be spent unless to prepare information required by a call from Congress. Should Congress call for information, and should there be no appropriation, the Secretaries should say at once that there was no money, and the information could not be had.

The question now involved was, whether the House were willing to intrust this contingent appropriation to the heads of bureaus for one particular purpose, and for that only. He averred that, without a certain degree of discretion being allowed to those officers, it would be impossible to carry on the Government.

Mr. GILMER said, he might be mistaken in his views; but, until he was convinced to the contrary, he must persist in the course he had taken. From a careful investigation which he had made in the departments, on a committee at the last session, he had come to the conclusion that there were more permanent clerks than were necessary to the public service. Acting, then, upon this ground, how could he vote for extra clerks? When the committee had reported that, out of eighty clerks in the Land Office, at least twenty could be dispensed with, and one-third in the Indian Department, how would he be justified in voting for more?

Mr. TILLINGHAST remarked, that the decision of this matter depended much upon the facts of the case. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GILMER] was convinced that no more clerks were required, whilst the departments thought otherwise. He (Mr. T.) had every confidence in the statement of the gentleman from Virginia; yet he preferred to take the opinion of the departments, and should act upon that in giving his vote for the appropriation asked for.

Mr. BLACK reiterated his objections to the item of appropriation. Were it for past services —for labor already performed—he should have no objection to vote the money; but he could not consent to vote an appropriation for services that might or might not be rendered hereafter. In the present condition of the treasury, he thought that it was incumbent on the Representatives of the people to persist in the utmost economy of appropriation and expenditure of the public funds. To make appropriations in cases like the present, he was well convinced, would be butto invite expenditures.

Mr. WISE addressed the committee at large in favor of the item, and in reply to the remarks of his colleague, [Mr. GILMER.] He contended that it was the true policy of the Government to employ temporary clerks at particular seasons, instead of a greater number of permanent clerks all the year; and he illustrated his position by reference to the situation of the farmer, with whom it was almost invariably a rule to hire a small force during the year, and many extra hands, at advanced prices, during harvest. The sessions of Congress were the harvest-times in the departments, when more laborers were required.

Mr. J. W. JONES agreed with his colleague in the propriety of retrenching the expenditures of the Government, where it could be done without injury to the public service; but he doubted whether his colleague would accomplish his object, if he succeeded in striking out the appropriation for extra clerk-hire; on the contrary, it might be true economy to make the appropriation which was there asked on the part of the Committee of Ways and Means. The question was by no means new to the House, or to the committee; for it was a subject which had very frequently engaged the attention of committees, not only of the present session of Congress, but of sessions which had gone by. He remembered very well, several years ago, when it was sought to introduce some such items into an appropriation bill, with reference to other parts of the Government, his attention was particularly drawn to the subject, and he then examined it with great care. It was brought to his attention, and that of the committee, by an appropriation asked for on behalf of the General Land Office; and the committee was at first of opinion that it was a subject which was exceedingly liable to abuse; and the Commissioner was called upon to furnish the reasons which induced him to ask for that appropriation; and he (Mr. JONES) remembered well that it was the most judicious application of money that could be made—particularly in that branch of the public service. And the reasons which applied there, would also apply here. Why, in some of the land offices, one or two clerks were all that were required to discharge their duties; but, when the land sales came on, the duties increased ten, twenty, yea, perhaps a hundred-fold, and for, perhaps, one, two, or three weeks. Every gentleman would see, then, the propriety and the economy of calling in an additional force for one, two, or even four weeks, to discharge the extra duties, without interfering with the permanent service of the establishment. During the sessions of Congress, it was well known to every one who had witnessed the repeated calls on the various departments for information, that the regular force was inadequate for such exigencies; and it was true economy to call in extra aid.

Mr. G. DAVIS, Mr. WISE, and Mr. BIDLACK entered into explanations respecting the intention of the Secretary of the Treasury some time since to dispense with a portion of the clerks in his department.

Mr. BIDLACK observed that he would detain the committee but a moment, merely for the purpose of referring to a document to show that his recollections in regard to the statement made by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. G. DAVIS] were correct. From this document, it would be seen that, so far from its being true, as stated by the gentleman, that the Secretary of the Treasury contemplated a reduction of the force of the Land Office, the contrary was the fact. In document No. 90, of the last session, it would be found that a resolution was passed on the 13th of August last, calling on the Secretary to report to the House whether there could be any reduction made in the force of his department. With a view to answer this call, the acting Secretary of the Treasury called on the Commissioner of the General Land Office for information on that point in regard to his office. The Commissioner made a report in answer, which he would not detain the House by reading; but it was sufficient for him to say that the Commissioner stated, in substance, that he had been too short a time in office to determine with certainty whether any part of his clerical force could be reduced consistently with a due regard for the public service; but he gave his opinion that there was certain business that ought to be done, and, if that were done, there could be no reduction. Upon this report the Secretary of the Treasury, so far from contemplating a reduction in the General Land Office, said that he concurred with the Commissioner in the views there given by him. Mr. B. said that he referred to this document merely for the purpose of showing that his recollections of the circumstances were correct.

The question was then taken on Mr. GILMER's motion to strike out the appropriation, and rejected without a division.

The Clerk then proceeded with the reading of the bill, until he came to the appropriations for contingent expenses of the bureau of medicine and surgery of the Navy Department; when,

On motion by Mr. FILLMORE, the appropriation was reduced from $450 to $250.

On motion by Mr. MALLORY, the appropriation for contingent expenses of the bureau of provisions and clothing was also reduced from $450 to $250.

When the appropriation for the Post Office Department was reached,

Mr. SMITH of Virginia offered an amendment, appropriating $7,000 for continuing certain clerks in the office of the Auditor of the said department; but, on an explanation from Mr. FILLMORE, withdrew the amendment.

After proceeding with a few more items of the bill, the committee rose and reported progress.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a report from the Treasury Department, containing the estimates of the expenditures for the civil and diplomatic departments of the Government for the half year ending the 30th of June, 1843; which,

On motion by Mr. FILLMORE, was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed, with two thousand extra copies.

Also, the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the state of the finances; which was referred to the same committee, and ordered to be printed, with ten thousand extra copies.

Also, a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, enclosing the annual report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office; which was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed, with ten thousand extra copies.

Also, a communication from the Third Auditor of the Treasury Department; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

The House then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, December 16, 1842.

Mr. SHAW referred the following petitions to the appropriate committees, under the rule of the House:

The petition of widow Olive Thompson, and Margaret Gould, both of Portsmouth, N. H., praying for an alteration in the pension law passed August 23, 1842; and

The petition of William Russell, of Portsmouth, N. H., praying for a fishing bounty.

Mr. BEESON presented the petition of John H. Bugher, Thomas Baird, and twenty-five others, citizens of the United States, praying for the repeal of the bankrupt law: referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. HUBARD presented the following petitions; which were referred to the appropriate committees, under the recent rule adopted by the House of Representatives:

Petition of William Anglia for a pension;

Petition of Thomas Harvey for a pension;

Petition of Major Tarlton Woodson for commutation pay;

Petition of Major John Brent's heirs for seven years' half pay;

Petition of Major Joseph Michaux's heirs for commutation pay; and the Petition of Daniel Guerrant for a pension.

Mr. WM. O. BUTLER presented the petition of Southerland Mayfield, praying that his pension may be extended to the time he received his wound: referred to the Committee on Pensions.

CAPITOL HILL INSTITUTE.

Mr. BOWNE offered the following resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the use of this hall be granted to the Capitol Hill Institute on Saturday evening next, at 7 o'clock, for the delivery of a lecture before the association by the Hon. LEVI WOODBURY.

FEES IN BANKRUPTCY.

Mr. BRONSON called up his resolution, which he submitted yesterday, in the following words:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, required to obtain, with as little delay as practicable, a statement of fees taxed by the several clerks of the circuit and district courts of the United States, in admiralty and bankrupt cases showing the amount of fees taxed by said several clerks, with the items constituting said amount in a case in admiralty; and, also, in a case in bankruptcy, either to the bankrupt, or a creditor, when there is no adverse appearance; and showing the whole amount of fees that have been actually paid to each clerk on petitions, and other proceedings under the bankrupt act, to this date; and, also, the amount received by said clerks for filing papers, &c., and for blank forms and copies, in cases of bankruptcy under said act, and up to this date.

Mr. J. R. INGERSOLL inquired if the gentleman from Maine had examined a set of resolutions passed at the last session, to ascertain whether they did not cover the whole ground?

Mr. BRONSON replied that the resolution alluded to by the gentleman from Pennsylvania did not comprehend the information which he sought to obtain.

The resolution was then agreed to.

LATE COLLECTOR OF PHILADELPHIA.

Mr. TOLAND submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to inform this House whether any charges have at any time been preferred to the department against Jonathan Roberts, late collector of the port of Philadelphia, relative to his discharge of the duties of said office; and, if any have been, that he be directed to furnish copies of the same. Also, that he transmit to this House copies of any order, instruction, or request, addressed to the said Jonathan Roberts, to remove or appoint any subordinate officer of the customs at the port of Philadelphia. Also, a copy of the order or letter dismissing him from the office of collector of said port: and copies of all letters and papers in possession of the department relating to the subjects embraced by this resolution.

Objection was made to the reception of the resolution.

Mr. TOLAND moved a suspension of the rules, for its reception.

The SPEAKER being unable to decide on the vote, (being taken viva voce,)

Mr. BOTTS called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

Mr. WISE said the gentleman from Pennsylvania had better make his call on the President of the United States, as he was the officer who had the power of removal in such cases, and as the papers might be with him, and not with the Secretary.

Mr. TOLAND was understood to reply that he only called for such matters as were in the control of the department, and such as this House had the right to call for.

The yeas and nays were then taken, and the result was, yeas 96, nays 81; which being less than a majority of two-thirds, the rules were not suspended.

IRREGULARITY OF THE MAILS.

Mr. MERIWETHER submitted the following resolution, and it was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Postmaster General inform this House what, if any, arrangements have been made by that department to secure the more regular transportation of the mail between Washington City and Augusta, Georgia; how many failures of the mail between these places have been reported to that department between the 1st day of July last and the 1st day of December, instant; what contractors have been fined, and how often, and to what amount, during the same period.

CIVIL AND DIPLOMATIC APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FILLMORE moved that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill No. 615, being a bill making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of Government for the half calendar year ending the 30th day of June, 1843.

The motion was agreed to, and Mr. BRIGGS took the chair.

The committee then proceeded with the bill, and passed through various items until it came to the appropriation for defraying the various expenses of the Supreme, Circuit, and District Courts of the United States, $238,000; when

Mr. C. J. INGERSOLL moved to reduce the appropriation $50,000. The committee would recollect, he said, that when this subject was under consideration last session, he made the same motion that he now did—that is, to reduce the appropriation one hundred thousand dollars for the year. The subject was fully discussed, and the proposition was adopted—first in Committee of the Whole, and afterwards in the House, by a majority of twenty-five on the call of the yeas and nays. The object was to reduce what was considered to be a great and unnecessary expense in this department of the Government; and this object having been accomplished, an attempt was made in the Senate to restore the sum that had been stricken out in the House. That attempt was negatived by a decisive vote; but, at the last expiring moment of the session, the chairman of the Committee on Finance in the Senate succeeded in getting the $100,000 put back in the bill making an appropriation for the Wyandot Indians. In this way, the appropriation was got through the Senate, and ultimately through the House. Mr. I. said that it was due to economy, and due to the esprit du corps of the House, (which was the purse-bearer of the nation,) that, when it thought fit to reduce the appropriation, the Senate should not be permitted to smuggle it back in this way.

Mr. FILLMORE admitted that the expenditure which the gentleman wished to reduce was extravagantly high, and that some abuses existed in this department of the Government which ought to be corrected. But Mr. F. said that the withholding the appropriations would not remedy the evils complained of. The officers of the Judiciary had established fees; and, if they were not paid this year, they must be the next. Mr. F. intimated that some further legislation would be necessary to correct the abuses complained of; and that the committee proposed to bring in a bill for that purpose before the close of the session.

Mr. C. J. INGERSOLL hardly knew what to say to this. He had no doubt that all the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means said was perfectly sincere; and that the assurance he gave the House to have further action on the subject before the close of the session would be verified.

The Chairman acknowledged that there was something extremely wrong, and, he (Mr. J) must be permitted to say, something that could only be remedied in the way he proposed. If he understood the matter, these very large charges occurred in this way: The officers of the courts, witnesses, jurors, &c., and all the persons concerned in the administration of justice, received a certain per diem compensation, and the courts sat so many days in the year more than was necessary, that their expenses were greatly increased. He took it, therefore, that it was in the power of the House, by reducing the fund placed at the disposition of this department, to be distributed among the officers of the different courts, to keep their expenses within reasonable bounds.

After a further explanation from Mr. FILLMORE,

Mr. INGERSOLL withdrew his motion, reserving to himself the power of renewing it in the House.

Mr. MERIWETHER called the attention of the chairman of the committee to the omission of an appropriation for the marshal of Georgia, while there was an appropriation for the marshals of all the other States. Deeming this to be an accidental omission of the department, he moved to amend the bill by inserting one hundred dollars for the marshal of Georgia.

Mr. ROOSEVELT also called the attention of the chairman to a similar omission of an appropriation for the marshal of the southern district of New York; but at the request of Mr. FILLMORE, these omissions were passed over till the bill could be read through.

HASSLER'S COAST SURVEY.

Mr. AYCRIGG moved to strike out the appropriation for the survey of the coast of the United States, including compensation of superintendent and assistants, $50,000.

Mr. MALLORY said it would be recollected that, at the last session of Congress, the House appointed a select committee to examine this subject. The committee were engaged in their investigations several months, their duties were very arduous, and a large mass of information was obtained. In consequence, however, of the absence of certain information deemed material by the committee, and from other causes, they were unable to report during the session. The result of their examination, however, was, that, although they were satisfied of the importance of this work, a majority of them came to the conclusion that the individual placed at the head of it was both physically and mentally incapable of carrying it on. They, therefore, came to the determination, when they should make a report, to bring in a bill to correct the abuses which they believed to exist. While, however, he said this much, he would also say that he was opposed to striking out the appropriation, for the work must still go on.

Mr. AYCRIGG asked if the appropriation of the last year was exhausted.

Mr. MALLORY would answer the gentleman as far as he could, by saying that the superintendent was still in the field, and had not been to Washington; therefore, it was impossible to state how much of the appropriation was on hand. He repeated, that he could see no propriety in withholding the appropriation, for it was in the power of Congress to correct the abuses that might be found to exist.

Mr. WISE asked if he understood his colleague correctly, in saying that a majority of the committee came to the conclusion that the superintendent was physically and mentally incapable of carrying on the work.

Mr. MALLORY replied in the affirmative.

Mr. WISE would ask his colleague if there was any vote in the committee on this head.

Mr. MALLORY said that when the majority of the committee came to that conclusion, and determined to make a report to that effect, his colleague and the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HOLMES] were not present.

Mr. WISE expressed his astonishment at what his colleague stated, and declared that it was the first time he had ever heard it said that Mr. Hassler was mentally and physically incapable.

Mr. MALLORY said it was not his fault if his colleague was not present.

Mr. WISE rose in vindication of the expediency of the appropriation. If it even was a fact that three of the committee were prepared to report that Mr. Hassler was both mentally and physically incompetent to carry on this survey in a proper manner, it was the first he had ever heard of it. He asserted that a majority of the committee never had come to any such determination. They would not dare to put it in an official form that they believed the celebrated mathematician Hassler mentally incompetent to perform the duties of this survey. True it might be, that, in making disbursements—in the mere mechanical operations—Mr. Hassler might be an unfit person; but, in the manipulation of instruments, there was no one who could compare with him. The testimony of Europe was recorded in his favor as a man of science. Indeed, he (Mr. W.) ventured to assert that testimony could be adduced to show, and conclusively prove, that this survey had been better and more cheaply conducted than any other work in the world.

Here Mr. MALLORY interrupted Mr. W., and denied the positions which the latter gentleman had assumed. He referred to a map engraved from a chart of Mr. Hassler, by order of the House, and appealed to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. AYCRIGG] to state how that chart had been executed.

Mr. WISE. I desire him to state what he knows. [Here Mr. AYCRIGG left the hall, and went to the library to get the chart and map referred to.] In the absence of the gentleman, he would state the facts, as he had them from Capt. Gedney, whose statements were in every respect to be relied on. The map was lithographed here in Washington, and Mr. Hassler had nothing to do with it. The scale of the map was laid down incorrectly by the person who copied from Hassler's chart. He (Mr. W.) had inquired of Capt. Gedney whether the original chart was correct, and was answered that it was. Thus gentlemen would see that a typographical error was charged upon Mr. Hassler as a grievous fault.

Here Mr. AYCRIGG rose, and exhibited several charts and maps obtained from the library, and was understood to say that the scale of the maps was falsified, and to charge general incorrectness upon them.

Mr. WISE inquired whether Captain Gedney had not informed the gentleman from New Jersey that the error in the maps was not Mr. Hassler's, but occurred in copying and lithographing.

Mr. AYCRIGG answered in the negative, and stated that he held the original chart in his hand.

Mr. WISE. Is it the original?

Mr. AYCRIGG. Yes.

Mr. WISE. It must be a copy.

Mr. AYCRIGG reiterated his statement.

Mr. WISE resumed. He thought the State of New Jersey, by its Representative, was the last section in the Union that had any reason to complain of the survey. It had so happened that the survey was nearly complete along the Delaware. The whole coast of New Jersey was complete.

Mr. AYCRIGG here rose, and was understood to contest the scientific accuracy of Mr. Hassler's survey, and the system on which it had been conducted.

Mr. WISE replied, and remarked, that if the gentleman thought proper to come to matters of science—to introduce technicalities into the debate—he (Mr. W.) must stand off. He did not presume to think himself mathematician enough to overlook the celebrated Hassler. He knew not if Mr. H. had verified his work; but he knew that the next base to be taken would be upon the Chesapeake; and then the work would be verified from Long Island to Cape Charles. He had been told by all the young officers that the survey of New Jersey was so accurate, that the lines of many hundred miles met within a few feet.

He was unqualifiedly of the opinion that the chart of the survey was itself worth more than the amount of one year's appropriation.

Mr. MALLORY here rose and inquired whether the chart of the new channel or entrance to the port of New York had ever been published; and why not?

Mr. WISE remarked, that Mr. Hassler was jealous of his reputation, and had, therefore, withheld the chart until he could determine its positive verification. It was withheld until the matter could be made complete; and this was made a subject of complaint by many gentlemen opposed to the continuance of the survey. Acting upon this complaint, the select committee had determined that the chart should be published. In six weeks it would be out and before the public.

There was another class of enemies to this appropriation for Hassler's survey. There were a certain number of gentlemen—headed by a clique in the navy—who had made the discovery that surveying by chronometric astronomy was to be revived. Such a survey, he pronounced, would not be worth the paper on which it was lithographed. Such a survey would not meet the object desired by the country; and would, in nine cases out of ten, run a vessel upon the shoals.

The next class of enemies to this appropriation, were those who thought that Mr. Hassler held a lucratice office—$3,000 per annum being allowed him as a salary, and $3,000 more to pay his expenses. He (Mr. W.) was of the opinion that the expenses of Mr. H. could not be less than $4,000. There were others, too, who wanted Mr. Hassler's office, and they also were opposed to this appropriation.

He would state a circumstance which had happened in New Jersey, and which, for aught he knew, might have had some influence upon the course of the gentleman from that State [Mr. AYCRIGG.] Mr. Hassler had, in the course of his survey, settled down upon a portion of the territory of that State, deeming himself entitled to encamp where he might, as an officer of Uncle Sam, and not knowing anything about the laws of property in this country. In this state of the case, he was notified that he must pay rent, or remove; and, upon his refusal, process was issued against him by some pettifogging lawyer in New Jersey, and he was actually sent to prison, where he remained two days, incarcerated among felons, because he could not be made to understand that he had to pay rent. He (Mr. W.) undertook to say that his colleague, [Mr. MALLORY,] the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. AYCRIGG,] and the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. CUSHING,] whose reputation for scientific attainments was greater than either of the other two, might sit down at the feet of Hassler, and be taught by that philosopher.

Mr. AYCRIGG interposed and said, if the gentleman would look in the library, he would find a pamphlet containing 400 errors which had been committed in a work of only 200 pages by Mr. Hassler. These were errors, by his own acknowledgment.

Mr. WISE remarked that he could not wish a better proof of the accuracy of the man. [Laughter.] The acknowledgment showed that he was candid, and could be relied on. [Laughter.] Other men would have produced works with one thousand and one errors, and not acknowledged one of them. [Laughter.] Did the gentleman suppose that Isaac Newton never committed an error? If he did, he was much mistaken. The whole business of science was to correct error. Let the gentleman go to Paris, and he would there find the National Institute daily engaged in correcting errors.

He had already mentioned three classes of enemies to the survey. The fourth was composed of those who, now that the survey had progressed as far as the peninsula of the Chesapeake, and the coast of North Carolina, (which was the most dangerous of navigation in the United States) were anxious that the survey should be carried back to Long Island, and thence proceed northward. A fifth class was composed of those, among others, who thought Mr. Hassler incompetent, not only because he could not speak the English language correctly, but also because he was in the habit of speaking his mind pretty freely of those whose practice it was to catechise and cross-question him. In his examination before the committee, Mr. Hassler would understand the questions in a different sense from that in which they were propounded, and would answer accordingly. He (Mr. W.) had, however, been able to understand him; and where he had not, he had gathered what information he desired from Captain Gedney.

Mr. MALLORY rose, and said, he admitted the fact of Mr. Hassler's confused answers. So great was his confusion, that an interpreter had to be introduced. He would give his colleague one reason for opposing the continuance of Mr. Hassler. It was known that the topography of the southern coast was different from that of the northern. In the former it was flat, and in the latter distinguished by highlands. The same process, therefore, would not answer for surveying both coasts. When questioned in committee as to how he should proceed with his survey when he arrived upon the coast of Virginia and North Carolina, he could give no satisfactory answer. This fact could be proved by the journal of the committee.

Mr. WISE ventured to assert that Mr. Hassler would not answer any one as to the mode in which he would proceed; but the officers had told him how he would go about the work. Their testimony, and that of every man of science, was in favor of the competency of Mr. Hassler.

Mr. MALLORY reasserted the ground he had taken, and said the committee were satisfied of Mr. Hassler's inability to tell how he should proceed.

Mr. WISE resumed, and went into a description of Mr. Hassler's personal appearance, mode of conversation, &c., together with the scenes enacted before the select committee; when

Mr. BIDLACK called him to order, and contended that he was transcending the rules of the House, which forbade members to detail scenes which had occurred in committee.

The CHAIRMAN sustained the point of order.

Mr. WISE then said he would state what happened out of committee. Mr. Hassler was charged with being mentally and physically incompetent—

Here Mr. MALLORY said, that when he made the report of the committee, as its chairman, he did not deem it necessary to state all the facts which led him to the conclusion.

Mr. WISE again denied the incompetency of Mr. Hassler, and said that, had the committee so reported, it would have been without evidence. He then went into an argument to prove this position; when

Mr. AYCRIGG remarked that the fact that Mr. Hassler had denied his own map, and was, according to his own statement, between eighty and ninety years of age, was conclusive, to his mind, of incompetency.

Mr. WISE. Now, we have all the evidence.

Mr. MALLORY. No, not all. My colleague has asked for the witnesses of Mr. Hassler's incompetency. I say that he was witness enough against himself, without any other witness whatever.

Mr. WISE. Now, we have the evidence. Should that map, containing merely a typographical error, blast the mental reputation of a man who stands before the world as a philosopher? He denied the introduction of competent witnesses to prove his incompetency. Mr. Hassler might look odd and shabby in his dusty old coat; but, in the field of science, he was at home, and, not only at home, but major domo. He appealed to the experience of gentlemen here who had been to college, if they had ever seen a great mathematician who was not an odd sort of a man. He well remembered old Jemmy Read, of Washington College, Pa; and he appealed to the Representative of the Washington district to say if any one ever taught mathematics better, little common sense as he had out of doors. A man might have all the depths of Newton knowledge, and yet not know that a New Jersey pettifogging lawyer could put him in jail among felons. He appealed to gentlemen not to be prejudiced by Mr. Hassler's manner. As to his age—true, he was old; yet he had an old-fashioned constitution that could stand much. He was an octogenarian in age, with all his mental faculties in full vigor.

Mr. HOLMES said this motion was discourteous to the committee, and disrespectful to the House. As a member of the committee to which this subject had been referred, he had left the matter principally to the gentleman before him [Mr. MALLORY,] and the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. CUSHING;] who, he would state, seemed to him to go with a predetermination into the investigation. And he would say again, so far from feeling the mental incompetency and the vast inferiority of the gentleman they had assailed, and whose character for science they would pull down, he had felt rebuked when the answers were given to the interrogations put to him. He had felt that the committee, having just looked into the books and learned the alphabet of science, were displaying to him, who was the great master in science, the little knowledge which they had; and he appealed to the gentleman from Virginia whether, when they went into a collision of intellect, they were not invariably put down. He (Mr. H) thought the best way for himself was to retreat, and he believed the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] did the same, [laughter;] and they left the other gentleman to carry on the contest. The committee summoned Mr. Hassler before them; and they took testimony; but they never made a report, which ought to be made after a full examination, before they pronounced judgment on one whose intellect had illuminated not this country alone—for it was the admiration of the philosophers of Europe. Was it fair and respectful, then, to the House, under such circumstances, to ask them to rely on the ipse dixit of individuals alone? Mr. Hassler might have admitted an error in one of the maps, as the gentleman from New Jersey had stated; and the great mind of Mr. Hassler might be revelling in the light of truth. Who did not remember the story of Galileo, who, when carried before a tribunal of scientific men, confessed his error in his discovery that the earth revolved round the sun, but who whispered to a neighbor, at the same time, "Though I do confess my error, the world will go round the sun, for all that." And those philosophers would find that, in the judgment of posterity, (if they were capable of knowing aught about the things of this life,) the world does go round the sun, for all that. He hoped the House would get a full report from the committee, who were made the jury in the case, before they ventured to determine on such an important subject; and not destroy, on an appropriation bill, on ex parte statements, a plan which was commenced in the time of Mr. Jefferson, which had been prosecuted at a vast expense, which embraced the whole line of their coast, and not only the lives of their marine, but the passengers who came to our shores, and the great interests of commercial enterprise.

Mr. CUSHING went into a lengthened statement of the proceedings of the committee to whom this investigation was intrusted; who, having been unable to complete their inquiries during the last session, were continued, by a resolution of the House on the day of its adjournment, to the present session. The subject was divided into two classes—administrative and scientific; the former of which only had they fully considered. And notwithstanding the conclusions of his own mind on that branch of the subject which they had explored—feeling strongly the public importance, and the deep interest to the country, and to its commerce, and to the learning and science of the world, of this great scientific work—he hoped it would be prosecuted to its completion. He regretted that this appropriation had not been permitted to pass, and he hoped the committee would not agree to strike it out. So high was his estimate of the work, that not only incompetency, but mismanagement should be pardoned to secure its completion. He intended to vote for this appropriation, though he felt bound to state the conclusion to which he, in common with others, had arrived respecting the character of the superintendent. The class of topics which he called administrative, he divided into two branches: the physical condition and the mental condition of the person who had the superintendence of the work. And he was the last man to say that an old and faithful servant, who had discharged his duty to his country, should be removed for his infirmities; but, if that fact were put in issue—to wit, whether that coast survey had been unnecessarily delayed; whether proper despatch and all practical economy had been resorted to,—on going into those questions, they would run their heads against the fact that Mr. Hassler, from the infirmities of age, was deprived, during a portion of the year, of the full ability to superintend the work, as a younger and more vigorous man would do. The work had been delayed by the infirmities of age.

Mr. WISE said that sickness had caused it. It was the fever which had produced delay.

Mr. CUSHING. Yes, and that was connected with old age. And he was told that the average employment had not been more than three months in the year.

Mr. WISE said that he was a younger man than the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. CUSHING. I call the gentleman to order. [Roars of laughter.]

Mr. WISE repeated that he was a younger man by several years than the gentleman from Massachusetts; and yet he had been confined for six weeks this fall with the bilious fever. But it was said that Mr. Hassler had been but three months in the field in the year; and here he would observe, that if he had not been in the field, (and there were five or six months in the year during which the youngest could not be in the field,) he had been in his office, going through the figures which the field-work had accumulated.

Mr. CUSHING said he did not wish now to be pressed to go into the minute details; and therefore he would return to the question of physical incompetency. What was the nature of the coast survey? It was, in fact, a great bureau of this Government; and Mr. Hassler was the superintendent of its vast enterprise—a bureau involving a much larger personnel and expenditure of money than some other bureaus of this Government; and it was one of the difficulties which stood in the way of a speedy and prompt prosecution of the work, that an individual had been selected who, whatever and how superlative soever Mr. Hassler's merits might be, did not bring administrative merit to the conduct of a bureau in which so many persons were employed, and an annual expenditure incurred of $100,000.

Mr. WISE asked the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CUSHING] if he was one of those who came to the conclusion that Mr. Hassler was mentally and physically incapable, as stated by his colleague.

Mr. CUSHING said he was not present when the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MALLORY] was on the floor, and did not hear what was said by him.

Mr. MALLORY begged leave to explain. He had stated that the basis of the report they contemplated making, was the conviction on their minds that Mr. Hassler was mentally and physically incapable of discharging the duties of superintendent.

Mr. CUSHING said that he had already sufficiently gone into detail in regard to the physical part of the subject; and, as to the mental part of it, he wished to avoid going into it. It was enough for him to say that he came to the conclusion that Mr. Hassler was incompetent to the discharge of his administrative duties as head of the bureau. He did not intend to enter into the question whether Mr. H., as a man of science, was competent or incompetent. But granting that his scientific qualifications were as great as the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] rated them to be; yet, he was satisfied that the House, upon an examination of the testimony taken by the committee, would come to the conclusion that he was unfitted to discharge the administrative part of his duties. Mr. C., however, strongly deprecated the withdrawal of the appropriation. He had rather (he said) that the surveys should be continued under the charge of Mr. Hassler, than retard a work that was so important in a scientific and commercial point of view. He hoped the committee would leave the appropriation as it was.

On motion by Mr. J. R. INGERSOLL, the committee rose and reported progress.

Mr. JOHN G. FLOYD moved that when the House adjourned, it should adjourn over to Monday next.

Mr. FILLMORE called for the yeas and nays on the motion, which were ordered; when

Mr. FLOYD withdrew the motion.

The House then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, December 17, 1842.

Mr. DIXON H. LEWIS and Mr. SHIELDS of Alabama, and Mr. GWIN of Mississippi, this morning took their seats. Mr. PROFFIT, also, has arrived in the city, but in such a state of ill health as to confine him to his room.

Mr. MEDILL presented a memorial from a number of the citizens of Somerset, Ohio, including six members of the bar at that place, asking a repeal of the law of the last session, establishing the summer term of the circuit and district courts for Ohio, at Cincinnati, and that both terms be held at Columbus, as formerly.

By the request of Mr. LOWELL, the following petitions and papers were taken from the files and referred, viz:

The petition and other papers of Nicholas Thomas for a pension: to the committee on Revolutionary Pensions;

The petition and other papers of Henry Dorr for a pension: to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions;

The petition and other papers of William Pool for a pension: to the Committee on Invalid Pensions;

The petition of Freeman Hall and others for an appropriation for a breakwater at Matinicus Island, Maine: to the Committee on Commerce; and

The petition of John Patten, jr., for the allowance of a bounty on fishing schooner 'Credit."

Mr. J. CAMPBELL introduced his colleague, the Hon. S. W. TROTTI, who was sworn, and took his seat. [Mr. TROTTI is the successor of Mr. SAMSON H. BUTLER.]

KENTUCKY ASYLUM.

Mr J. R. THOMPSON asked leave to introduce a bill in relation to the land heretofore given to the Kentucky asylum for the deaf and dumb.

After some objection on the part of Mr. BARNARD to the irregularity of the proceeding, (no notice having been given,) and some explanations by Mr. THOMPSON, the bill was allowed to be introduced, and passed through all its stages.

LIBRARY OF CONGRESS.

Mr. TILLINGHAST submitted the following joint resolution; and it was agreed to:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled, That of the copies of the catalogue of the Library of Congress, last published, now remaining on hand, there be distributed, by the librarian, one copy to each member of Congress.

THE PUBLIC CREDIT.

Mr. EVERETT gave notice that he would, to-morrow, or on the first opportunity, ask leave to introduce a bill entitled "A bill to revive and establish the public credit." [Laughter.]

REVOLUTIONARY PENSIONS.

Mr. EVERETT offered the following resolution; and it was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions be instructed to inquire into the expediency of granting a pension to Adam Pond, a revolutionary soldier.

He also offered the following resolutions; which were adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee on Private Land Claims be instructed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing patents to issue to Chester Baxter, A. Blake, and Jason Steele, for lots Nos. 27, 28, 36, 37, 38, 39, and 40, in township 16, range 16 east, in the southeastern district of Louisiana.

Resolved, That the claim of the administrator of Joseph Edson, sometime marshal of the Vermont district, for poundage on sundry executions in favor of the United States, be referred to the Judiciary Committee.

FRENCH SPOLIATIONS.

Mr. J. R. INGERSOLL presented a memorial of citizens of Philadelphia, relative to French spoliations prior to 1800, which he briefly explained; and urged the necessity of acting at an early day on the bill now on the calendar of the House on that subject. The memorial was committed to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

PENITENTIARY OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BOARDMAN submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to this House the annual expense to the public treasury of maintaining the penitentiary in the District of Columbia during the last five years. Also the number of officers and men now employed in the charge and superintendence thereof, with the compensation allowed to each, the number of prisoners confined therein, the offences for which they were severally sentenced, and the periods for which they were to be confined. Also the occupation of the several prisoners—whether employed by contractors, at a stipulated price, under the superintendence of the officers, or upon materials or work immediately for the use of the Government, together with the gross amount of the avails of the labor of the prisoners; he cost of the food, clothes, and medicine of the prisoners. Also the expense incurred by any agency or commission instituted within the last two years, for any purpose connected with the prison, and chargeable upon the treasury.

Mr. BOWNE said he wished the House to get to its regular business, and therefore he objected to these resolutions, and to all others at this time.

The resolution was in consequence not received.

CIVIL AND DIPLOMATIC APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FILLMORE said the chairman of the Committee on Claims had appealed to him to allow this day to be devoted to private bills; but he, nevertheless, felt bound to move that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole, on bill No. 615, being a bill making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of Government for the half calendar year ending the 30th day of June, 1843. He made this motion, as he conceived, in the discharge of his duty; and he left it to the House to dispose of it as it might think proper.

The SPEAKER put the question, and announced that the noes appeared to have it.

A division was called for; and the Speaker announced the result to be 52 in the affirmative, and 48 in the negative—being less than a quorum.

Tellers were called for, (a quorum evidently being in the House;) and Messrs. BOARDMAN and WELLER were appointed; and, after taking the vote, they announced the result to be 86 in the affirmative, and 53 in the negative. The motion was therefore carried, and Mr. BRIGGS took the chair.

When the committee rose yesterday, the pending question was on the motion of Mr. AYCRIGG, to strike out the item of $50,000 for the coast survey; and the debate on that question was now resumed.

Mr. J. R. INGERSOLL entered into a defence of Mr. Hassler, whose history, connexion with this Government, sacrifices, services, attainments, and qualifications, he minutely detailed and eulogized.

Mr. REYNOLDS obtained the floor, but yielded it to

Mr. AYCRIGG, who made a brief explanation in reply to Mr. INGERSOLL. The reporter heard Mr. A. too indistinctly to venture upon a sketch of his remarks.

Mr. REYNOLDS said it had been repeatedly asserted in the course of the debate, that Mr. Hassler had no friends here; but he should infer, after hearing the warm and eloquent eulogy pronounced on him by the gentleman from Philadelphia, [Mr. J. R INGERSOLL,] that he could not have an abler or more zealous advocate, either with or without a fee; though he was sure that the gentleman defended him without one. Mr. R. said that he, for one, was not an enemy of Mr. Hassler; on the contrary, he was his friend. He was not one to say that, because he was a foreigner, he should not receive the patronage of the Government; for he would make no distinction between native and adopted citizens. This country was but of recent growth, and but a few years back we were all foreigners; so that a doctrine contrary to his would exclude all. But to return to the subject under discussion. According to the gentleman from Philadelphia, if Mr. Hassler was to be turned out of office, this Republic would be put an end to—the wheels of the Government would stand still; and not only that, but this great work, so important to the scientific and commercial world, would be stopped. This was the force of the gentleman's argument. Why, the work might be stopped, and still the Republic suffer no detriment. If the gentleman would refer to one of the documents which he had been handling, he would find that the work was once suspended for fifteen years, and still no great evils happened in consequence of it. Now, he only wanted it to be suspended till the report of the committee came in, and then they would be better able to determine what course it was proper to take in regard to it. The gentleman contended that a majority of the committee did not come to the conclusion (as stated by the gentleman from Virginia) that Mr. Hassler was mentally and physically incompetent. Now, he did not know how the gentleman arrived at that conclusion. Some people were so aristocratic in their ideas, that they did not wish the majority to govern; but he hoped that the mind of the gentleman, though he lived in the fine city of Philadelphia, was not so perverted as to make him believe that two were a majority of five. Had not the committee the right to say that Mr. Hassler was physically and mentally incompetent? He was told that the gentleman from Philadelphia was a lawyer, and a very eminent one—he was, too, a Philadelphia lawyer.

[Mr. INGERSOLL here made some remark not heard by the reporter.]

Mr. R. said that he took the gentleman for a lawyer from his special pleading, and he would cite a sample of it. The gentleman said that there was no report. True, there was not a written one; but the majority of the committee informed the House of the bases of one that they had agreed upon. The gentleman, perhaps, would not agree that there was a report until he saw it in Gales & Seaton's paper, with Gales & Seaton's ink and type. Mr. R. then spoke of the Atlantic influence which operated in favor of this appropriation, and said that the gentleman resided in the city of Philadelphia, where everybody was in favor of the coast survey. He was also surrounded by the influence of those whose employments depended on the continuance of the survey. The information which the gentleman got this morning, and which he had just communicated to the House, came from that source. The other members of the committee, also, were subject to this Atlantic influence, and would, therefore, vote for the appropriation. This was all very natural and very proper. He himself lived under an influence of a different nature—he meant that of the national road—and should endeavor to obtain all the appropriations he could for it. Let us, however, (said Mr. R.,) return to Mr. Hassler. He believed it was an extraordinary issue, that the Congress of the United States should go into an investigation of a man's age. Now, it was not necessary for the committee to say anything about age; they had a right to say that the superintendent was mentally and physically incompetent, without referring to his age. Here were three individuals, under the solemnity of their oaths, declared that he was mentally and physically incompetent. Was not this enough, without going into his age? Ought he, after the announcement of this fact, to continue in office? Should the President be forced to continue him? Had Mr. Hassler a right to this office for life? He was aware that there was a mistaken notion entertained by many, that a public officer had a property in the office he held; but he did not agree to give in to such a doctrine. The gentleman from Philadelphia urged that Mr. H. was not only a man of science and a philosopher, but that he was the only man in the Union capable of carrying on this work. Now, he looked upon it as a reproach to the Union—as disreputable to the Republic—to say that, out of a population of seventeen millions, there was only one man capable of surveying our coasts. Where was the West Point academy, and the number of scientific young men there yearly educated at a vast expense to the nation? Would the gentleman say that none of these were capable. If so, the institution ought to be abolished. Would the gentleman say that none of the officers of the navy were capable? He would pause for the gentleman's reply, and spare him a few minutes of the time allotted him (Mr. R) to enable him to answer the inquiry.

Mr. JOSEPH R. INGERSOLL said he would answer the gentleman with pleasure. He did not believe that there was a single officer of the army or navy, or, indeed, a single individual in the nation, capable of superintending the work as it had been done by Mr. Hassler.

Mr. MALLORY, on leave being given him by Mr. REYNOLDS, said that he would give the gentleman some information of what took place in the committee-room. Hearing the great age of the superintendent spoken of, they thought it necessary to ascertain whether the survey could be carried on, should he die before its completion; and they, therefore, made inquiries, in relation to this point, of some of the officers engaged in it, who were able and competent men. They answered that there were many men in the country perfectly competent, in every way, to carry on the work. Now, as to the age of Mr. Hassler. He said that he had been fifty-six years in the public service, and that he first turned his attention to jurisprudence and diplomacy.

Mr. JOS. R. INGERSOLL said that he had received several communications on this subject, one of which was signed M. C. Hassler, in which the writer said that his father was just seventy-three years of age.

Mr. REYNOLDS continued. The age of the individual had nothing to do with the subject, the gentlemen of the committee not having been bound to give their reasons for coming to the conclusion that they did—that he was mentally and physically incompetent. This was no disgrace to Mr. Hassler. He ought to retire from the public service, for no man would desire to continue in office after such an announcement No man was disgraced by losing office, any more than by being beaten in an election. There was his friend before him, who either had been, or would be beaten; and yet it was no disgrace to him. Let the old gentleman, then, retire; and he would find himself much more comfortable in the bosom of his family, than camping out in the snows of New Jersey, as stated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. But the friends of Mr. H. on this floor wanted to make his character a pretext for continuing the appropriation, and dwelt much on his services, and the hardships he encountered. Did he not hear the gentleman from Philadelphia eloquently declaiming about the storms hovering over the old man's head, while he was engaged in his arduous labors in the field—the ground covered with snow, and he without a tent to lie in? Why, no attack was made on Mr. Hassler's character. The affair of the map was only spoken of by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. AYCRIGG] as an evidence of his incompetency, and not of his criminality. No forgery was charged. The gentleman, as a lawyer, knew very well what constituted forgery; and that the charge did not amount to that. After some further remarks, Mr. R. went on to urge that the appropriation for the survey should be postponed at least till the report of the committee was received. This he conceived to be required by prudence, as well as economy. He further observed, that while he was for an economical expenditure of the public money, he was for equalizing the appropriations more than had hitherto been done, between the Atlantic and Western portions of the Union. He looked upon the harbors for the lakes, the improvement of the Mississippi and Ohio, and the purchasing out, so as to make free, the Louisville and Portland Canal, as objects of far more importance than the coast survey.

Mr. TILLINGHAST rose and advocated the appropriation. He commenced by referring to the arraignment of an ancient philosopher and poet before the Areopagus, where he appeared on trial, and seemed to be mentally and physically incompetent. That man was Sophocles, and was thought to be insane. Yet he defended himself by reading a portion of a work he was then engaged in writing—the celebrated tragedy of the Œdipus Coloneus—a work read with pleasure even to the present day. The trial of Mr Hassler at this time reminded him of this incident. He, too, had defended himself, by detailing a portion of his labors—which, however, were such as not to be understood by his judges. Yet this philosopher was engaged upon a work which hereafter might render him as celebrated in one department of knowledge, as old Sophocles was in another.

He (Mr. T.) thought that the object sought to be attained could not be accomplished by rejecting this appropriation. A law remained in force authorizing the President to employ a superintendent of the coast survey; and so long as this was the law, a superintendent might be kept in office. If there was any fault to find with the present superintendence, the House should express their opinion, and induce the President to change it. If it was alleged that the work was failing to answer its purpose, and was only calculated to decoy into danger, instead of affording beacons for the preservation of life and property, let there be an investigation; let Mr. Hassler's performance be inquired into, and justice done him. He (Mr. T.) deprecated any act of the House that would suddenly assign Mr. Hassler to retirement and dismission, without due investigation.

He went on to explain the reason of the difference of the map from the correct standard. He alluded to the pamphlet correcting the four hundred errors, referred to yesterday by the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. AYCRIGG,] as having been committed in a book of 200 pages. This minute correction was to him an evidence of the extreme desire on Mr. H.'s part to be accurate. He read from the pamphlet of errata to show that the errors charged were mostly errors of grammar and style, and not mathematical errors.

Mr. WISE wished the committee to take notice that the gentleman from Rhode Island read from the book adduced on yesterday by the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. AYCRIGG,] to prove the incompetency of Mr. Hassler.

Mr. TILLINGHAST resumed. These errors were of the most trifling character, or, as a gentleman near him [Mr. C. J. INGERSOLL] said, were mere corrigenda. He had been informed by scientific men that Mr. H.'s work was, in all respects, remarkably accurate. He proceeded to notice a number of objections urged against the superintendence of this survey. He had no evidence of the incrtness of Mr. Hassler, and the assistants under him. So far from it, their duties had been pursued with remarkable industry and vigor. As to the delay in the publication of the maps, he could see no reason to censure Mr. H. for not bringing them out until he was authorized to do so. He denied that a great scientific work, like this survey, could be properly carried on, as had been proposed, under the administrative superintendence of a bureau. No one was better calculated to superintend it than Mr. Hassler, although he might be old; and yet, not so old as some men of great intellectual vigor who sat before him. After a few more remarks in relation to the importance of the survey to the whole country, and to its commerce, he took his seat.

Mr GILMER, said he rose for the purpose of offering an amendment, rather than to make a speech. It was not his purpose to do anything to prevent the committee from coming to a vote upon the question to-day. It seemed to him that the debate had taken—he would not say too wide a range—but a range too far from the work. He could not perceive what the merits and qualifications of Mr. Hassler as a man of science and a mathematician had to do with the expediency and propriety of making this appropriation. He (Mr. G.) knew noting of the acquirements of Mr. Hassler, and his competency to produce a work adequate to the wants of the country. He could not undertake to decide in a matter where doctors so widely differed among themselves. [A voice Lawyers] Yes, where both doctors and lawyers disagreed. [Laughter.] Nor could he see the application of the remarks of the gentleman from Rhode Island, [Mr. TILLINGHAST,] in relation to the trial of Sophocles, to the present item of appropriation.

He (Mr. G.) was disposed to regard this as a matter of appropriation solely. He was prepared to reduce every appropriation and every expenditure under the Government which would admit of it. It was, as he conscientiously believed, the duty of Congress to make this reduction—a duty, the performance of which was imperiously demanded of them by the condition of the country. This expenditure was one, he conceived, which might be dispensed with without injury to the Government. He would go farther than this; he would advocate a still further reduction of the army from that made at the last session, especially among the staff, and in the engineer department. In short, he meant to vote for reductions in every department that would admit of it.

Here Mr. G. was interrupted by calls for the committee to rise; to which he yielded, in order that a test vote might be taken. The committee refused to rise—ayes 57, noes 72.

Mr. GILMER resumed, and expressed his gratification that the committee had refused to rise. He reiterated his assurance that he did not mean, by his vote, to express any opinion of Mr. Hassler as a man of science. It had, however, been urged as a reason for continuing the appropriation, that a sudden suspension of the survey would occasion injury to the Government, from the fact that extensive field-notes had been taken, though not yet reckoned out—a process which could not be accomplished by any one else so well as by Mr. Hassler. He admitted the argument in part; and it was the object of the amendment he should submit to obviate the difficulty. Instead of making the appropriation of $50,000, as contained in the bill, he should propose to substitute such a sum only as would be necessary to enable Mr. Hassler to complete, in the closet, the notes and observations already taken in the field. When the treasury should be in a better condition, the survey might be resumed. But, at present, the expenses of this Government exceeded its income. The Government was puzzled how to raise means to meet its most pressing and immediate engagements. It had borrowed until it could borrow no more. There was but one alternative left—and that a reduction of expenses, and the withholding of all appropriations not of absolute necessity. The present was one of that character, and therefore he opposed it.

He was loth to do injury either to the Government or to individuals, and, therefore, on the present occasion, he was willing to grant such a sum as would enable Mr. Hassler to complete his notes. The same process of reduction he would have carried into effect with regard to other appropriations.

Mr. AYCRIGG here suggested to Mr. G. to move to strike out $50,000, and insert $20,000.

Mr. GILMER accepted the suggestion, and made a motion accordingly. The committee, he said, would perceive that, by the proposed reduction, $30 000 would be saved the ensuing year, and $100,000 each year thereafter. It was impossible for a Government like ours to take any such step as that proposed, without experiencing a temporary inconvenience. Its paramount duty was retrenchment. The only remedy for the times was retrenchment; and, indeed, it was the only remedy that could be successfully resorted to in order to restore private and public faith, now sunk so low as to make every American with patriotic feelings look upon his country with the deepest regret.

Mr. AYCRIGG here signified his acceptance of the motion of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. GILMER.] in lieu of his own; which was to strike out the whole appropriation.

Mr. BURNELL then obtained the floor, and was about to address the committee, when, at the request of many members, he yielded to a motion that the committee rise; which motion was carried.

The committee rose and reported progress.

Mr. WISE offered a resolution of inquiry, which was adopted, calling on the Secretary of the Navy for information in relation to the appropriation of last session for the construction of a dry-dock at Brooklyn.

The SPEAKER laid before the House several executive communications:

1. A communication from the Treasury Department, in answer to a resolution of the House of June 23d, 1842, calling for a statement of the number of cargoes entered at American and foreign ports by vessels of the United States. Laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

2 A communication from the Treasury Department, covering the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, in relation to certain private land claims at New Orleans: referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BOARDMAN again offered his resolution, calling on President for information respecting the penitentiary in the District of Columbia; which was adopted.

Mr. CUSHING offered a resolution, (which was adopted,) instructing the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions to inquire into the expediency of reviving the act of July, 1838, allowing pensions to certain widows.

Mr. C. J. INGERSOLL inquired of the Chair when resolutions would be in order?

The SPEAKER answered, Monday next; which will be resolution day.

On motion of Mr. FILLMORE,

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, December 19, 1842.

Mr. WALKER of Mississippi, and Mr. SEVIER of Arkansas, appeared in their seats to-day.

After the reading of the journal,

The PRESIDENT pro tem. laid before the Senate a communication from the Treasury Department, transmitting the annual report of the Secretary, showing the condition of the finances; when,

On motion of Mr. EVANS, the report was referred to the Committee on Finance, and 1,700 copies, in addition to the usual quantity, were ordered to be printed; 200 of which to be subject to the disposal of the Secretary of the Treasury.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting the annual report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office; which, on motion of Mr. SMITH of Indiana, was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Also, laid before the Senate a communication from the Navy Department, covering a report, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 29th June, 1842, upon the subject of the cultivation of hemp; which, on motion of Mr. BAYARD, was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. BATES presented a petition from Samuel Dicy for a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented a memorial from a large number of persons engaged in the manufacture of hats, similar to others presented by him, praying Congress so to modify the tariff as to admit hatters' furs free of duty: referred to the Committee on Manufactures.

Mr. LINN presented the memorial of Mr. Thomas Allen, printer to the Senate, praying payment for the printing of the Compendium of the Sixth Census. Mr. L. said there was a letter from the Secretary of State accompanying the memorial, urging upon Congress the propriety of paying the claim. The whole subject was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WRIGHT presented the petition of John Woodward, of Bloomingburg, N. Y., praying compensation for services during the revolutionary war; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Also presented the petition of Jonathan Brown, of Sullivan county, N. Y., a drummer in the revolutionary army, praying a pension: referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CONRAD presented a petition from the New Orleans and Carrollton Railroad Company, praying a modification of the tariff, and an extension of the time now required for laying down iron imported for the use of their railroad: referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. ARCHER presented a petition from the directors of the Petersburg Railroad Company, praying an extension of the time required by law for laying down the iron imported for the use of said company: referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. STURGEON presented a memorial from C. Evans, praying that his invention to prevent the explosion of steam-boilers may be applied to the steam-vessels of the United States: referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. McROBERTS presented a memorial from citizens of Illinois, asking Congress to refund to General Jackson the fine and costs imposed on him by Judge Hall of New Orleans, and the interest thereon: ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BARROW presented a petition from John L. Delee, praying for the privilege of entering land in lieu of land lost to him by the settlement of the boundary line between the United States and Texas: referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. WILLIAMS presented a petition of citizens of the State of Maine, praying for the repeal of the bankrupt law: referred to the Judiciary Committee.

On motion of Mr. WILLIAMS, the petition of Noah Miller was ordered to be taken from the files of the Senate, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Messrs. BATES, EVANS, SMITH of Indiana, FULTON, and LINN, severally gave notice that they would, on to-morrow, ask leave to introduce certain bills.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. LINN, on leave, introduced a bill for the relief of Jacques Bon and Alexander Coleman, and their heirs and legal representatives; and

A bill to confirm the title of the heirs of Joseph Thompson, senior, deceased, to a tract of land in Missouri; which were read twice, and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Also, on leave, introduced a bill to authorize the adoption of measures for the occupation and settlement of the territory of Oregon, and to extend a certain portion of the laws of the United States over the same, and for other purposes; which was read twice, and, on motion of Mr. LINN, referred to a select committee, to consist of five, to be appointed by the Chair. Thereupon, the Chair appointed Messrs. LINN, WALKER, SEVIER, MERRICK, and PHELPS, to constitute said committee.

Mr. STURGEON, on leave, introduced a bill for the relief of Lucretia Haymaker, heir at law of John Bown; which was twice read, and referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

On motion of Mr. WALKER it was

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of permitting the State of Mississippi to appropriate $25,000 of the two per cent. fund of said State towards the completion of the railroad from Jackson to Brandon, on the conditions designated by said State.

MEXICAN CLAIMS.

Mr. CONRAD submitted the following resolution, which lies over one day, under the rule, viz:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be requested to communicate to the Senate (if not incompatible with the public interest) whether the amount due and payable by Mexico for indemnity to citizens of the United States, under the late convention, has been paid in conformity with the terms of said convention; if not, whether any, and what, measures have been adopted by our Government to obtain or enforce payment; and also, to obtain the recognition of such claims as were submitted to, but not finally acted upon, by the late joint commission.

Mr. HUNTINGTON, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back without amendment, and with a recommendation that it pass, the bill to allow a drawback on foreign merchandise exported in original packages to Chihuahua and Santa Fe, in Mexico.

Mr. H. also reported, from the same committee, a bill to authorise the issuing of a new register to, and to change the name of, the ship Westchester of New York, to that of the Atlantic of New York; which was read, considered as in committee of the whole, reported to the Senate, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

On motion by Mr. TALLMADGE, the papers of Joseph Robey were ordered to be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. TALLMADGE presented a memorial from a committee on behalf of claimants to indemnity for French spoliations prior to 1800; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. T. also presented a petition from John Bosworth, praying for a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. RIVES presented a memorial from George Taylor, of the District of Columbia, praying indemnity for French spoliations prior to 1800: referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. R. also presented a memorial from Mary W. Harrison, widow and executrix of the late Benjamin Harrison, praying the passage of a law authorizing the resettlement of the accounts of her late husband with the Government, there being many errors in the former settlement: referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

DEATH OF Mr. HABERSHAM.

A message was here received from the House of Representatives, announcing to the Senate the death of the Hon. RICHARD W. HABERSHAM, late Representative from the State of Georgia, and the passage of certain resolutions; which message being read,

Mr. BERRIEN rose and addressed the Senate as follows:

Mr. President: In offering the resolutions which it is my duty to submit to the Senate on this occasion, the usage of this Chamber requires that I should accompany them with some notice, however brief, of the character of the deceased—with some reference, however transient, to the event which calls for this expression of our sympathy.

It would be to me, sir, a grateful, though a melancholy office, to pronounce the eulogy of my departed friend and associate—to dwell with cherished recollection on his public virtues—on his private worth—above all, on that benevolence of feeling, which was so beautifully exhibited in all his intercourse with his fellow-men. It would be my privilege to speak of him thus, sir; for it has been my good fortune to have been associated with him from his earlier years, in relations of kindness and amity, which experienced no solitary interruption to the close of his life; while, in mutually cherishing these feelings, we only lengthened the chain which had united our fathers in like friendly bonds. The occasion is, however, perhaps, inappropriate to the expression of mere private feeling—and I forbear.

Mr. HABERSHAM was a native of Georgia. His family name is associated with the records of her colonization, and is honorably inscribed on the pages of her provincial annals. It has been distinguished in each successive period of her history, and, unsullied by a spot, will now be registered on the stone which covers his own remains. In Georgia, sir, that name is the synonyme of patriotism, integrity, and benevolence.

Mr. HABERSHAM was born in the city of Savannah—I think in the year 1786. He obtained his collegiate education at Nassau Hall, in New Jersey, received the honors of that institution in 1805; and, returning to his native State, after the usual course of preparatory study, was called to the bar. He was early distinguished among his professional associates, and was for a series of years the counsel of the United States in the courts of that district. He retired from office, with the applause of the people of Georgia, when the duties which it imposed conflicted with his own sense of justice to a portion of his fellow-citizens. He served with reputation in the municipality of the city of Savannah, and in the Legislature of his native State, and has been twice honored by a seat in the councils of the Union. It can scarcely be necessary to say to those to whom I address myself, that his duties here have been discharged with zeal and fidelity, with assiduity and intelligence, and in a frank and conciliatory spirit, which, even amid the conflicts of party, secured to him the esteem and regard of his associates. He died at his own residence in Georgia, on the 2d instant, at a moment when, but for the disease which had prostrated him, he would have been hastening to unite with us in the duties of legislation.

Mr. HABERSHAM has now closed his earthly labors. Hereafter, among us, he lives only in the memory of his virtues. These will be long held in grateful remembrance by those to whom he was most intimately known. The recollection of them will, I trust, assuage the sorrows of the widowed partner of his life, and of that group of orphans who are clustering around her in this hour of anguish.

But Mr. HABERSHAM yet lives. The record of this probationary life, as to him, indeed, is closed forever. But he has gone, in the immortality of his being, to render his account to his Creator and his Judge. It remains to us to hope that he may find acceptance in that solemn hour through the atoning blood of the Redeemer; and to inscribe on our own hearts the monitory lesson which this event is calculated to impart.

Mr. B. closed by offering the usual resolutions in testimony of the respect of the Senate for the memory of the deceased, and authorizing the wearing of crape; which were read, and unanimously adopted; and, in accordance with which, the Senate forthwith adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, December 19, 1842.

Mr. THOMPSON of Mississippi presented the petition of Nathaniel Mitchell, praying a grant of land for the purpose of making the experiment of extracting turpentine, in profitable abundance, from the pine forest trees bordering on the Gulf of Mexico: referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. MARSHALL of Maine presented the petition of Robert Patterson, and 43 others, ship masters and merchants of Belfast, Maine, for the erection of such beacons, spindles, and buoys, on the Muscle ridges in Penobscot Bay, as will render its navigation more safe.

Also, the petition of George Drinkwater, and 26 others, of Lincolnville, for the same.

Also, the petition of Joseph Jones, and 40 others, of Camden, for the same.

Also, the petition of Andrew Leach, and 61 others, of Prospect, for the same.

Mr. GAMBLE of Georgia rose, and addressed the House as follows:

The present Congress, it is believed, has oftener performed the painful duty of announcing the death of its members, than any which has preceded it under the Government. In the first week of our session, we were called upon to pay the last tribute of respect to the memory of one who died on his way to the seat of Government, to resume his duties as a member of this body; and to-day, the duty has devolved upon me to communicate to the House the mournful intelligence which has reached us, of the death of another member of this branch of the National Legislature. For some time we entertained hopes that the rumor of his death was unfounded; or, at most, premature. But it is at length reduced to painful certainty that RICHARD W. HABERSHAM is no more. He has finished his course on earth; his seat in this hall is vacant; and he now sleeps in the silent tomb. His constitution being naturally feeble, and his health somewhat impaired when he first took his seat as a member of this body—added to the severity of the climate, and his laborious and close attention to his duties, which was more than he was able to endure—brought on a disease, which has only terminated in his death; which painful event, as we are informed, took place at his residence in Habersham county, Georgia, on the second day of this month, surrounded by his family and friends. Mr. HABERSHAM was a descendant of one of the most honorable and distinguished families in Georgia. He was endowed with more than ordinary powers of mind, which was enlarged and cultivated by a liberal education. Being thus qualified, he early engaged in public life, and, by a long course of upright conduct and unbending integrity, he acquired a degree of confidence which few attain, and (what is still more rare) which he never abused. He has occupied stations of honor and trust, both under the Federal and State Governments, the duties of which he discharged to the full requisitions of the law, and entire satisfaction of those with whom he had official transaction.

In 1839 he was elected as a member of Congress, and continued in that character until his death. To you, sir, and his associates here, I need say nothing. You have witnessed his course; you appreciate his worth as a man, and his usefulness as a member of this body. And notwithstanding the political asperity of the times during which he has been a member—and although he has been firm and unwavering in his political course—yet I believe he never indulged in a sentiment, or suffered an expression to escape his lips, at which even the most sensitive political opponent could justly take exception. His errors and infirmities, if any he had—and none are faultless—"were of the head, and not of the heart." He was amiable, generous, and forgiving in his disposition; his home was the centre of kindness and hospitality; and his hand ever open to the calls of charity. It may be said of him, and can with truth be said of him, that he has gone, and left not an enemy behind him. In his lamented death, Georgia has lost one of her most useful, virtuous, and talented citizens—one of her most distinguished, patriotic, and cherished sons; and his family have sustained a loss which cannot be repaired by time. "May that Being who tempers the wind to the shorn lamb," comfort and sustain them in this, their deep affliction; and may this memento of our mortality make a deep and lasting impression upon our hearts, and cause us well to consider the admonition addressed to us in the word of truth, which is enforced by this solemn dispensation—"Be ye also ready, for in such an hour as ye think not the son of man cometh."

Mr. G. then offered the usual resolution, viz: that the members, as a mark of respect for the memory of the deceased, go into mourning, by wearing crape on the left arm for thirty days; which was adopted; and, as an additional mark of respect for his memory,

On motion by Mr. GAMBLE,

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, December 20, 1842.

Mr. BENTON presented a petition from Mary W. Thompson, widow of the late Colonel Thompson, praying compensation for certain military services of her late husband, which remain unpaid: referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MERRICK presented a petition from

John Brosaugh and Archibald Fleming, praying indemnity for losses sustained in carrying the United States mail, in consequence of the destruction of a part of the Potomac bridge by a freshet: referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. ARCHER presented a petition from Wm. A. Weaver, praying compensation for work done in preparing at the State Department the sixth census of the United States: referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. PORTER presented a petition from the Board of Internal Improvement of the State of Michigan, praying an extension of the time allowed by law for laying down railroad iron imported free of duty: referred to the Committee on Finance.

On motion of Mr. LINN, the petition and papers of John B McKown were ordered to be taken from the files of the Senate, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. L. also presented a memorial from citizens of Platte county, Missouri, praying that a permanent agent might be appointed, to reside at Weston, or some other convenient point in Missouri, for the purpose of purchasing, under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy, such quantity of water-rotted hemp as might be required for the use of the Government: referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. L. also presented a memorial from citizens of Attleborough, Massachusetts, praying that the fine of $1,000 may be refunded to General Jackson: ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. McROBERTS presented a petition from citizens of Illinois, praying the repeal of the bankrupt law: referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. McR. also presented a petition from John Dawson, pension agent, Springfield, Illinois, asking compensation for his services as agent: referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WRIGHT presented a memorial from the Chamber of Commerce of Appalachicola, Florida, praying Congress to make an appropriation for the construction of two new light-houses on that coast, for the accommodation of commerce; and also for the construction of a marine hospital: referred to the Committee on Commerce.

On motion of Mr. CONRAD, the petition and papers of the heirs of Madame De Lusser, for the confirmation of a grant of land in Mobile, were ordered to be taken from the files of the Senate, and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Also, on his motion, leave was granted to withdraw from the files the petition and papers of William Dubuys.

Mr. ALLEN presented a petition from Asahel Brainerd, of Cayuga county, Ohio, for an extension of pension: referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WRIGHT said he some time since presented to the Senate a petition, which was now before the Committee on Claims, from Nimrod Farrow, and Richard Harris, praying compensation for constructing a fort in Mobile bay. He now presented a petition from Israel Ketchum, a sub-contractor under those persons, praying that Congress, in making an appropriation for the purpose, may not disregard the interests of the sub-contractors: referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. BAYARD presented a memorial from the President and Directors of the Bank of the Metropolis, praying that their charter may be modified in such manner as they suggest, and which experience has pointed out to be necessary: referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. B. also presented a petition from Edward Earle, who is desirous that the Government of the United States should purchase the right for using his patent for preserving wood, which he alleges is much better than the present mode of doing it, with corrosive sublimate: referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

On motion of Mr. SMITH of Connecticut, it was ordered that the petition and papers of Wareham Kingsbury, for a pension, be taken from the files of the Senate, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. S. also presented a petition from Hetty Fossett, the widow of John D. Alveys, for a pension: referred to the Committee on Pensions.

On motion of Mr. SEVIER, it was ordered that the petition of Benjamin Murphy be taken from the files, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

BILLS AND REPORTS.

Mr. LINN, on leave, introduced a bill for the relief of the heirs of Nathaniel Pryor, deceased; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Also, on leave, introduced a bill to surrender to the States of Missouri and Arkansas the alternate sections of certain public lands, (reported as not worth the expenses of survey,) for the purpose of increasing the value of the public domain contiguous; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. BERRIEN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which had been referred the petition of Henry Quackenboss and others, reported a bill to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to make an arrangement and compromise with any of the sureties on the bonds of Samuel Swartwout, late collector of the port of New York; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. EVANS, on leave, introduced a bill for the relief of Barbara Spear, the widow of John Spear, late an invalid pensioner; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, on leave, introduced a bill for regulating the currency of foreign gold and silver coin in the United States; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BATES, on leave, introduced a bill making compensation to pension agents; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, on leave, introduced a bill to continue the office of Commissioner of Pensions; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. FULTON, on leave, introduced a bill to authorize the Legislatures of the States of Arkansas, Louisiana, and Tennessee to sell the lands heretofore appropriated for school purposes in those States; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. WALKER, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill to authorize the settlement of the accounts of Joseph Nourse; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana, on leave, introduced a bill to provide for ascertaining and disposing of the lead-mineral lands in the States of Illinois and Missouri, and the Territories of Wisconsin and Iowa, and for other purposes; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. GRAHAM, from the Committee on Claims, reported the following bills; which were read, and ordered to a second reading, viz.

A bill for the relief of J. R. Vienne; and

A bill for the relief of Ephraim B Dixon.

Mr. BATES, on leave, introduced a bill for the relief of Henry Gardner and others, directors of an association called the New England Mississippi Land Company; which was read twice, and referred to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, made an adverse report on the petition of Benjamin Franklin for a privateer pension; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. W. also, from the Committee on Printing, reported in favor of printing the annual report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office; which was concurred in by the Senate; when,

On motion of Mr. SMITH of Indiana, five hundred copies additional of said report were ordered to be printed.

CLAIMANTS.

Mr. HUNTINGTON said he had been requested to move that the memorial and papers of Samuel Brown, late naval officer at Providence, Rhode Island, praying compensation for extra services, be taken from the files of the Senate and referred.

Mr. H. remarked, that a verbal report had been made against the prayer of this petition, and concurred in by the Senate previous to the passage of the rule of the last session, which provided that whenever a claim shall have been reported against, in writing, by either of the standing committees, and the report concurred in by the Senate, it should not be in order to present that claim to the consideration of the Senate, except upon a new petition from the claimant pointing out an error in the decision of the committee, or presenting new evidence in support of the claim. Mr. H. did not know what course to take with reference to this claim, and wished to have the sense of the Senate whether its presentation was admissible under the rule; the report against it being but a verbal one, and that having been made previous to the passage of the rule.

The CHAIR was understood to say that heretofore the rule had been construed as restrospective in its operation; but in this case a further question was presented—whether the rule, which required a written report to be made, should be construed to exclude cases upon which verbal reports only were made.

A discussion here arose, as to the proper construction of the rule, in which Messrs. HUNTINGTON, LINN, KING, CLAYTON, and PHELPS participated, maintaining that the rule was intended to be retrospective in its operation, to prevent the re-presentation of those old cases so frequently reported against; but were willing to make an exception to this case, upon which a verbal report only was made, when a written report was required by the rule.

Mr. GRAHAM said the difficulty could be avoided by admitting this petition by unanimous consent, on the ground of non-compliance with the rule, which required a written report; and then to amend the rule, as suggested by the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. PHELPS,] to make all cases admissible, upon which no written report had been made.

This suggestion was yielded to, and the petition was ordered to be taken from the files, and referred.

Mr. PHELPS submitted the following:

That the rule of the Senate adopted on the 26th of January, 1842, be amended by the following: Provided, That this rule shall not extend to any cases whereon adverse reports, not in writing, may have been made previous to the said 26th day of January, 1842.

This amendment lies over one day, under the rules.

The following resolution of Mr. CONRAD was taken up and adopted, viz:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to communicate to the Senate whether any, and what, amount of money has been refunded to claimants in virtue of the act entitled "An act in relation to lands held in the Greensburg (late St. Helena) district, in the State of Louisiana, and authorizing the resurvey of certain lands in said district," approved August 29, 1842; whether, in any cases, the claimants have received reimbursement of the price paid by them for lands in complying, or offering to comply, with the provisions of said act, and such reimbursement has been refused, and the reasons for such refusal; and whether any, and what, proceedings have taken place under said act.

THE AFRICAN SQUADRON.

The following resolution, submitted by Mr. BENTON some days ago, was taken up for consideration:

Resolved, That the President be requested to inform the Senate whether the quintuple treaty, for the suppression of the slave-trade, has been communicated to the Government of the United States in any form whatever; and, if so, by whom; for what purpose; and what answer may have been returned to such communication. Also, to communicate to the Senate all the information which may have been received by the Government of the United States, going to show that the "course which this Government might take in relation to said treaty has excited no small degree of attention and discussion in Europe." Also, to inform the Senate how far the "warm animadversions," and "the great political excitement" which this treaty has caused in Europe, have any application or reference to these United States. Also, to inform the Senate what danger there was that "the laws and the obligations" of the United States in relation to the suppression of the slave-trade would be "executed by others" if we did not "remove their pretext and motive for violating our flag and executing our laws," by entering into the stipulations for the African squadron, and the remonstrating sentences which are contained in the 8th and 9th articles of the late British treaty. And, also, to communicate to the Senate all the correspondence which may have been received from our ministers abroad, having relation to the foregoing points of inquiry.

Mr. ARCHER inquired if the Senator from Missouri intended to make any remarks on the subject?

Mr. BENTON intimated that he did not conceive any necessary, unless called for in reply.

Mr. ARCHER said he believed he could give the Senator from Missouri all the information that he would be enabled to obtain by the adoption of this resolution. The Senator would perceive, by reference to the message of the President, of August last, communicating the treaty between the United States and Great Britain, that an answer to the first branch of his interrogatories was there given. The President had there declared that the quintuple treaty had not been communicated to this Government by any of the parties to that treaty. It was very true, that the Government of the United States had got information of the character of that treaty, as seemed to be the case with regard to the various Governments of Europe; but it had not yet been officially communicated.

As to the other matters inquired for by the resolution, the same answer would, he thought, equally apply to them. The Government had no other means of obtaining information, than that possessed by the gentleman from Missouri himself. It was within the knowledge of the honorable Senator himself, that—in consequence, perhaps, of the importance of the treaty itself, or, perhaps, in consequence of the attention which had been attracted to it by General Cass—it had become a subject of discussion and of animadversion throughout Europe, as well as the United States.

The next branch of inquiry contained in the resolution, as he (Mr. ARCHER) understood it, was in relation to the opinion which had been expressed by the Executive of the United States as to the course which this Government ought to pursue in reference to the slave-trade. He (Mr. A.) would at least presume that the honorable Senator from Missouri was indifferent, as he himself was, as to the opinions entertained by the President upon this subject; and he would therefore submit to the honorable Senator whether there could be any propriety or necessity for asking these opinions. He would ask, then, inasmuch as there had been no official communication on the subject between this and any foreign Government, wherefore should a call be made for information which could not be rendered? The President had merely expressed an opinion that it was best to execute our own laws, and not submit to the indignity of having them executed for us by other nations.

The Senator from Missouri, he was sure, would concur with him, that as there were no facts in the possession of the Executive, which were not equally in the possession of the Senator himself, there could be no necessity for the resolution of inquiry. He hoped, therefore, the honorable Senator would be willing that the motion which he was now about to make, to lay the resolution upon the table, should prevail.

Mr. BENTON replied to the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. ARCHER,] and said his resolution of inquiry was founded upon the President's message of August last, recommending the ratification of the British treaty; and all the points of inquiry made by him were found in that message. He would have made the call at the last session, when the treaty was ratified; but there was no time for it. The treaty came at the end of a nine months' session, in the midst of the dog-days, and when there was no time for inquiries. But the appropriations for the treaty were still to be made; and the information he wanted, would be used when the supplies for the African squadron were demanded. The message says the quintuple alliance was not officially communicated to the Government. This implies that it was unofficially communicated; and if so, the country ought to know by whom, and for what purpose. The message speaks of our conduct in relation to that treaty, as being the subject of attention and discussion in Europe; and tells us of warm animadversions, and great political excitement, in relation to it. Of course, it is the parties to this quintuple treaty—the holy allies—who are giving us this attention, and making us the subject of this discussion; who bestow this animadversion, and experience this great excitement;—and it is certainly right that the people of the United States should know what all this portends; and how far the affairs of the United States are taken into the keeping of the holy allies. The message also presents, as an argument for the African squadron, that others would execute our laws if we did not; and execute them in a way to violate our flag. This is presented as an argument to operate on the mind of the Senate, in favor of the ratification, when it might be an argument against carrying it into effect; for this country was not to be dragooned into an alliance. The whole case, as made out in the President's message of August last, went to show that the holy allies had taken our conduct into their consideration; and that Great Britain was going to execute our laws for us, if we did not execute them ourselves; and that this squadron and these remonstrating ambassadors were the price which we paid to appease the holy allies, and to escape search from Great Britain. This was the aspect of the message; and he wished to know whether there were facts to justify it. If there were, he thought it a case for resistance, not for submission.

Mr. ARCHER desired to say a single word, in relation to this matter, to the Senator from Missouri, and to the Senate. He presumed no one would contend that it comported with the dignity of that body to make a call upon the Executive for information, when they were sufficiently advised that no information could be obtained. And, to be convinced that none could be obtained, it was only necessary to refer to the message of the President. What, then, was the object of this resolution? Was it a resolution of crimination? The Senator was informed that there had been no communication made to this Government by the parties to the quintuple treaty: how, then, could he expect to obtain the information he asked?

He would put it to the honorable Senator himself, whether it was not just as much within his own knowledge, as within that of the Government, that there had been warm animadversions and strong political excitement throughout Europe in relation to that treaty. It had been in France—one of the greatest nations in the world—a subject of such violent political excitement, that the Government had actually, as he had been informed, determined to renounce all participation in it. Could there be any higher evidence than this that the comments of the President were founded upon the facts connected with this subject? Was there anything more notorious than the high state of political excitement which this very subject had produced in Europe? The President had stated this fact, and given his own opinion upon it. And he (Mr. A.) confessed he thought the honorable Senator from Missouri would have concurred with him in the opinion, that if they were to have laws or provisions formed in reference to their obligations towards other nations, they should at least take upon themselves the execution of those laws. Did the honorable Senator desire to be understood as urging it as a ground of demerit in the President, that he expressed the opinion that we should be the sole executors of our own laws—that we should ourselves give them force and efficacy? Did the mere expression of this abstract opinion involve the inference which the honorable Senator intended to draw, that there had been—what? That there had been efforts on the part of this Government to obtain assistance from other powers in the execution of our own laws? There was not the least ground for such a presumption.

How could the Government, by any possibility, furnish the evidence demanded by the honorable Senator, when they were told by the Executive that he had had no negotiations upon the subject with any power whatever? There being, then, no information in the possession of the Government going to answer the inquiry contained in the resolution, he would submit to the honorable Senator whether it was fit that they should send a criminatory or a vindictive resolution to the President. He would put it to the honorable Senator, if it was really information that he sought. The honorable Senator knew full well there was no information that he could receive. His object, then, with all due respect to the honorable Senator, he (Mr. A.) must suppose was merely to utter a denunciation against the Executive. This being his view of the case, he felt bound to move that the resolution be laid upon the table.

Mr. KING suggested that it would be better to postpone its consideration, and, in the mean time, order it to be printed.

Mr. ARCHER said he intended no discourtesy towards any honorable Senator; and if any one desired to discuss the resolution further, he would withdraw the motion.

Mr. BENTON observed that he wanted the information, not for crimination, but for use on the discussion of the appropriation. Everything in relation to the origin and cause of this African squadron would then be wanting; for he, for one, meant to resist the appropriations for this African crusade. He said the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. ARCHER] was mistaken in supposing that he wanted the opinions of the Administration. Not so. He had their opinions in the August message; and he wished to see whether they had any facts for the opinions they then delivered. He wished to see if the holy allies were animadverting upon us, and whether Great Britain intended to search our ships if we did not join her in the African alliance. This seemed to be the opinion of the Administration; and Mr. B. wished to see if they had any foundation for it. With this view, he called for all the information they possessed, and especially for the correspondence of our ministers abroad. He felt certain that those ministers must have written on the subject. It could not be supposed that the President had founded his communication to the Senate on coffee-house discussions, or on newspaper discussions, or even on the debates of the French Chambers: there was nothing in all that to alarm us, or to show that the holy allies were occupying themselves with our affairs. The President must have had official correspondence on the subject, even if he had no official communication of the treaty: and he wished to see that correspondence. He had a right to see it, and should insist upon his right.

Mr. B. then read the paragraphs from the President's message of August last; and argued that every inquiry was bottomed upon the message, and proper for the information of Congress and the country. The paragraphs were as follows:

"It is known that, in December last, a treaty was signed in London, by the representatives of England, France, Russia, Prussia, and Austria, having for its professed object a strong and united effort of the five powers to put an end to the traffic. This treaty was not officially communicated to the Government of the United States; but its provisions and stipulations are supposed to be accurately known to the public. It is understood to be not yet ratified on the part of France.

"No application or request has been made to this Government to become party to this treaty; but the course it might take in regard to it, has excited no small degree of attention and discussion in Europe, as the principle upon which it is founded, and the stipulations which it contains, have caused warm animadversions and great political excitement.

"In my message at the commencement of the present session of Congress, I endeavored to state the principles which this Government supports respecting the right of search and the immunity of flags. Desirous of maintaining those principles fully, at the same time that existing obligations should be fulfilled, I have thought it most consistent with the honor and dignity of the country that it should execute its own laws, and perform its own obligations by its own means and its own power. The examination or visitation of the merchant vessels of one nation, by the cruisers of another, for any purpose, except those known and acknowledged by the law of nations, under whatever restraints or regulations it may take place, may lead to dangerous results. It is far better, by other means, to supersede any supposed necessity, or any motive, for such examination or visit. Interference with a merchant vessel by an armed cruiser, is always a delicate proceeding, apt to touch the point of national honor, as well as to affect the interests of individuals. It has been thought, therefore, expedient, not only in accordance with the stipulations of the treaty of Ghent, but, at the same time, as removing all pretext on the part of others for violating the immunities of the American flag upon the seas, as they exist and are defined by the law of nations, to enter into the articles now submitted to the Senate.

Mr. B. said these paragraphs presented grave matter for the consideration of the Congress and the country. They were gravely presented to the Senate, to influence its action on the treaty; and, from the case which they present, it is perfectly clear that this squadron is our tribute in men and ships to appease the holy allies, and to prevent Great Britain from searching us. It is clear, from these paragraphs, that this five years' alliance is the price which we pay for these favors. Now, it might or it might not be so. In either event, we have a right to know; and in either event, the administration is on the horn of a dilemma. If the holy allies and Great Britain are going to take us in hand if we do not give them this squadron, then it was cowardice and national degradation to give it. If, on the other hand, the holy allies have no designs upon us, and Great Britain has no design to search us, if we do not search ourselves, then the Senate has been trifled with, and considerations brought to bear upon them which have no foundation in fact. In either case, we have a right to know the facts. Has Great Britain threatened us? Have the holy allies taken our conduct in hand? These are the questions which arise on the President's message; and let us have them answered. Let us have the correspondence of our ministers, if there is any. Does the Senator from Virginia undertake to say for the administration, that they have no such correspondence? [Mr. ARCHER was understood to answer negatively.] Then let the administration answer! As the case now stands, we have given this squadron under a threat—under the threat of seeing Great Britain execute our anti-slave-trade laws for us, if we do not execute them ourselves; upon the same principle that she executes our neutrality laws for us on the Canadian frontier. The excuse—no, not the excuse! for she does not descend to excuse, but boldly justifies!—the justification for the attack on the Caroline was, that the United States did not, or could not, execute its own laws on that frontier; and, therefore, Great Britain was under the necessity of executing them for us. This is the language with respect to the Canada frontier; and, from the tenor of the message, we have the same language in relation to the coast of Africa. By land and by water—at home and abroad—Great Britain undertakes to execute our laws for us, and to punish our citizens for us! and, from the termination of the Schlosser affair, said this African tribute in men and ships, it seems that the present Administration admits her pretension in both cases. But, let us see. Let us have the facts—the correspondence; and let the country judge whether we have really been menaced, or whether our Administration have taken fright at nothing.

Mr. ARCHER assenting to the suggestion of postponing the resolution to Thursday, on motion to that effect, the resolution was postponed to Thursday next, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CRITTENDEN observed that there was a bill, which the House had passed, now on the table awaiting the action of the Senate. He hoped there would be no objection to taking it up with a view to reference.

No objection being made, the bill in relation to the lands granted to the deaf and dumb asylum in the State of Kentucky (amendatory of the law) was taken up, read twice, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WRIGHT offered the following resolution; which lies on the table one day:

Resolved, That the Committee on Retrenchment be instructed to inquire and report to the Senate the number of clerks of committees who have been appointed and paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate, during the last and present Congress; the amount so paid to such clerks, and the rate of compensation; and whether any, and what, other mode can, in the opinion of the committee, be adopted, by which a more general, and equal, and effectual aid to all the committees of the Senate may be secured in a more reasonable form, and on more economical terms.

The joint resolution of the House to amend the 19th joint rule was then taken up; and, on motion of Mr. BARROW to that effect, laid on the table.

Mr. HUNTINGTON said there was an engrossed bill on the table, which might be taken up and disposed of in a few moments; as he did not suppose there would be any discussion or opposition in relation to it. It was the bill ordered to be engrossed yesterday, changing the name of a vessel from "Westchester" to "Atlantic."

The bill was taken up, read a third time, and passed.

A communication from the Treasury Department was then read, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. SEVIER moved an adjournment.

Mr. HUNTINGTON said it was desirable the Senate should go into executive session for a few moments.

The motion to adjourn was negatived—ayes 12, noes 15.

The Senate then, on motion of Mr. HUNTINGTON, went into executive session; and after a short time spent therein,

Adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, December 20, 1842.

Mr. EASTMAN presented the petition of Hillyard Shaw, for a pension.

Also, the petition of Charles Colman for bounty land or other remuneration.

Also, the petition of Moses Turner for arrears of pension; which were severally referred to their appropriate committees.

Mr. CASEY presented the petition of J. Childers of Lawrence county, Illinois, praying an increase of pension; which, on his motion, was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.

Mr. BARTON presented the petition of numerous citizens of Hampshire county, Virginia, praying for a repeal of the bankrupt law.

Mr. LOWELL presented the petitions of John N. Swasey, and 28 other shipmasters and merchants of Bucksport, Maine; of Andrew Peters, and 34 other shipmasters and merchants of Ellsworth, Maine; and of James S. Pike, and 29 other shipmasters and merchants of Calais, Maine: all praying for an appropriation for the erection of beacons, spindles, and buoys on the Muscle ridges upon the coast of Maine; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

MUTINY AND EXECUTIONS ON BOARD THE BRIG SOMERS.

Mr. GWIN asked the permission of the House to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to this House whatever official information may have been received at the Navy Department relative to the alleged design of mutiny on board the United States brig Somers, under the command of Alexander Slidell McKenzie; and what number of persons have been executed for said offence; their names and rank; and the proceedings which were had on board of said vessel in reference thereto.

Mr. WISE suggested to the gentleman from Mississippi, that, as a court of inquiry was to be called, from which official information would be received in a very few weeks, it would be better to postpone his resolution until the court had been held.

Mr. GWIN intimated his intention to press his resolution, that the necessary information might be got from the President.

Mr. WISE said the gentleman could not obtain any information in that way.

Mr. L. W. ANDREWS and other gentlemen made remarks which did not reach the reporter's desk.

Mr. GWIN moved a suspension of the rules for the reception of his resolution, to which objection had been made.

The motion was negatived.

THE BANKRUPT LAW.

Mr. FILLMORE moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole, for the purpose of proceeding with the consideration of the general appropriation bill.

Mr. HOPKINS inquired if the bill for the repeal of the bankrupt law was not the special order for this day.

The SPEAKER replied in the negative; the bill having been merely postponed to this day.

Mr. HOPKINS called for the yeas and nays on going into committee.

Mr. H. observed that he supposed, if the House refused to go into committee, it would be in order to move to take up the bill to repeal the bankrupt law.

The SPEAKER was understood to reply in the affirmative.

The yeas and nays were then ordered, and, being taken, resulted as follows: Yeas 89, nays 98.

So the House refused to go into Committee of the Whole.

Mr. EVERETT then moved that the House take up the bill to repeal the bankrupt law.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. EVERETT then briefly stated some reasons which had prompted his action in this matter, but in so low a tone of voice, and amidst a deafening hum throughout the House, which overpowered the honorable gentleman's voice. He was understood to say that he voted for the bankrupt law when it was passed, for the relief of bankrupts whose misfortunes were brought upon them without any fault of their own, but by the fault of the Government. His object, then, was to relieve the country from the distresses in which it was then involved; but he did not, so far as he was concerned, design it to be a permanent measure. He was in favor of limiting it to one year at the time of its passage; but he did not press his views on that point at that time, because he desired the passage of the law, and such a limitation might have endangered its passage. He now offered this bill for the repeal of the bankrupt law, because he conceived it to be destroying confidence between man and man; and seemed to be a shelter for those who were disposed to live without labor. Its future operation he looked upon as injurious; and it would be difficult to engraft any amendment upon the present act which would diminish its evils. He said he did not propose to commit this bill, because he was in favor of a total repeal of the bankrupt law; and therefore its committal was unnecessary. If, however, such a motion should be made, he should consider it a test question between those who desired the continuance, and those who desired the repeal of that law.

Mr. BARNARD observed that the fate of the 27th Congress seemed to be a very peculiar and a very hard one. This Congress was composed of two parties; the lines of difference between which were drawn, perhaps, more distinctly than between any two parties that ever existed in this country. One of these parties was in a decided majority of that House—numbering some thirty or forty votes of a majority. The executive power of the country also was in the hands of one holding opinions in accordance with those of the majority. Before the meeting of Congress, however, for the first time for the transaction of business, after its election, misfortune had fallen upon the dominant party; they lost their own President, and the constitutional incumbent of the Presidential office was not disposed to act in accordance with the majority. A portion, also, of their own friends in the House of Representatives, departed from them, and joined themselves with the Executive, who was of course supported by the whole body of the opposition. In that way, and under those circumstances, we came (said Mr. B.) to the transaction of the public business. We struggled with difficulties from the first moment of our existence, and have never ceased to struggle with difficulties to this day. Our condition was like that of the poor wretch Sysiphus—condemned to roll an enormous stone up a steep acclivity, only to find some obstacle in our way, by which our labors and ourselves were to be tumbled down to the bottom again. But all this (said Mr. B.) was our misfortune, and not our fault; and amidst all our difficulties we certainly succeeded in passing some good measures. At the extra session we passed the law distributing the proceeds of the public lands among the States, and we passed the bankrupt law. At the last session, we passed the districting law, and we also passed the tariff law. What was to remain of all these, and many other measures, at the close of the constitutional term of existence of the present Congress, no man could tell. One thing was sure—the land-distribution law was gone already; the congressional districting law was in danger; while the tariff law was proposed to be moderated and modified out of all its protective character; and now, at last, came the bill to repeal the bankrupt law—moved, too, by one of the original friends of that measure. For one, (said Mr. B.) I could stand all the injuries our enemies are doing us; but it is hard to receive such blows at the hands of our friends. What an extraordinary spectacle (said Mr. B.) do we now present to the American people! This motion for a repeal of the bankrupt law came from Vermont, and from his excellent and learned friend from that State, [Mr. EVERETT,] who took the pains to declare, at this and at the last session of Congress, that, upon the whole, the bankrupt act was the best and wisest law that Congress had ever passed. Now, it was to be repealed upon the motion of the very gentleman who had made this eulogium. Considering the source from which that motion emanated, and considering the sort of support which it was about to receive, it struck his mind as one of the most alarming movements he had ever witnessed in the political world. It went far to prove the truth of the charge so often made against this nation—that its legislation was destined to be unstable; not guided and governed, as it ought to be, by the settled, well-considered, well-digested opinions of the people of the country; but that it was destined to be disturbed by every wave of popular sentiment—to follow, in short, not only the shiftings and turnings of popular sentiment, but popular error and popular delusion. That such a thing as popular error and popular delusion existed, as well in this country as in others, he was not afraid or ashamed to say. By unsettled, ill-digested popular opinion, he never had been—and so help him God!—never would be governed.

But Vermont demanded the repeal of the bankrupt law; and, therefore, it was to be repealed. Vermont was a creditor State—she was in the happy condition of owing nobody, and everybody was indebted to her; and her Legislature, at its last session, passed a resolution instructing her Senators, and requesting her Representatives, in Congress, to procure the repeal of that law. He denied the right of Vermont to dictate to Congress upon this subject, or upon any other. She might express her opinions, it was true; but the opinions that governed here were those of the members of the National Legislature, and not those of the members of her State Legislature. He was utterly hostile to this doctrine of instruction, let it come from what source it might, avowed or not avowed. What security was there for legislation, if the representatives of a State—the very same men—were to be governed one day by one set of opinions, and another day by another, just as the waves of popular sentiment ebbed and flowed. Vermont did not, it seemed, like to see her debtors escape, and, in common with almost all other creditors, she had a very great reluctance to see the dead body o debt buried out of her sight. Well, this might be a very natural feeling; but it was a morbid one, which ought not to be encouraged. Creditors were not buzzards, to feed on carrion; and he did not want to see these dead bodies kept above ground till they tainted the whole atmosphere.

He had remarked that he could not see any security for legislation in the country, unless party and party men were to be precluded from influencing it to suit their temporary purposes. If they could not be, then the legislation of the country would be blown about by every popular gale. Unless the Representatives would abide by their own opinions after having once promulgated them, he was free to declare that there could be no stability in the policy of the country.

But his excellent friend from Vermont [Mr. EVERETT] had discovered that the bankrupt law had performed its office; that it had fulfilled its objects, and therefore ought to be repealed. He further avowed, that it was his opinion at the time the act was passed, that it should have been limited to the term of one year; that it ought to be a temporary law. What was a temporary law? What was it but repudiation in its most odious form—repudiation by individuals of their own debts at their own time; a proclamation by debtors of a jubilee—not like that of the Jews, which occurring at regular and stated periods, creditors as well as debtors could prepare themselves for—but a jubilee the time of which was to be prescribed by the debtors themselves. Such a bankrupt law was not the establishment of a rule of law; it was the establishment of an exception to a rule of law, in the face of the law itself. It was a law by which you open the prison doors, and let loose those confined at the moment; though at the next day the jails may be as full as ever—and of those, too, who are not to be set at liberty. Was that a bankrupt law in the understanding of the Constitution? The Constitution authorized Congress to pass uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcy: but could a law of a year's duration be called a uniform law? It was not law, because it was not a rule of conduct affecting all alike; but it was a mere partial arbitrary act of arbitrary power, interposing between the creditor and his debtor, to break up for the time being the relations between them, and to take away the power which the law gave the former over the latter. In this way, the creditor, in his turn, might be ruined and driven to bankruptcy; though, in consequence of the temporary nature of the law, he would be precluded from its benefits. Mr. B. said he denied the power of Congress to pass any such law. It had the power to pass a permanent and uniform law, and he admitted that it had the power to repeal it; but it had no power to pass a bankrupt law that was not permanent and uniform. Such a bankrupt law as was contemplated by the Constitution would have the tendency to prevent bankruptcy; but a temporary law, such as was contemplated by the gentleman from Vermont, would have the tendency to encourage bankruptcy, and to encourage extravagance and speculation, by the hope held out that a proclamation of jubilee would be made to free debtors for the time being from the power of their creditors.

If, then, this bankrupt law was to be repealed, let it be because it was inexpedient; because, such a law ought never to have been passed; but, for Heaven's sake, do not let it be repealed on the ground that it has accomplished the object for which it was enacted.

Mr. B. said he had no manner of doubt but that very much of the influence which was abroad in the country, and was brought to bear on the House at the time the bankrupt law was passed, was that of individuals, who, if they did not then hold the sentiments advanced now by his friend from Vermont, were yet willing to receive the benefits of them; in other words, they were willing that a temporary law should be passed to relieve them from their embarrassments, to be repealed or to expire at the time they came to be creditors. He prayed and besought gentlemen, therefore, if they meant to vote for the repeal, to put their votes on better grounds than those of his friend from Vermont. Let the law be repealed, if it is to be repealed, because it is a bad law; but do not let it be repealed because it was intended as a temporary measure, and because it has fulfilled its objects.

But why should the bankrupt law be repealed? He addressed himself to those who had been its friends. What was the greatest objection to the measure, in the minds of intelligent men, at the time of its passage? Was it not because of its retrospective operation, violating, in their opinions, one of the provisions of the Constitution, by impairing the obligation of contracts? That objection was now almost removed. The force of the bankrupt law in regard to old cases was almost spent; and it was now about to commence its most wholesome and beneficent functions, by operating on cases which have arisen since its enactment. The constitutional objection was, therefore, no longer in force.

After some further remarks from Mr. B., showing the benefits derived, and to be derived, from the bankrupt act, he concluded by moving to commit the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary, with instructions to bring in a bill to repeal that part of the law providing for voluntary bankruptcy, and to provide that this shall take place in 18 months from the passage of the act.

Mr. B. said the House was aware that, in the other branch of Congress, a resolution had been adopted calling upon the Secretary of State for information in relation to this subject; and he hoped that the House would wait till that information was received, and not, by precipitate legislation, run the risk of committing an act of cruelty and injustice.

Mr. C. J. INGERSOLL said he should like to move the adoption of instructions to the committee, in case the bill were referred to their consideration. He, therefore, sent to the Chair the following instructions:

"And that the said committee be instructed to report a bill excluding the voluntary provision from the present bankrupt act, and including banks."

Mr. BARNARD inquired whether the motion was in order; to which

The SPEAKER replied in the affirmative.

Mr. C. J. INGERSOLL modified his instructions, by striking out the word banks, and substituting the words trading corporations.

Mr. WINTHROP said that, however calculated the motion was to produce a wide discussion, he had a strong presentiment that the present debate would not be long. It seemed that summary execution was to be applied to this, the last act of that ill-fated extra session. Its sentence had been pronounced before arguments at law; judgment was to be first carried out, and a hearing had afterwards. Indeed, he feared that there was an impatience and an indisposition to hear at all, either before or after judgment. For himself, he had no disposition to speak at length; for the subject had already been nearly exhausted by the remarks of his friend from New York, [Mr. BARNARD;] nor would he impugn the course taken by his friend from Vermont, [Mr. EVERETT,] who no doubt acted from a sense of duty to his constituents. He only wished to explain simply the reasons which should induce him to vote against the repeal of this law, representing as he did a great commercial community.

The power of Congress to enact a bankrupt law was not implied merely, but was found in the category of those clearly expressed and enumerated powers about which there was no dispute. Now, he held it to be the duty of Congress to exercise its power; and not to exercise it, a positive neglect and omission—not less than it would be to omit to exercise the power given to regulate commerce, establish courts, coin money, provide for the common defence of the country, and, in short, any other power expressed among those named in the Constitution. He was aware that it had been suggested by his friend from Vermont, [Mr. EVERETT,] that though the present law might be repealed, another might be enacted. But when would such an event occur? When could it be expected? Certainly not until it should be called for by the people, to sweep off the load of indebtedness that might be upon them; and then the law would itself be swept off, after having performed its office. Such was the fate of the first bankrupt law, and such seemed to be the inevitable destiny of this.

But the language of the Constitution was remarkably strong. It was, not that "Congress shall have power to pass," but to "establish a uniform system of bankruptcy." Would a mere passage of an act be a fulfilment of the power to establish the system? So far from it, the reverse of the proposition would be true; and such passage be a mere temporary remedy. Such a course—the enactment of a bankrupt law for a particular temporary purpose—could be justified on no principle whatever. He, therefore, protested against the introduction of a bankrupt law at irregular intervals, and before the trader and the man of business could be aware how to act. Anticipating the results which had flowed from the insertion of the retrospective principle in the present act, he had voted for it with reluctance; and, had he believed that the whole act was destined to be so soon expunged from the statute-book, he should not have voted for it at all. And here he would make a suggestion to that gentleman, who had denounced the retrospective character of the act; and that was, that, by voting for the repeal of the law at the present time, they would become responsible for its revival hereafter. The only mode of preventing the enactment of a retrospective law was to establish the prospective provision of the present law upon a firm basis. True, the present law might not be perfect, and might require remedy in its details. What he had to say was, let it be perfected; let it be limited in its operation to traders, if necessary; and even let a provision be inserted comprehending banks, under certain circumstances and regulations. It did seem to him that the responsibility of the enactment of a retrospective bankrupt act hereafter would rest on those gentlemen who should vote for the repeal of the present.

There was one more view of the subject which he would mention. He meant the monstrous injustice of an immediate and unconditional repeal of the law. It was known that many debtors, responding, as had been said, to the first sound of the trumpet, had advanced and obtained relief, having first stripped themselves for the purpose, and leaving as little matter to be decided upon by the courts as effects to be distributed among the creditors. A repeal of the law would not take away the benefits these men had obtained, whilst it would give the same desperate debtors the further advantage of any new bankrupt law which might be enacted hereafter. On the other hand, there were numbers whose affairs, not altogether hopeless, left the prospect of distributing something to their creditors—men whose applications for the benefit of the act had been held back, in the hope of making an honorable compromise; or whose cases had been delayed in the courts by argument upon points of law: these would be altogether deprived of the advantages secured by more expeditious, and perhaps less scrupulous, debtors. In conclusion, he hoped—if it was not too late to hope—that the House would pause before it resolved to wipe out altogether the law now in force.

Mr. PAYNE remarked that one of the strongest objections which he had to the passage of this act, was its retrospective character. He was not fully persuaded that the Government had power to pass a law absolving individuals from their contracts. He could not believe it to be legal and proper for the Government to destroy the relations subsisting between debtor and creditor. Government, as he thought, should at least have permitted the obligations between the creditor and his security to be performed.

These were some of his objections to the law at the beginning; but, with regard to a prospective bankrupt law, properly established, he did not then, nor did he now, object. All objections, however, were disregarded by those who controlled the action of this House; and a uniform system of bankruptcy, to be perpetual as the law of the country, was passed; and this was the first time that the avowal had been made—as it had been made this morning—that the object of the bankrupt law was to violate private contracts, and to turn men loose from their obligations. It was immaterial how they regarded it here; but the eyes of all the commercial world were turned upon them; and to Europe it would appear that they repealed the law, after it had done—what? Released at least the debtor from the obligation of his contracts. It appeared to him this proposition portrayed, more clearly than anything else could do, the true object the gentlemen who advocated it had in pressing it on the country. Now, if he might be permitted to advise those gentlemen who passed this law, he should say: For Heaven's sake, do not lay it on this exclusive ground—that the object was to release the debtor from the obligation of his contract, for which he had received a valuable consideration.

He would declare again, that, if a bankrupt law were established, striking out the voluntary feature, and making it such a bankrupt law as was contemplated by the Constitution, he should not object to see it become part of the permanent policy of our country. But if they voted for the bill which was now presented to the House, for the repeal of the existing bankrupt law, they would commit themselves with regard to the constitutionality of the whole measure. The proviso was designed to secure to those who had taken the first step, the benefit of the existing bankrupt law up to the 5th of the present month; and when this bill was introduced, he gave notice that he should move to strike out that proviso; but he was conscious of the great difficulty which must result. There was much force in what had been said by gentlemen on this subject, respecting the indecent haste of bankrupts to avail themselves of the law, to release them from their obligations; whereas those who were less hasty, and who regretted the necessity to avail themselves of the provisions of the law, and therefore held back, were to be deprived of the benefits of the law. There were difficulties, too, in the way of their voting for this bill to repeal the bankrupt law, with such a provision as would compromise them on the constitutional question which it involved; and the whole case afforded a striking illustration of the evil of that hasty legislation which was forced on the country without consideration by the operation of the gag rule, which did not permit an i to be dotted, or a t to be crossed. Under all the circumstances, he did not know that he could go for the repeal, as the bill now stood; for he was unwilling to commit himself with regard to the constitutional question.

He had another remark to make, in relation to the instructions. It had been his determination in all his acts, while he was a member of that body, to give no vote which, in his opinion, would tend to increase the power of this Government, or the Executive patronage of this Government. Every vote he did give would be to diminish rather than to increase that power. Suppose, then, they placed all the banking institutions of the country under the operation of the bankrupt law; why, an Executive, who was disposed to do so, might use the power of this Government for the punishment, on the one hand, and his influence to excite hope of reward, on the other; or, every bank would be placed at the foot of the Executive, to aid him in carrying out his plans. Were he disposed to strike directly at the principle by which he had governed his legislative action, he should give the Executive this power. He trusted, therefore, that the proposition would be either amended, or laid on the table; but if, on the contrary, it were attached to this bill, the bankrupt law would never be repealed. There was one fact, in connexion with the discussions which had already been had on this subject, to which he was inclined to call the attention of the House; but he declined doing so, because it verified a prediction which had been made again and again with regard to the Whig Congress. This bankrupt law was a Whig measure. It originated with the Whigs; it was passed by Whigs. He was not sure, but he did not believe there was more than one solitary Democratic member that voted for it. And what were they now told? Why, that this Whig measure—a measure conceived, brought forth, and carried into a law by Whigs, to relieve the country, had done—what? Destroyed all confidence between man and man, and had broken down the credit of the country. This was the character given of it by the gentleman from Vermont.

Mr. EVERETT explained.

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman then said, if it had not done all these things, that it was in a state of progression; and if they permitted it to remain, it would break down the credit of the country, and destroy confidence between man and man. Such was the result of one of the important measures which were passed by the 27th Congress; and in view of this, and other acts, there was one circumstance which appeared to be a little remarkable: the President was blamed for the application of his vetoes, and for not permitting the Whigs to do all that which they desired to do—for not permitting the majority in this Congress to do all that they pleased; and he was still blamed. It was not his place to blame or to defend the President; but justice ought to be done, and he would, therefore, say they ought not to blame the President for not permitting more wrongdoing than that which it was now admitted they had done.

Mr. GORDON addressed the House in favor of the repeal of the law. He commenced by remarking that, in the discussions upon the measure, when it passed at the extra session, it was said that it would be hailed as a public jubilee. Recollecting this remark, he did not expect so early to have heard it said by a member of the House—and a member, too, of that very majority who passed the act—that it was intended as a permanent measure. He had himself supposed that the law had its inception, and would have its consummation in a desire to relieve debtors from the embarrassments into which they were, for the time being, plunged; and was only such a measure as would be passed, at intervals, to fulfil the end named. But it seemed he was mistaken; and now, the only ground on which the law was at all justified was taken away. As to his own position, that was the same now as at the extra session—a firm opposition to the measure on account of its unconstitutionality, as well as on account of considerations of its injustice.

The fate of the measure, as the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WINTHROP] had said, was settled. Its end was at hand. Its decree of repeal had been borne on the wings of popular sentiment and indignation. The work only remained to be done. He could not see how his colleague [Mr. BARNARD] could have been brought to declare that it was a want of reflection in the people to decree the repeal of the measure at which he was astonished! Surely his colleague could not have perceived how, by this remark, he was impugning the intelligence of the people. His colleague had set himself up to contradict the public voice for demanding the repeal of this measure! and did not this amount to a declaration that the people knew not what they were about? Such was, in fact, the averment which his colleague had made; yet he (Mr. G.) was not surprised at the remark, when he recollected that his colleague belonged to that party which had no confidence in the people, and which believed them to be incapable of self-government.

Here Mr. ARNOLD rose, and inquired whether a single petition for the repeal of the bankrupt act had been presented this session.

Mr. GORDON said this question reminded him of a fact, which he often observed—that there were many men who could not or would not understand what public sentiment was, in relation to a particular measure, until they had read it in a petition. Now, these petitions, it was well known, were often gotten up to order, and therefore entitled to no moral influence. Public sentiment upon a measure like the present was overpowering; and a miserable petition would but ill embody its force and omnipotence. In reply, however, to the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. ARNOLD,] he would state that petitions had been sent here to obtain the repeal of this measure. But whether they had or not, every man of ordinary sagacity and observation knew what public sentiment was upon this question. He was glad to find that even the gentleman from Vermont had bowed down before this public sentiment, and had determined to vote for the repeal.

Mr. EVERETT rose, and was understood to say that his determination arose from a change of his opinions, rather than from considerations growing out of any supposed state of public sentiment.

Mr. GORDON said he was then glad to hear that the gentleman had changed his opinion. His added but another to the general voice that the law was a bad one.

But his colleague [Mr. BARNARD] had complained of the instability of legislation in this country, and had charged that the repeal of the law would tend still further to sink our reputation in that respect. In reply, he would remark that all bad laws, like this bankrupt act, did most effectually contribute to instability of legislation; because, in a country where the people's wishes were consulted, such laws were certain to be expunged from the statute-book. Yet he would leave it to the common sense of any man to say whether this was a reason why a bad law should not be repealed. If Congress would confine itself to its legitimate sphere of action, standing upon the broad platform of the Constitution, and only enacting such measures as were called for by the people, there would be no reason for his colleague to complain of instability of legislation.

But his colleague had also complained of popular error and delusion in relation to this law. Now, he could tell his colleague how the people had come to be so sadly in "error and delusion." They had employed their "sober second thought" upon the bankrupt act, and their verdict against it was another instance to show how correct are the ultimate decisions of the people in regard to matters proposed to be moderated and modified out of all its protective character; and now, at last, came the bill to repeal the bankrupt law—moved, too, by one of the original friends of that measure. For one, (said Mr. B.) I could stand all the injuries our enemies are doing us; but it is hard to receive such blows at the hands of our friends. What an extraordinary spectacle (said Mr. B.) do we now present to the American people! This motion for a repeal of the bankrupt law came from Vermont, and from his excellent and learned friend from that State, [Mr. EVERETT,] who took the pains to declare, at this and at the last session of Congress, that, upon the whole, the bankrupt act was the best and wisest law that Congress had ever passed. He had remarked that he could not see any security for legislation in the country, unless party and party men were to be precluded from influencing it to suit their temporary purposes. If they could not be, then the legislation of the country would be blown about by every popular gale. Unless the Representatives would abide by their own opinions after having once promulgated them, he was free to declare that there could be no stability in the policy of the country.

But his excellent friend from Vermont [Mr. EVERETT] had discovered that the bankrupt law had performed its office; that it had fulfilled its objects, and therefore ought to be repealed. He further avowed, that it was his opinion at the time the act was passed, that it should have been limited to the term of one year; that it ought to be a temporary law. What was a temporary law? What was it but repudiation in its most odious form—repudiation by individuals of their own debts at their own time; a proclamation by debtors of a jubilee—not like that of the Jews, which occurring at regular and stated periods, creditors as well as debtors could prepare themselves for—but a jubilee the time of which was to be prescribed by the debtors themselves. It was a law by which you open the prison doors, and let loose those confined at the moment; though at the next day the jails may be as full as ever—and of those, too, who are not to be set at liberty. Was that a bankrupt law in the understanding of the Constitution? The Constitution authorized Congress to pass uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcy: but could a law of a year's duration be called a uniform law? It was not law, because it was not a rule of conduct affecting all alike; but it was a mere partial arbitrary act of arbitrary power, interposing between the creditor and his debtor, to break up for the time being the relations between them, and to take away the power which the law gave the former over the latter. In this way, the creditor, in his turn, might be ruined and driven to bankruptcy; though, in consequence of the temporary nature of the law, he would be precluded from its benefits. Mr. B. said he denied the power of Congress to pass any such law. It had the power to pass a permanent and uniform law, and he admitted that it had the power to repeal it; but it had no power to pass a bankrupt law that was not permanent and uniform. Such a bankrupt law as was contemplated by the Constitution would have the tendency to prevent bankruptcy; but a temporary law, such as was contemplated by the gentleman from Vermont, would have the tendency to encourage bankruptcy, and to encourage extravagance and speculation, in the hope held out that a proclamation of jubilee would be made to free debtors for the time being from the power of their creditors.

If, then, this bankrupt law was to be repealed, let it be because it was inexpedient; because a law ought never to have been passed: but, for Heaven's sake, do not let it be repealed on the ground that it has accomplished the object for which it was enacted.

Mr. B. said he had no manner of doubt very much of the influence which was brought to bear in the country, and was brought to bear at the time the bankrupt law was passed, of individuals, who, if they did not [illegible] timents advanced now by his friend, were yet willing to receive the benefit of it; in other words, they were willing that a bankrupt law should be passed to relieve them from embarrassments, to be repealed or not at the time they came to be creditors. He therefore besought gentlemen, therefore, not to vote for the repeal, to put their votes on other grounds than those of his friend from Vermont. Let the law be repealed, if it ought to be, because it is a bad law; but do not repeal it because it was intended as a relief law, and because it has fulfilled its object.

But why should the bankrupt law be repealed? He addressed himself to the gentleman's friends. What was the state of the public mind, what was the measure, in the minds of the people, at the time of its passage? Was it not, in its retrospective operation, violative of the provisions of the Constitution, of the obligation of contracts? That objection was now almost removed. The bankrupt law in regard to old debts was now about to expire, and it was now about to be succeeded by some and beneficent law, which would remove the cases which have arisen under it, and the constitutional objection which existed to it in force.

After some further remarks on the subject, stating the benefits derived from the present bankrupt act, he concluded by moving to commit the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary, with instructions to bring in a bill to repeal that part of the law providing for the voluntary system, and to provide that it shall cease in six months from the passage of the repealing act.

Mr. B. said the House and the other branch of Congress had already adopted calling upon the Secretary for information in relation to the

To say nothing, at present, of other points of unconstitutionality, he limited himself to the abolition of debts without the consent of a given majority of the creditors. This, he held, no power in our country can do. Congress can only go as far as the bankrupt systems of England and other countries go; and that is, to require the consent of a given majority of the creditors (four-fifths in number and value in England and Scotland) and that founded upon a judicial certificate of integrity by the commissioners who examined the case, and approved afterwards by the Lord Chancellor. Upon these principles only could Congress act: upon these principles the Congress of 1800 acted, in making a bankrupt act: and to these principles he would endeavor to conform the action of the present act so long as it might run. He held all the certificates granted by the courts to be null and void; and that the question of the validity would be carried before the courts, and before the tribunal of public opinion. The federal judges decided the alien and sedition law to be constitutional. The people reversed that decision, and put down the men who held it. This bankrupt act was much more glaringly unconstitutional—much more immoral—and called more loudly upon the people to rise against it. If he was a United States judge, he would decide the act to be unconstitutional. If he was a State court, and one of these certificates of discharge from debts should be pleaded in bar before him, on an action brought for the recovery of the old debt, he would treat the certificate as a nullity, and throw it out of court. If commanded by the Supreme Court, he would resign first. The English law held all bankrupts, whose certificates were not signed by the given majority of the creditors, to be uncertificated; and, as such, he held all these to be who had received certificates under our law. They had no certificate of discharge from a given majority of the creditors; and were, therefore, what the English law called "uncertificated bankrupts." He said the bankrupt systems formed the creditors into a partnership for the management of the debtor's estate, and his discharge from debt; and, in this partnership, a given majority acted for the whole, all having the same interest in what was lost or saved; and, therefore, to be governed by a given majority, doing what was best for the whole. But even to this there were limitations. The four-fifths could not release the debt of the remaining fifth, except upon a certificate of integrity from the commissioners who tried the case, and a final approval by the Lord Chancellor. The law made itself party to the discharge, as it does in a case of divorce, and for the sake of good morals; and required the judicial certificate of integrity, without which the release of four-fifths of the creditors would not extinguish the debt of the other fifth. It is only in this way that Congress can act. It can only act according to the established principles of the bankrupt systems. It had no inherent or supreme authority over debts. It could not abolish debts as it pleased. It could not confound bankruptcy and insolvency, and so get hold of all debts, and sweep them off as it pleased. All this was despotism, such as only could be looked for in a Government which had no limits, either on its moral or political powers. The attempt to confound insolvency and bankruptcy, and to make Congress supreme over both, was the most daring attack on the Constitution, on the State laws, on the rights of property, and on public morals, which the history of Europe or America exhibited. There was no parallel to it in Europe or America. It was repudiation—universal repudiation of all debts—at the will of the debtor. The law was subversive of civil society; and he called upon Congress, the State Legislatures, the Federal and State judiciaries—and, above all, the people—to brand it for unconstitutionality and immorality, and to put it down.

Mr. B. said he had laid down the law, but he would refer to the forms which the wisdom of the law provided for executing itself. These forms were the highest evidences of the law. They were framed by men learned in the law—approved by the courts—and studied by the apprentices to the law. They should also be studied by the journeymen—by the professors—and by the ermined judges. In this case, especially, they should be so studied. Bankruptcy was a branch of the law but little studied in our country. The mass of the community were uninformed upon it; and the latitudinarians, who could find no limits to the power of our Government were daringly presuming upon the general ignorance, by undertaking to confound bankruptcy and insolvency, and claiming for Congress a despotic power over both. This daring attempt must be chastised. Congress must be driven back within the pale of the Constitution; and for that purpose, the principles of the bankrupt systems must be made known to the people. The forms are one of the best modes of doing this: and here are the forms of a bankrupt's certificate in Great Britain—the country from which our Constitution borrowed the system. [Mr. B. then read from Jacobs's Law Dictionary, title Bankruptcy, at the end of the title, the three forms of the certificates which were necessary to release a debtor from his debts.] The first form was that of the commissioners who examined the case, and who certified to the integrity of the bankrupt, and that he had conformed in all particulars to the act. The second form was that of the certificate of four-fifths of his creditors, "allowing him to be discharged from his debts." The third was the certificate of the Lord Chancellor, certifying that notice of these two certificates having been published for twenty-one days in the London Gazette, and no cause being shown to the contrary, the certificates granted by the commissioners and by the creditors were "confirmed." Then, and not till then, could the debtor be discharged from his debts; and with all this, the act of 1800 in the United States perfectly agreed, only taking two-thirds instead of four-fifths of the creditors. Congress could only absolve debts in this way, and that among the proper subjects of a bankrupt law: and the moral sense of the community must revolt against any attempt to do it in any other form. The present act was repudiation—criminal repudiation, as far as any one chose to repudiate—and must be put down by the community.

The memorial was then referred to the Judiciary Committee.

On motion of Mr. PORTER, leave was granted to withdraw from the files of the Senate (for the purpose of laying before the other House) the papers in relation to the claim of certain companies of Michigan militia.

Mr. KING presented to the Senate a memorial adopted by the Legislature of Alabama, upon the subject of lands which had been recently acquired from the Cherokees, which, through an error of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, had been advertised for sale in January next, contrary pointed Messrs. LINN, WALKER, SEVIER, MERRICK, and PHELPS, to constitute said committee.

Mr. STURGEON, on leave, introduced a bill for the relief of Lucretia Haymaker, heir at law of John Bown; which was twice read, and referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

On motion of Mr. WALKER it was

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of permitting the State of Mississippi to appropriate $25,000 of the two per cent. fund of said State towards the completion of the railroad from Jackson to Brandon, on the conditions designated by said State.

MEXICAN CLAIMS.

Mr. CONRAD submitted the following resolution, which lies over one day, under the rule, viz:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be requested to communicate to the Senate (if not incompatible with the public interest) whether the amount due and payable by Mexico for indemnity to citizens of the United States, under the late convention, has been paid in conformity with the terms of said convention; if not, whether any, and what, measures have been adopted by our Government to obtain or enforce payment; and also, to obtain the recognition of such claims as were submitted to, but not finally acted upon, by the late joint commission.

Mr. HUNTINGTON, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back without amendment, and with a recommendation that it pass, the bill to allow a drawback on foreign merchandise exported in original packages to Chihuahua and Santa Fe, in Mexico.

Mr. H. also reported, from the same committee, a bill to authorize the issuing of a new register to, and to change the name of, the ship Westchester of New York, to that of the Atlantic of New York; which was read, considered as in committee of the whole, reported to the Senate, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

On motion by Mr. TALLMADGE, the papers of Joseph Robey were ordered to be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. TALLMADGE presented a memorial from a committee on behalf of claimants to indemnity for French spoliations prior to 1800; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. T. also presented a petition from John Bosworth, praying for a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. RIVES presented a memorial from George Taylor, of the District of Columbia, praying indemnity for French spoliations prior to 1800: referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. R. also presented a memorial from Mary W. Harrison, widow and executrix of the late Benjamin Harrison, praying the passage of a law authorizing the resettlement of the accounts of her late husband with the Government, there being many errors in the former settlement: referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

DEATH OF Mr. HABERSHAM.

A message was here received from the House of Representatives, announcing to the Senate the death of the Hon. RICHARD W. HABERSHAM, late Representative from the State of Georgia, and the passage of certain resolutions; which message being read,

Mr. BERRIEN rose and addressed the Senate as follows:

Mr. President: In offering the resolutions which it is my duty to submit to the Senate on this occasion, the usage of this Chamber requires that I should accompany them with some notice, however brief, of the character of the deceased—with some reference, however transient, to the event which calls for this expression of our sympathy.

It would be to me, sir, a grateful, though a melancholy office, to pronounce the eulogy of my departed friend and associate—to dwell with cherished recollection on his public virtues—on his private worth—above all, on that benevolence of feeling, which was so beautifully exhibited in all his intercourse with his fellow-men. It would be my privilege to speak of him thus, sir; for it has been my good fortune to have been associated with him from his earlier years, in relations of kindness and amity, which experienced no solitary interruption to the close of his life; while, in mutually cherishing these feelings, we only lengthened the chain which had united our fathers in like friendly bonds. The occasion is, however, perhaps, inappropriate to the expression of mere private feeling—and I forbear.

Mr. HABERSHAM was a native of Georgia. His family name is associated with the records of her colonization, and is honorably inscribed on the pages of her provincial annals. It has been distinguished in each successive period of her history, and, unsullied by a spot, will now be registered on the stone which covers his own remains. In Georgia, sir, that name is the synonyme of patriotism, integrity, and benevolence.

Mr. HABERSHAM was born in the city of Savannah—I think in the year 1786. He obtained his collegiate education at Nassau Hall, in New Jersey; received the honors of that institution in 1805; and, returning to his native State, after the usual course of preparatory study, was called to the bar. He was early distinguished among his professional associates, and was for a series of years the counsel of the United States in the courts of that district. He retired from office, with the applause of the people of Georgia, when the duties which it imposed conflicted with his own sense of justice to a portion of his fellow-citizens. He served with reputation in the municipality of the city of Savannah, and in the Legislature of his native State, and has been twice honored by a seat in the councils of the Union. It can scarcely be necessary to say to those to whom I address myself, that his duties here have been discharged with zeal and fidelity, with assiduity and intelligence, and in a frank and conciliatory spirit, which, even amid the conflicts of party, secured to him the esteem and regard of his associates. He died at his own residence in Georgia, on the 2d instant, at a moment when, but for the disease which had prostrated him, he would have been hastening to unite with us in the duties of legislation.

Mr. HABERSHAM has now closed his earthly labors. Hereafter, among us, he lives only in the memory of his virtues. These will be long held in grateful remembrance by those to whom he was most intimately known. The recollection of them will, I trust, assuage the sorrows of the widowed partner of his life, and of that group of orphans who are clustering around her in this hour of anguish.

But Mr. HABERSHAM yet lives. The record of this probationary life, as to him, indeed, is closed forever. But he has gone, in the immortality of his being, to render his account to his Creator and his Judge. It remains to us to hope that he may find acceptance in that solemn hour through the atoning blood of the Redeemer; and to inscribe on our own hearts the monitory lesson which this event is calculated to impart.

Mr. B. closed by offering the usual resolutions in testimony of the respect of the Senate for the memory of the deceased, and authorizing the wearing of crape; which were read, and unanimously adopted; and, in accordance with which, the Senate forthwith adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, December 19, 1842.

Mr. THOMPSON of Mississippi presented the petition of Nathaniel Mitchell, praying a grant of land for the purpose of making the experiment of extracting turpentine, in profitable abundance, from the pine forest trees bordering on the Gulf of Mexico: referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. MARSHALL of Maine presented the petition of Robert Patterson, and 43 others, ship masters and merchants of Belfast, Maine, for the erection of such beacons, spindles, and buoys, on the Muscle ridges in Penobscot Bay, as will render its navigation more safe.

Also, the petition of George Drinkwater, and 26 others, of Lincolnville, for the same.

Also, the petition of Joseph Jones, and 40 others, of Camden, for the same.

Also, the petition of Andrew Leach, and 61 others, of Prospect, for the same.

Mr. GAMBLE of Georgia rose, and addressed the House as follows:

The present Congress, it is believed, has oftener performed the painful duty of announcing the death of its members, than any which has preceded it under the Government. In the first week of our session, we were called upon to pay the last tribute of respect to the memory of one who died on his way to the seat of Government, to resume his duties as a member of this body; and to-day, the duty has devolved upon me to communicate to the House the mournful intelligence which has reached us, of the death of another member of this branch of the National Legislature. For some time we entertained hopes that the rumor of his death was unfounded; or, at most, premature. But it is at length reduced to painful certainty that RICHARD W. HABERSHAM is no more. He has finished his course on earth; his seat in this hall is vacant; and he now sleeps in the silent tomb. His constitution being naturally feeble, and his health somewhat impaired when he first took his seat as a member of this body—added to the severity of the climate, and his laborious and close attention to his duties, which was more than he was able to endure—brought on a disease, which has only terminated in his death; which painful event, as we are informed, took place at his residence in Habersham county, Georgia, on the second day of this month, surrounded by his family and friends. Mr. HABERSHAM was a descendant of one of the most honorable and distinguished families in Georgia. He was endowed with more than ordinary powers of mind, which was enlarged and cultivated by a liberal education. Being thus qualified, he early engaged in public life, and, by a long course of upright conduct and unbending integrity, he acquired a degree of confidence which few attain, and (what is still more rare) which he never abused. He has occupied stations of honor and trust, both under the Federal and State Governments, the duties of which he discharged to the full requisitions of the law, and entire satisfaction of those with whom he had official transaction.

In 1839 he was elected as a member of Congress, and continued in that character until his death. To you, sir, and his associates here, I need say nothing. You have witnessed his course; you appreciate his worth as a man, and his usefulness as a member of this body. And notwithstanding the political asperity of the times during which he has been a member—and although he has been firm and unwavering in his political course—yet I believe he never indulged in a sentiment, or suffered an expression to escape his lips, at which even the most sensitive political opponent could justly take exception. His errors and infirmities, if any he had—and none are faultless—"were of the head, and not of the heart." He was amiable, generous, and forgiving in his disposition; his home was the centre of kindness and hospitality; and his hand ever open to the calls of charity. It may be said of him, and can with truth be said of him, that he has gone, and left not an enemy behind him. In his lamented death, Georgia has lost one of her most useful, virtuous, and talented citizens—one of her most distinguished, patriotic, and cherished sons; and his family have sustained a loss which cannot be repaired by time. "May that Being who tempers the wind to the shorn lamb," comfort and sustain them in this, their deep affliction; and may this memento of our mortality make a deep and lasting impression upon our hearts, and cause us well to consider the admonition addressed to us in the word of truth, which is enforced by this solemn dispensation—"Be ye also ready, for in such an hour as ye think not the son of man cometh."

Mr. G. then offered the usual resolution, viz: that the members, as a mark of respect for the memory of the deceased, go into mourning, by wearing crape on the left arm for thirty days; which was adopted; and, as an additional mark of respect for his memory,

On motion by Mr. GAMBLE,

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, December 20, 1842.

Mr. BENTON presented a petition from Mary W. Thompson, widow of the late Colonel Thompson, praying compensation for certain military services of her late husband, which remain unpaid: referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MERRICK presented a petition from

John Brosnaugh and Archibald Fleming, praying indemnity for losses sustained in carrying the United States mail, in consequence of the destruction of a part of the Potomac bridge by a freshet: referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. ARCHER presented a petition from Wm. A. Weaver, praying compensation for work done in preparing at the State Department the sixth census of the United States: referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. PORTER presented a petition from the Board of Internal Improvement of the State of Michigan, praying an extension of the time allowed by law for laying down railroad iron imported free of duty: referred to the Committee on Finance.

On motion of Mr. LINN, the petition and papers of John B McKown were ordered to be taken from the files of the Senate, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. L. also presented a memorial from citizens of Platte county, Missouri, praying that a permanent agent might be appointed, to reside at Weston, or some other convenient point in Missouri, for the purpose of purchasing, under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy, such quantity of water-rotted hemp as might be required for the use of the Government: referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. L. also presented a memorial from citizens of Attleborough, Massachusetts, praying that the fine of $1,000 may be refunded to General Jackson: ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. McROBERTS presented a petition from citizens of Illinois, praying the repeal of the bankrupt law: referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. McR. also presented a petition from John Dawson, pension agent, Springfield, Illinois, asking compensation for his services as agent: referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WRIGHT presented a memorial from the Chamber of Commerce of Appalachicola, Florida, praying Congress to make an appropriation for the construction of two new light-houses on that coast, for the accommodation of commerce; and also for the construction of a marine hospital: referred to the Committee on Commerce.

On motion of Mr. CONRAD, the petition and papers of the heirs of Madame De Lusser, for the confirmation of a grant of land in Mobile, were ordered to be taken from the files of the Senate, and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Also, on his motion, leave was granted to withdraw from the files the petition and papers of William Dubuys.

Mr. ALLEN presented a petition from Asahel Brainerd, of Cayuga county, Ohio, for an extension of pension: referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WRIGHT said he some time since presented to the Senate a petition, which was now before the Committee on Claims, from Nimrod Farrow, and Richard Harris, praying compensation for constructing a fort in Mobile bay. He now presented a petition from Israel Ketchum, a sub-contractor under those persons, praying that Congress, in making an appropriation for the purpose, may not disregard the interests of the sub-contractors: referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. BAYARD presented a memorial from the President and Directors of the Bank of the Metropolis, praying that their charter may be modified in such manner as they suggest, and which experience has pointed out to be necessary: referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. B. also presented a petition from Edward Earle, who is desirous that the Government of the United States should purchase the right for using his patent for preserving wood, which he alleges is much better than the present mode of doing it, with corrosive sublimate: referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

On motion of Mr. SMITH of Connecticut, it was ordered that the petition and papers of Wareham Kingsbury, for a pension, be taken from the files of the Senate, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. S. also presented a petition from Hetty Fossett, the widow of John D. Alveys, for a pension: referred to the Committee on Pensions.

On motion of Mr. SEVIER, it was ordered that the petition of Benjamin Murphy be taken from the files, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

BILLS AND REPORTS.

Mr. LINN, on leave, introduced a bill for the relief of the heirs of Nathaniel Pryor, deceased; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Also, on leave, introduced a bill to surrender to the States of Missouri and Arkansas the alternate sections of certain public lands, (reported as not worth the expenses of survey,) for the purpose of increasing the value of the public domain contiguous; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. BERRIEN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which had been referred the petition of Henry Quackenboss and others, reported a bill to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to make an arrangement and compromise with any of the sureties on the bonds of Samuel Swartwout, late collector of the port of New York; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. EVANS, on leave, introduced a bill for the relief of Barbara Spear, the widow of John Spear, late an invalid pensioner; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, on leave, introduced a bill for regulating the currency of foreign gold and silver coin in the United States; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BATES, on leave, introduced a bill making compensation to pension agents; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, on leave, introduced a bill to continue the office of Commissioner of Pensions; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. FULTON, on leave, introduced a bill to authorize the Legislatures of the States of Arkansas, Louisiana, and Tennessee to sell the lands heretofore appropriated for school purposes in those States; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. WALKER, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill to authorize the settlement of the accounts of Joseph Nourse; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana, on leave, introduced a bill to provide for ascertaining and disposing of the lead-mineral lands in the States of Illinois and Missouri, and the Territories of Wisconsin and Iowa, and for other purposes; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. GRAHAM, from the Committee on Claims, reported the following bills; which were read, and ordered to a second reading, viz.

A bill for the relief of J. R. Vienne; and

A bill for the relief of Ephraim B Dixon.

Mr. BATES, on leave, introduced a bill for the relief of Henry Gardner and others, directors of an association called the New England Mississippi Land Company; which was read twice, and referred to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, made an adverse report on the petition of Benjamin Franklin for a privateer pension; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. W. also, from the Committee on Printing, reported in favor of printing the annual report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office; which was concurred in by the Senate; when,

On motion of Mr. SMITH of Indiana, five hundred copies additional of said report were ordered to be printed.

CLAIMANTS.

Mr. HUNTINGTON said he had been requested to move that the memorial and papers of Samuel Brown, late naval officer at Providence, Rhode Island, praying compensation for extra services, be taken from the files of the Senate and referred.

Mr. H. remarked, that a verbal report had been made against the prayer of this petition, and concurred in by the Senate previous to the passage of the rule of the last session, which provided that whenever a claim shall have been reported against, in writing, by either of the standing committees, and the report concurred in by the Senate, it should not be in order to present that claim to the consideration of the Senate, except upon a new petition from the claimant pointing out an error in the decision of the committee, or presenting new evidence in support of the claim. Mr. H. did not know what course to take with reference to this claim, and wished to have the sense of the Senate whether its presentation was admissible under the rule; the report against it being but a verbal one, and that having been made previous to the passage of the rule.

The CHAIR was understood to say that heretofore the rule had been construed as restrospective in its operation; but in this case a further question was presented—whether the rule, which required a written report to be made, should be construed to exclude cases upon which verbal reports only were made.

A discussion here arose, as to the proper construction of the rule, in which Messrs. HUNTINGTON, LINN, KING, CLAYTON, and PHELPS participated, maintaining that the rule was intended to be retrospective in its operation, to prevent the re-presentation of those old cases so frequently reported against; but were willing to make an exception to this case, upon which a verbal report only was made, when a written report was required by the rule.

Mr. GRAHAM said the difficulty could be avoided by admitting this petition by unanimous consent, on the ground of non-compliance with the rule, which required a written report; and then to amend the rule, as suggested by the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. PHELPS,] to make all cases admissible, upon which no written report had been made.

This suggestion was yielded to, and the petition was ordered to be taken from the files, and referred.

Mr. PHELPS submitted the following:

That the rule of the Senate adopted on the 26th of January, 1842, be amended by the following: Provided, That this rule shall not extend to any cases whereon adverse reports, not in writing, may have been made previous to the said 26th day of January, 1842.

This amendment lies over one day, under the rules.

The following resolution of Mr. CONRAD was taken up and adopted, viz:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to communicate to the Senate whether any, and what, amount of money has been refunded to claimants in virtue of the act entitled "An act in relation to lands held in the Greensburg (late St. Helena) district, in the State of Louisiana, and authorizing the resurvey of certain lands in said district," approved August 29, 1842; whether, in any cases, the claimants have received reimbursement of the price paid by them for lands in complying, or offering to comply, with the provisions of said act, and such reimbursement has been refused, and the reasons for such refusal; and whether any, and what, proceedings have taken place under said act.

THE AFRICAN SQUADRON.

The following resolution, submitted by Mr. BENTON some days ago, was taken up for consideration:

Resolved, That the President be requested to inform the Senate whether the quintuple treaty, for the suppression of the slave-trade, has been communicated to the Government of the United States in any form whatever; and, if so, by whom; for what purpose; and what answer may have been returned to such communication. Also, to communicate to the Senate all the information which may have been received by the Government of the United States, going to show that the "course which this Government might take in relation to said treaty has excited no small degree of attention and discussion in Europe." Also, to inform the Senate how far the "warm animadversions," and "the great political excitement" which this treaty has caused in Europe, have any application or reference to these United States. Also, to inform the Senate what danger there was that "the laws and the obligations" of the United States in relation to the suppression of the slave-trade would be "executed by others" if we did not "remove their pretext and motive for violating our flag and executing our laws," by entering into the stipulations for the African squadron, and the remonstrating sentences which are contained in the 8th and 9th articles of the late British treaty. And, also, to communicate to the Senate all the correspondence which may have been received from our ministers abroad, having relation to the foregoing points of inquiry.

Mr. ARCHER inquired if the Senator from Missouri intended to make any remarks on the subject?

Mr. BENTON intimated that he did not conceive any necessary, unless called for in reply.

Mr. ARCHER said he believed he could give the Senator from Missouri all the information that he would be enabled to obtain by the adoption of this resolution. The Senator would perceive, by reference to the message of the President, of August last, communicating the treaty between the United States and Great Britain, that an answer to the first branch of his interrogatories was there given. The President had there declared that the quintuple treaty had not been communicated to this Government by any of the parties to that treaty. It was very true, that the Government of the United States had got information of the character of that treaty, as seemed to be the case with regard to the various Governments of Europe; but it had not yet been officially communicated.

As to the other matters inquired for by the resolution, the same answer would, he thought, equally apply to them. The Government had no other means of obtaining information, than that possessed by the gentleman from Missouri himself. It was within the knowledge of the honorable Senator himself, that—in consequence, perhaps, of the importance of the treaty itself, or, perhaps, in consequence of the attention which had been attracted to it by General Cass—it had become a subject of discussion and of animadversion throughout Europe, as well as the United States.

The next branch of inquiry contained in the resolution, as he (Mr. ARCHER) understood it, was in relation to the opinion which had been expressed by the Executive of the United States as to the course which this Government ought to pursue in reference to the slave-trade. He (Mr. A.) would at least presume that the honorable Senator from Missouri was indifferent, as he himself was, as to the opinions entertained by the President upon this subject; and he would therefore submit to the honorable Senator whether there could be any propriety or necessity for asking these opinions. He would ask, then, inasmuch as there had been no official communication on the subject between this and any foreign Government, wherefore should a call be made for information which could not be rendered? The President had merely expressed an opinion that it was best to execute our own laws, and not submit to the indignity of having them executed for us by other nations.

The Senator from Missouri, he was sure, would concur with him, that as there were no facts in the possession of the Executive, which were not equally in the possession of the Senator himself, there could be no necessity for the resolution of inquiry. He hoped, therefore, the honorable Senator would be willing that the motion which he was now about to make, to lay the resolution upon the table, should prevail.

Mr. BENTON replied to the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. ARCHER,] and said his resolution of inquiry was founded upon the President's message of August last, recommending the ratification of the British treaty; and all the points of inquiry made by him were found in that message. He would have made the call at the last session, when the treaty was ratified; but there was no time for it. The treaty came at the end of a nine months' session, in the midst of the dog-days, and when there was no time for inquiries. But the appropriations for the treaty were still to be made; and the information he wanted, would be used when the supplies for the African squadron were demanded. The message says the quintuple alliance was not officially communicated to the Government. This implies that it was unofficially communicated; and if so, the country ought to know by whom, and for what purpose. The message speaks of our conduct in relation to that treaty, as being the subject of attention and discussion in Europe; and tells us of warm animadversions, and great political excitement, in relation to it. Of course, it is the parties to this quintuple treaty—the holy allies—who are giving us this attention, and making us the subject of this discussion; who bestow this animadversion, and experience this great excitement;—and it is certainly right that the people of the United States should know what all this portends; and how far the affairs of the United States are taken into the keeping of the holy allies. The message also presents, as an argument for the African squadron, that others would execute our laws if we did not; and execute them in a way to violate our flag. This is presented as an argument to operate on the mind of the Senate, in favor of the ratification, when it might be an argument against carrying it into effect; for this country was not to be dragooned into an alliance. The whole case, as made out in the President's message of August last, went to show that the holy allies had taken our conduct into their consideration; and that Great Britain was going to execute our laws for us, if we did not execute them ourselves; and that this squadron and these remonstrating ambassadors were the price which we paid to appease the holy allies, and to escape search from Great Britain. This was the aspect of the message; and he wished to know whether there were facts to justify it. If there were, he thought it a case for resistance, not for submission.

Mr. ARCHER desired to say a single word, in relation to this matter, to the Senator from Missouri, and to the Senate. He presumed no one would contend that it comported with the dignity of that body to make a call upon the Executive for information, when they were sufficiently advised that no information could be obtained. And, to be convinced that none could be obtained, it was only necessary to refer to the message of the President. What, then, was the object of this resolution? Was it a resolution of crimination? The Senator was informed that there had been no communication made to this Government by the parties to the quintuple treaty: how, then, could he expect to obtain the information he asked?

He would put it to the honorable Senator himself, whether it was not just as much within his own knowledge, as within that of the Government, that there had been warm animadversions and strong political excitement throughout Europe in relation to that treaty. It had been in France—one of the greatest nations in the world—a subject of such violent political excitement, that the Government had actually, as he had been informed, determined to renounce all participation in it. Could there be any higher evidence than this that the comments of the President were founded upon the facts connected with this subject? Was there anything more notorious than the high state of political excitement which this very subject had produced in Europe? The President had stated this fact, and given his own opinion upon it. And he (Mr. A.) confessed he thought the honorable Senator from Missouri would have concurred with him in the opinion, that if they were to have laws or provisions formed in reference to their obligations towards other nations, they should at least take upon themselves the execution of those laws. Did the honorable Senator desire to be understood as urging it as a ground of demerit in the President, that he expressed the opinion that we should be the sole executors of our own laws—that we should ourselves give them force and efficacy? Did the mere expression of this abstract opinion involve the inference which the honorable Senator intended to draw, that there had been—what? That there had been efforts on the part of this Government to obtain assistance from other powers in the execution of our own laws? There was not the least ground for such a presumption.

How could the Government, by any possibility, furnish the evidence demanded by the honorable Senator, when they were told by the Executive that he had had no negotiations upon the subject with any power whatever? There being, then, no information in the possession of the Government going to answer the inquiry contained in the resolution, he would submit to the honorable Senator whether it was fit that they should send a criminatory or a vindictive resolution to the President. He would put it to the honorable Senator, if it was really information that he sought. The honorable Senator knew full well there was no information that he could receive. His object, then, with all due respect to the honorable Senator, he (Mr. A.) must suppose was merely to utter a denunciation against the Executive. This being his view of the case, he felt bound to move that the resolution be laid upon the table.

Mr. KING suggested that it would be better to postpone its consideration, and, in the mean time, order it to be printed.

Mr. ARCHER said he intended no discourtesy towards any honorable Senator; and if any one desired to discuss the resolution further, he would withdraw the motion.

Mr. BENTON observed that he wanted the information, not for crimination, but for use on the discussion of the appropriation. Everything in relation to the origin and cause of this African squadron would then be wanting; for he, for one, meant to resist the appropriations for this African crusade. He said the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. ARCHER] was mistaken in supposing that he wanted the opinions of the Administration. Not so. He had their opinions in the August message; and he wished to see whether they had any facts for the opinions they then delivered. He wished to see if the holy allies were animadverting upon us, and whether Great Britain intended to search our ships if we did not join her in the African alliance. This seemed to be the opinion of the Administration; and Mr. B. wished to see if they had any foundation for it. With this view, he called for all the information they possessed, and especially for the correspondence of our ministers abroad. He felt certain that those ministers must have written on the subject. It could not be supposed that the President had founded his communication to the Senate on coffee-house discussions, or on newspaper discussions, or even on the debates of the French Chambers: there was nothing in all that to alarm us, or to show that the holy allies were occupying themselves with our affairs. The President must have had official correspondence on the subject, even if he had no official communication of the treaty: and he wished to see that correspondence. He had a right to see it, and should insist upon his right.

Mr. B. then read the paragraphs from the President's message of August last; and argued that every inquiry was bottomed upon the message, and proper for the information of Congress and the country. The paragraphs were as follows:

"It is known that, in December last, a treaty was signed in London, by the representatives of England, France, Russia, Prussia, and Austria, having for its professed object a strong and united effort of the five powers to put an end to the traffic. This treaty was not officially communicated to the Government of the United States; but its provisions and stipulations are supposed to be accurately known to the public. It is understood to be not yet ratified on the part of France.

"No application or request has been made to this Government to become party to this treaty; but the course it might take in regard to it, has excited no small degree of attention and discussion in Europe, as the principle upon which it is founded, and the stipulations which it contains, have caused warm animadversions and great political excitement.

"In my message at the commencement of the present session of Congress, I endeavored to state the principles which this Government supports respecting the right of search and the immunity of flags. Desirous of maintaining those principles fully, at the same time that existing obligations should be fulfilled, I have thought it most consistent with the honor and dignity of the country that it should execute its own laws, and perform its own obligations by its own means and its own power. The examination or visitation of the merchant vessels of one nation, by the cruisers of another, for any purpose, except those known and acknowledged by the law of nations, under whatever restraints or regulations it may take place, may lead to dangerous results. It is far better, by other means, to supersede any supposed necessity, or any motive, for such examination or visit. Interference with a merchant vessel by an armed cruiser, is always a delicate proceeding, apt to touch the point of national honor, as well as to affect the interests of individuals. It has been thought, therefore, expedient, not only in accordance with the stipulations of the treaty of Ghent, but, at the same time, as removing all pretext on the part of others for violating the immunities of the American flag upon the seas, as they exist and are defined by the law of nations, to enter into the articles now submitted to the Senate.

Mr. B. said these paragraphs presented grave matter for the consideration of the Congress and the country. They were gravely presented to the Senate, to influence its action on the treaty; and, from the case which they present, it is perfectly clear that this squadron is our tribute in men and ships to appease the holy allies, and to prevent Great Britain from searching us. It is clear, from these paragraphs, that this five years' alliance is the price which we pay for these favors. Now, it might or it might not be so. In either event, we have a right to know; and in either event, the administration is on the horn of a dilemma. If the holy allies and Great Britain are going to take us in hand if we do not give them this squadron, then it was cowardice and national degradation to give it. If, on the other hand, the holy allies have no designs upon us, and Great Britain has no design to search us, if we do not search ourselves, then the Senate has been trifled with, and considerations brought to bear upon them which have no foundation in fact. In either case, we have a right to know the facts. Has Great Britain threatened us? Have the holy allies taken our conduct in hand? These are the questions which arise on the President's message; and let us have them answered. Let us have the correspondence of our ministers, if there is any. Does the Senator from Virginia undertake to say for the administration, that they have no such correspondence? [Mr. ARCHER was understood to answer negatively.] Then let the administration answer! As the case now stands, we have given this squadron under a threat—under the threat of seeing Great Britain execute our anti-slave-trade laws for us, if we do not execute them ourselves; upon the same principle that she executes our neutrality laws for us on the Canadian frontier. The excuse—no, not the excuse! for she does not descend to excuse, but boldly justifies!—the justification for the attack on the Caroline was, that the United States did not, or could not, execute its own laws on that frontier; and, therefore, Great Britain was under the necessity of executing them for us. This is the language with respect to the Canada frontier; and, from the tenor of the message, we have the same language in relation to the coast of Africa. By land and by water—at home and abroad—Great Britain undertakes to execute our laws for us, and to punish our citizens for us! and, from the termination of the Schlosser affair, add this African tribute in men and ships, it seems that the present Administration admits her pretension in both cases. But, let us see. Let us have the facts—the correspondence; and let the country judge whether we have really been menaced, or whether our Administration have taken fright at nothing.

Mr. ARCHER assenting to the suggestion of postponing the resolution to Thursday, on motion to that effect, the resolution was postponed to Thursday next, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CRITTENDEN observed that there was a bill, which the House had passed, now on the table awaiting the action of the Senate. He hoped there would be no objection to taking it up with a view to reference.

No objection being made, the bill in relation to the lands granted to the deaf and dumb asylum in the State of Kentucky (amendatory of the law) was taken up, read twice, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WRIGHT offered the following resolution; which lies on the table one day:

Resolved, That the Committee on Retrenchment be instructed to require and report to the Senate the number of clerks of committees who have been appointed and paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate, during the last and present Congress; the amount so paid to such clerks, and the rate of compensation; and whether any, and what, other mode can, in the opinion of the committee, be adopted, by which a more general, and equal, and effectual aid to all the committees of the Senate may be secured in a more reasonable form, and on more economical terms.

The joint resolution of the House to amend the 19th joint rule was then taken up; and, on motion of Mr. BARROW to that effect, laid on the table.

Mr. HUNTINGTON said there was an engrossed bill on the table, which might be taken up and disposed of in a few moments; as he did not suppose there would be any discussion or opposition in relation to it. It was the bill ordered to be engrossed yesterday, changing the name of a vessel from "Westchester" to "Atlantic."

The bill was taken up, read a third time, and passed.

A communication from the Treasury Department was then read, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. SEVIER moved an adjournment.

Mr. HUNTINGTON said it was desirable the Senate should go into executive session for a few moments.

The motion to adjourn was negatived—ayes 12, noes 15.

The Senate then, on motion of Mr. HUNTINGTON, went into executive session; and after a short time spent therein,

Adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, December 20, 1842.

Mr. EASTMAN presented the petition of Hillyard Shaw, for a pension.

Also, the petition of Charles Colman for bounty land or other remuneration.

Also, the petition of Moses Turner for arrears of pension; which were severally referred to their appropriate committees.

Mr. CASEY presented the petition of J. Childers of Lawrence county, Illinois, praying an increase of pension; which, on his motion, was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.

Mr. BARTON presented the petition of numerous citizens of Hampshire county, Virginia, praying for a repeal of the bankrupt law.

Mr. LOWELL presented the petitions of John N. Swasey, and 28 other shipmasters and merchants of Bucksport, Maine; of Andrew Peters, and 34 other shipmasters and merchants of Ellsworth, Maine; and of James S. Pike, and 29 other shipmasters and merchants of Calais, Maine: all praying for an appropriation for the erection of beacons, spindles, and buoys on the Muscle ridges upon the coast of Maine; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

MUTINY AND EXECUTIONS ON BOARD THE BRIG SOMERS.

Mr. GWIN asked the permission of the House to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to this House whatever official information may have been received at the Navy Department relative to the alleged design of mutiny on board the United States brig Somers, under the command of Alexander Slidell McKenzie; and what number of persons have been executed for said offence; their names and rank; and the proceedings which were had on board of said vessel in reference thereto.

Mr. WISE suggested to the gentleman from Mississippi, that, as a court of inquiry was to be called, from which official information would be received in a very few weeks, it would be better to postpone his resolution until the court had been held.

Mr. GWIN intimated his intention to press his resolution, that the necessary information might be got from the President.

Mr. WISE said the gentleman could not obtain any information in that way.

Mr. L. W. ANDREWS and other gentlemen made remarks which did not reach the reporter's desk.

Mr. GWIN moved a suspension of the rules for the reception of his resolution, to which objection had been made.

The motion was negatived.

THE BANKRUPT LAW.

Mr. FILLMORE moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole, for the purpose of proceeding with the consideration of the general appropriation bill.

Mr. HOPKINS inquired if the bill for the repeal of the bankrupt law was not the special order for this day.

The SPEAKER replied in the negative; the bill having been merely postponed to this day.

Mr. HOPKINS called for the yeas and nays on going into committee.

Mr. H. observed that he supposed, if the House refused to go into committee, it would be in order to move to take up the bill to repeal the bankrupt law.

The SPEAKER was understood to reply in the affirmative.

The yeas and nays were then ordered, and, being taken, resulted as follows: Yeas 89, nays 98.

So the House refused to go into Committee of the Whole.

Mr. EVERETT then moved that the House take up the bill to repeal the bankrupt law.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. EVERETT then briefly stated some reasons which had prompted his action in this matter, but in so low a tone of voice, and amidst a deafening hum throughout the House, which overpowered the honorable gentleman's voice. He was understood to say that he voted for the bankrupt law when it was passed, for the relief of bankrupts whose misfortunes were brought upon them without any fault of their own, but by the fault of the Government. His object, then, was to relieve the country from the distresses in which it was then involved; but he did not, so far as he was concerned, design it to be a permanent measure. He was in favor of limiting it to one year at the time of its passage; but he did not press his views on that point at that time, because he desired the passage of the law, and such a limitation might have endangered its passage. He now offered this bill for the repeal of the bankrupt law, because he conceived it to be destroying confidence between man and man; and seemed to be a shelter for those who were disposed to live without labor. Its future operation he looked upon as injurious; and it would be difficult to engraft any amendment upon the present act which would diminish its evils. He said he did not propose to commit this bill, because he was in favor of a total repeal of the bankrupt law; and therefore its committal was unnecessary. If, however, such a motion should be made, he should consider it a test question between those who desired the continuance, and those who desired the repeal of that law.

Mr. BARNARD observed that the fate of the 27th Congress seemed to be a very peculiar and a very hard one. This Congress was composed of two parties; the lines of difference between which were drawn, perhaps, more distinctly than between any two parties that ever existed in this country. One of these parties was in a decided majority of that House—numbering some thirty or forty votes of a majority. The executive power of the country also was in the hands of one holding opinions in accordance with those of the majority. Before the meeting of Congress, however, for the first time for the transaction of business, after its election, misfortune had fallen upon the dominant party; they lost their own President, and the constitutional incumbent of the Presidential office was not disposed to act in accordance with the majority. A portion, also, of their own friends in the House of Representatives, departed from them, and joined themselves with the Executive, who was of course supported by the whole body of the opposition. In that way, and under those circumstances, we came (said Mr. B.) to the transaction of the public business. We struggled with difficulties from the first moment of our existence, and have never ceased to struggle with difficulties to this day. Our condition was like that of the poor wretch Sysiphus—condemned to roll an enormous stone up a steep acclivity, only to find some obstacle in our way, by which our labors and ourselves were to be tumbled down to the bottom again. But all this (said Mr. B.) was our misfortune, and not our fault; and amidst all our difficulties we certainly succeeded in passing some good measures. At the extra session we passed the law distributing the proceeds of the public lands among the States, and we passed the bankrupt law. At the last session, we passed the districting law, and we also passed the tariff law. What was to remain of all these, and many other measures, at the close of the constitutional term of existence of the present Congress, no man could tell. One thing was sure—the land-distribution law was gone already; the congressional districting law was in danger; while the tariff law was proposed to be moderated and modified out of all its protective character; and now, at last, came the bill to repeal the bankrupt law—moved, too, by one of the original friends of that measure. For one, (said Mr. B.) I could stand all the injuries our enemies are doing us; but it is hard to receive such blows at the hands of our friends. What an extraordinary spectacle (said Mr. B.) do we now present to the American people! This motion for a repeal of the bankrupt law came from Vermont, and from his excellent and learned friend from that State, [Mr. EVERETT,] who took the pains to declare, at this and at the last session of Congress, that, upon the whole, the bankrupt act was the best and wisest law that Congress had ever passed. Now, it was to be repealed upon the motion of the very gentleman who had made this eulogium. Considering the source from which that motion emanated, and considering the sort of support which it was about to receive, it struck his mind as one of the most alarming movements he had ever witnessed in the political world. It went far to prove the truth of the charge so often made against this nation—that its legislation was destined to be unstable; not guided and governed, as it ought to be, by the settled, well-considered, well-digested opinions of the people of the country; but that it was destined to be disturbed by every wave of popular sentiment—to follow, in short, not only the shiftings and turnings of popular sentiment, but popular error and popular delusion. That such a thing as popular error and popular delusion existed, as well in this country as in others, he was not afraid or ashamed to say. By unsettled, ill-digested popular opinion, he never had been—and so help him God!—never would be governed.

But Vermont demanded the repeal of the bankrupt law; and, therefore, it was to be repealed. Vermont was a creditor State—she was in the happy condition of owing nobody, and everybody was indebted to her; and her Legislature, at its last session, passed a resolution instructing her Senators, and requesting her Representatives, in Congress, to procure the repeal of that law. He denied the right of Vermont to dictate to Congress upon this subject, or upon any other. She might express her opinions, it was true; but the opinions that governed here were those of the members of the National Legislature, and not those of the members of her State Legislature. He was utterly hostile to this doctrine of instruction, let it come from what source it might, avowed or not avowed. What security was there for legislation, if the representatives of a State—the very same men—were to be governed one day by one set of opinions, and another day by another, just as the waves of popular sentiment ebbed and flowed. Vermont did not, it seemed, like to see her debtors escape, and, in common with almost all other creditors, she had a very great reluctance to see the dead body o debt buried out of her sight. Well, this might be a very natural feeling; but it was a morbid one, which ought not to be encouraged. Creditors were not buzzards, to feed on carrion; and he did not want to see these dead bodies kept above ground till they tainted the whole atmosphere.

He had remarked that he could not see any security for legislation in the country, unless party and party men were to be precluded from influencing it to suit their temporary purposes. If they could not be, then the legislation of the country would be blown about by every popular gale. Unless the Representatives would abide by their own opinions after having once promulgated them, he was free to declare that there could be no stability in the policy of the country.

But his excellent friend from Vermont [Mr. EVERETT] had discovered that the bankrupt law had performed its office; that it had fulfilled its objects, and therefore ought to be repealed. He further avowed, that it was his opinion at the time the act was passed, that it should have been limited to the term of one year; that it ought to be a temporary law. What was a temporary law? What was it but repudiation in its most odious form—repudiation by individuals of their own debts at their own time; a proclamation by debtors of a jubilee—not like that of the Jews, which occurring at regular and stated periods, creditors as well as debtors could prepare themselves for—but a jubilee the time of which was to be prescribed by the debtors themselves. Such a bankrupt law was not the establishment of a rule of law; it was the establishment of an exception to a rule of law, in the face of the law itself. It was a law by which you open the prison doors, and let loose those confined at the moment; though at the next day the jails may be as full as ever—and of those, too, who are not to be set at liberty. Was that a bankrupt law in the understanding of the Constitution? The Constitution authorized Congress to pass uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcy: but could a law of a year's duration be called a uniform law? It was not law, because it was not a rule of conduct affecting all alike; but it was a mere partial arbitrary act of arbitrary power, interposing between the creditor and his debtor, to break up for the time being the relations between them, and to take away the power which the law gave the former over the latter. In this way, the creditor, in his turn, might be ruined and driven to bankruptcy; though, in consequence of the temporary nature of the law, he would be precluded from its benefits. Mr. B. said he denied the power of Congress to pass any such law. It had the power to pass a permanent and uniform law, and he admitted that it had the power to repeal it; but it had no power to pass a bankrupt law that was not permanent and uniform. Such a bankrupt law as was contemplated by the Constitution would have the tendency to prevent bankruptcy; but a temporary law, such as was contemplated by the gentleman from Vermont, would have the tendency to encourage bankruptcy, and to encourage extravagance and speculation, by the hope held out that a proclamation of jubilee would be made to free debtors for the time being from the power of their creditors.

If, then, this bankrupt law was to be repealed, let it be because it was inexpedient; because, such a law ought never to have been passed; but, for Heaven's sake, do not let it be repealed on the ground that it has accomplished the object for which it was enacted.

Mr. B. said he had no manner of doubt but that very much of the influence which was abroad in the country, and was brought to bear on the House at the time the bankrupt law was passed, was that of individuals, who, if they did not then hold the sentiments advanced now by his friend from Vermont, were yet willing to receive the benefits of them; in other words, they were willing that a temporary law should be passed to relieve them from their embarrassments, to be repealed or to expire at the time they came to be creditors. He prayed and besought gentlemen, therefore, if they meant to vote for the repeal, to put their votes on better grounds than those of his friend from Vermont. Let the law be repealed, if it is to be repealed, because it is a bad law; but do not let it be repealed because it was intended as a temporary measure, and because it has fulfilled its objects.

But why should the bankrupt law be repealed? He addressed himself to those who had been its friends. What was the greatest objection to the measure, in the minds of intelligent men, at the time of its passage? Was it not because of its retrospective operation, violating, in their opinions, one of the provisions of the Constitution, by impairing the obligation of contracts? That objection was now almost removed. The force of the bankrupt law in regard to old cases was almost spent; and it was now about to commence its most wholesome and beneficent functions, by operating on cases which have arisen since its enactment. The constitutional objection was, therefore, no longer in force.

After some further remarks from Mr. B., showing the benefits derived, and to be derived, from the bankrupt act, he concluded by moving to commit the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary, with instructions to bring in a bill to repeal that part of the law providing for voluntary bankruptcy, and to provide that this shall take place in 18 months from the passage of the act.

Mr. B. said the House was aware that, in the other branch of Congress, a resolution had been adopted calling upon the Secretary of State for information in relation to this subject; and he hoped that the House would wait till that information was received, and not, by precipitate legislation, run the risk of committing an act of cruelty and injustice.

Mr. C. J. INGERSOLL said he should like to move the adoption of instructions to the committee, in case the bill were referred to their consideration. He, therefore, sent to the Chair the following instructions:

"And that the said committee be instructed to report a bill excluding the voluntary provision from the present bankrupt act, and including banks."

Mr. BARNARD inquired whether the motion was in order; to which

The SPEAKER replied in the affirmative.

Mr. C. J. INGERSOLL modified his instructions, by striking out the word banks, and substituting the words trading corporations.

Mr. WINTHROP said that, however calculated the motion was to produce a wide discussion, he had a strong presentiment that the present debate would not be long. It seemed that summary execution was to be applied to this, the last act of that ill-fated extra session. Its sentence had been pronounced before arguments at law; judgment was to be first carried out, and a hearing had afterwards. Indeed, he feared that there was an impatience and an indisposition to hear at all, either before or after judgment. For himself, he had no disposition to speak at length; for the subject had already been nearly exhausted by the remarks of his friend from New York, [Mr. BARNARD;] nor would he impugn the course taken by his friend from Vermont, [Mr. EVERETT,] who no doubt acted from a sense of duty to his constituents. He only wished to explain simply the reasons which should induce him to vote against the repeal of this law, representing as he did a great commercial community.

The power of Congress to enact a bankrupt law was not implied merely, but was found in the category of those clearly expressed and enumerated powers about which there was no dispute. Now, he held it to be the duty of Congress to exercise its power; and not to exercise it, a positive neglect and omission—not less than it would be to omit to exercise the power given to regulate commerce, establish courts, coin money, provide for the common defence of the country, and, in short, any other power expressed among those named in the Constitution. He was aware that it had been suggested by his friend from Vermont, [Mr. EVERETT,] that though the present law might be repealed, another might be enacted. But when would such an event occur? When could it be expected? Certainly not until it should be called for by the people, to sweep off the load of indebtedness that might be upon them; and then the law would itself be swept off, after having performed its office. Such was the fate of the first bankrupt law, and such seemed to be the inevitable destiny of this.

But the language of the Constitution was remarkably strong. It was, not that "Congress shall have power to pass," but to "establish a uniform system of bankruptcy." Would a mere passage of an act be a fulfilment of the power to establish the system? So far from it, the reverse of the proposition would be true; and such passage be a mere temporary remedy. Such a course—the enactment of a bankrupt law for a particular temporary purpose—could be justified on no principle whatever. He, therefore, protested against the introduction of a bankrupt law at irregular intervals, and before the trader and the man of business could be aware how to act. Anticipating the results which had flowed from the insertion of the retrospective principle in the present act, he had voted for it with reluctance; and, had he believed that the whole act was destined to be so soon expunged from the statute-book, he should not have voted for it at all. And here he would make a suggestion to that gentleman, who had denounced the retrospective character of the act; and that was, that, by voting for the repeal of the law at the present time, they would become responsible for its revival hereafter. The only mode of preventing the enactment of a retrospective law was to establish the prospective provision of the present law upon a firm basis. True, the present law might not be perfect, and might require remedy in its details. What he had to say was, let it be perfected; let it be limited in its operation to traders, if necessary; and even let a provision be inserted comprehending banks, under certain circumstances and regulations. It did seem to him that the responsibility of the enactment of a retrospective bankrupt act hereafter would rest on those gentlemen who should vote for, the repeal of the present.

There was one more view of the subject which he would mention. He meant the monstrous injustice of an immediate and unconditional repeal of the law. It was known that many debtors, responding, as had been said, to the first sound of the trumpet, had advanced and obtained relief, having first stripped themselves for the purpose, and leaving as little matter to be decided upon by the courts as effects to be distributed among the creditors. A repeal of the law would not take away the benefits these men had obtained, whilst it would give the same desperate debtors the further advantage of any new bankrupt law which might be enacted hereafter. On the other hand, there were numbers whose affairs, not altogether hopeless, left the prospect of distributing something to their creditors—men whose applications for the benefit of the act had been held back, in the hope of making an honorable compromise; or whose cases had been delayed in the courts by argument upon points of law: these would be altogether deprived of the advantages secured by more expeditious, and perhaps less scrupulous, debtors. In conclusion, he hoped—if it was not too late to hope—that the House would pause before it resolved to wipe out altogether the law now in force.

Mr. PAYNE remarked that one of the strongest objections which he had to the passage of this act, was its retrospective character. He was not fully persuaded that the Government had power to pass a law absolving individuals from their contracts. He could not believe it to be legal and proper for the Government to destroy the relations subsisting between debtor and creditor. Government, as he thought, should at least have permitted the obligations between the creditor and his security to be performed.

These were some of his objections to the law at the beginning; but, with regard to a prospective bankrupt law, properly established, he did not then, nor did he now, object. All objections, however, were disregarded by those who controlled the action of this House; and a uniform system of bankruptcy, to be perpetual as the law of the country, was passed; and this was the first time that the avowal had been made—as it had been made this morning—that the object of the bankrupt law was to violate private contracts, and to turn men loose from their obligations. It was immaterial how they regarded it here; but the eyes of all the commercial world were turned upon them; and to Europe it would appear that they repealed the law, after it had done—what? Released at least the debtor from the obligation of his contracts. It appeared to him this proposition portrayed, more clearly than anything else could do, the true object the gentlemen who advocated it had in pressing it on the country. Now, if he might be permitted to advise those gentlemen who passed this law, he should say: For Heaven's sake, do not lay it on this exclusive ground—that the object was to release the debtor from the obligation of his contract, for which he had received a valuable consideration.

He would declare again, that, if a bankrupt law were established, striking out the voluntary feature, and making it such a bankrupt law as was contemplated by the Constitution, he should not object to see it become part of the permanent policy of our country. But if they voted for the bill which was now presented to the House, for the repeal of the existing bankrupt law, they would commit themselves with regard to the constitutionality of the whole measure. The proviso was designed to secure to those who had taken the first step, the benefit of the existing bankrupt law up to the 5th of the present month; and when this bill was introduced, he gave notice that he should move to strike out that proviso; but he was conscious of the great difficulty which must result. There was much force in what had been said by gentlemen on this subject, respecting the indecent haste of bankrupts to avail themselves of the law, to release them from their obligations; whereas those who were less hasty, and who regretted the necessity to avail themselves of the provisions of the law, and therefore held back, were to be deprived of the benefits of the law. There were difficulties, too, in the way of their voting for this bill to repeal the bankrupt law, with such a provision as would compromise them on the constitutional question which it involved; and the whole case afforded a striking illustration of the evil of that hasty legislation which was forced on the country without consideration by the operation of the gag rule, which did not permit an i to be dotted, or a t to be crossed. Under all the circumstances, he did not know that he could go for the repeal, as the bill now stood; for he was unwilling to commit himself with regard to the constitutional question.

He had another remark to make, in relation to the instructions. It had been his determination in all his acts, while he was a member of that body, to give no vote which, in his opinion, would tend to increase the power of this Government, or the Executive patronage of this Government. Every vote he did give would be to diminish rather than to increase that power. Suppose, then, they placed all the banking institutions of the country under the operation of the bankrupt law; why, an Executive, who was disposed to do so, might use the power of this Government for the punishment, on the one hand, and his influence to excite hope of reward, on the other; or, every bank would be placed at the foot of the Executive, to aid him in carrying out his plans. Were he disposed to strike directly at the principle by which he had governed his legislative action, he should give the Executive this power. He trusted, therefore, that the proposition would be either amended, or laid on the table; but if, on the contrary, it were attached to this bill, the bankrupt law would never be repealed. There was one fact, in connexion with the discussions which had already been had on this subject, to which he was inclined to call the attention of the House; but he declined doing so, because it verified a prediction which had been made again and again with regard to the Whig Congress. This bankrupt law was a Whig measure. It originated with the Whigs; it was passed by Whigs. He was not sure, but he did not believe there was more than one solitary Democratic member that voted for it. And what were they now told? Why, that this Whig measure—a measure conceived, brought forth, and carried into a law by Whigs, to relieve the country, had done—what? Destroyed all confidence between man and man, and had broken down the credit of the country. This was the character given of it by the gentleman from Vermont.

Mr. EVERETT explained.

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman then said, if it had not done all these things, that it was in a state of progression; and if they permitted it to remain, it would break down the credit of the country, and destroy confidence between man and man. Such was the result of one of the important measures which were passed by the 27th Congress; and in view of this, and other acts, there was one circumstance which appeared to be a little remarkable: the President was blamed for the application of his vetoes, and for not permitting the Whigs to do all that which they desired to do—for not permitting the majority in this Congress to do all that they pleased; and he was still blamed. It was not his place to blame or to defend the President; but justice ought to be done, and he would, therefore, say they ought not to blame the President for not permitting more wrongdoing than that which it was now admitted they had done.

Mr. GORDON addressed the House in favor of the repeal of the law. He commenced by remarking that, in the discussions upon the measure, when it passed at the extra session, it was said that it would be hailed as a public jubilee. Recollecting this remark, he did not expect so early to have heard it said by a member of the House—and a member, too, of that very majority who passed the act—that it was intended as a permanent measure. He had himself supposed that the law had its inception, and would have its consummation in a desire to relieve debtors from the embarrassments into which they were, for the time being, plunged; and was only such a measure as would be passed, at intervals, to fulfil the end named. But it seemed he was mistaken; and now, the only ground on which the law was at all justified was taken away. As to his own position, that was the same now as at the extra session—a firm opposition to the measure on account of its unconstitutionality, as well as on account of considerations of its injustice.

The fate of the measure, as the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WINTHROP] had said, was settled. Its end was at hand. Its decree of repeal had been borne on the wings of popular sentiment and indignation. The work only remained to be done. He could not see how his colleague [Mr. BARNARD] could have been brought to declare that it was a want of reflection in the people to decree the repeal of the measure: at which he was astonished! Surely his colleague could not have perceived how, by this remark, he was impugning the intelligence of the people. His colleague had set himself up to contradict the public voice for demanding the repeal of this measure! and did not this amount to a declaration that the people knew not what they were about? Such was, in fact, the averment which his colleague had made; yet he (Mr. G.) was not surprised at the remark, when he recollected that his colleague belonged to that party which had no confidence in the people, and which believed them to be incapable of self-government.

Here Mr. ARNOLD rose, and inquired whether a single petition for the repeal of the bankrupt act had been presented this session.

Mr. GORDON said this question reminded him of a fact, which he often observed—that there were many men who could not or would not understand what public sentiment was, in relation to a particular measure, until they had read it in a petition. Now, these petitions, it was well known, were often gotten up to order, and therefore entitled to no moral influence. Public sentiment upon a measure like the present was overpowering; and a miserable petition would but ill embody its force and omnipotence. In reply, however, to the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. ARNOLD,] he would state that petitions had been sent here to obtain the repeal of this measure. But whether they had or not, every man of ordinary sagacity and observation knew what public sentiment was upon this question. He was glad to find that even the gentleman from Vermont had bowed down before this public sentiment, and had determined to vote for the repeal.

Mr. EVERETT rose, and was understood to say that his determination arose from a change of his opinions, rather than from considerations growing out of any supposed state of public sentiment.

Mr. GORDON said he was then glad to hear that the gentleman had changed his opinion. His added but another to the general voice that the law was a bad one.

But his colleague [Mr. BARNARD] had complained of the instability of legislation in this country, and had charged that the repeal of the law would tend still further to sink our reputation in that respect. In reply, he would remark that all bad laws, like this bankrupt act, did most effectually contribute to instability of legislation; because, in a country where the people's wishes were consulted, such laws were certain to be expunged from the statute-book. Yet he would leave it to the common sense of any man to say whether this was a reason why a bad law should not be repealed. If Congress would confine itself to its legitimate sphere of action, standing upon the broad platform of the Constitution, and only enacting such measures as were called for by the people, there would be no reason for his colleague to complain of instability of legislation.

But his colleague had also complained of popular error and delusion in relation to this law. Now, he could tell his colleague how the people had come to be so sadly in "error and delusion." They had employed their "sober second thought" upon the bankrupt act, and their verdict against it was another instance to show how correct are the ultimate decisions of the people in regard to matters of government. They had determined, after the full and free exercise of this sober second thought, to be no longer under the same "populas error and delusion" as in 1840. Although his colleague complained of the delusion of the people, it had always happened that he was with them when they were deluded, and against them when restored to their senses, [Laughter—"Good!"] Such a delusion existed in 1840 as had never before, and he trusted never would again.

His colleague had said that party lines were never so strictly drawn as at the commencement of the present Congress—as if, forsooth, there ever were but two parties in the country; and as if the Whig party of 1840 was any other but the old Federal party. Now was the time, he (Mr. G.) thought, when party lines were tightly drawn. The laxity and the delusion of 1840 had passed away; and the drawing of party lines tight again shows the Democratic majority in the country. That majority would soon be called upon to act; and they would, he imagined, proceed to legislate for the country according to their well-known principles and their settled and unchanging creed.

But his colleague argued, that to repeal the bankrupt law at this time would place the majority in a ridiculous attitude before the people. To this remark he could not agree; on the contrary, he thought that a repeal would show that the present majority were willing to shake off the attitude of ridicule in which they already stood before the whole country. Had the dominant party been content to let well enough alone—to let the sub-treasury remain in force, and to have passed no laws whatever, except moderate appropriation bills—they would stand much higher before the country. As they had not done this, they might even now acknowledge their errors and repent. They would, at least, get credit before the world for a high-toned magnanimity. Indeed, he thought the people were forgiving in their disposition, and might even be persuaded to pardon them for their many offences. He was, however, strongly inclined to doubt if the present generation would ever put them in power again, after having once been so grossly deceived. Whilst, then, he was assuring his Whig friends of forgiveness, he must take leave to tell them that they were doomed to wait until a new generation should have come upon the stage, ere they could play the same high tricks over again. [Laughter.] His colleague had said that it would require much courage to vote against the repeal of the bankrupt act, in the present state of public opinion. He admitted the truth of the remark; and, as a friend near him suggested, it would require brandy-and-water courage—or, mayhap, delirium tremens—to bring them up to the sticking point. [Laughter.] Whatever might be the condition and quantity of their courage, he was apprehensive that his colleague would find a majority of his friends unwilling to vote against the repeal of this measure.

Again: his colleague had said that, in a commercial community like ours, it was impossible to get along well without a bankrupt law. Now he (Mr. G.) declared, on the other hand, it was impossible for a commercial community like ours to get along with such a bankrupt law as this; and there he was at issue with his colleague. The repeal of the law, he predicted, would be followed by a brisker state of trade and increased life and enterprise in every commercial circle. Capital, now hidden and hoarded, from want of confidence, would come out, and do its good office in stimulating business.

But such a state of things would never occur until the manifestation of a disposition to preserve the inviolability of contracts should have taken place. It was his conviction that this bankrupt law had done more against our credit in Europe than repudiation itself. Repudiation only operated on large capitalists and fundmongers; but the bankrupt act levelled a deadly blow at manufacturers and dealers of every description. The business operations of these were great, compared with that of the mere money-lenders.

In conclusion, he would say a few words in reply to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. WINTHROP,] whose example he should endeavor to follow, deeming that short speeches, and to the point, were the best. That gentleman seemed to lay particular emphasis upon the circumstance that the Constitution gave Congress the power to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy. Did it, he would ask, follow, that because the power was given, therefore it must be exercised? Had the gentleman's studies in constitutional law only taught him that every power conveyed by an instrument must be used? Such a doctrine, to be exposed, needed only to be stated.

But the gentleman had complained of the injustice of an immediate repeal, arguing that, as many had already taken advantage of the law, it would be unjust to slight others who were more tardy, but were preparing to reap the harvest of its provisions. This appeared to him like saying that because ten thousand debtors have plundered their creditors without conscience, therefore the law should be kept in operation for the purpose of allowing still more to do the same! He was, however, not entirely surprised at this doctrine, when he recollected that in the hard-cider campaign it was held out to a large class that the consequence of a Whig triumph would be the expunging of their debts. Seeing this tendency of the law was the main reason with the people for demanding its immediate repeal, he thought that those who advocated a postponement of the repeal thought more of their political consistency than of advancing the public interests.

Mr. WELLER then called for the yeas and nays on the question; which were ordered.

Mr. ARNOLD inquired if the instructions could be divided; and, being answered by the Speaker in the affirmative, called for a division, so as to take the question first on the first clause.

Mr. CUSHING doubted whether a division of the question was in order; and called upon the Clerk to read the instructions again, to see if there were two distinct substantive propositions in it; which was done.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON then, after a few remarks, moved the previous question, in order to cut off the motion to commit, and to bring the House to a direct vote on the bill.

The question on seconding the previous question was then taken by tellers—Messrs. BOWNE and MATHIOT—and lost; there being only 46 votes in the affirmative.

So the House refused to second the call for the previous question.

The question recurring on Mr. INGERSOLL's motion to amend the motion to commit with instructions—

Mr. CUSHING obtained the floor, and was about addressing the committee, when repeated cries of "Question, question," were heard; and he took his seat, saying that if the committee were ready to take the question then, he would forego his remarks.

Mr. ARNOLD moved to strike out that part of the instructions relating to voluntary bankrupts, so that the instructions would read "to report a bankrupt bill including corporations not owned by States."

Mr. BOWNE desired to know whether the amendment, as it then read, would repeal the law now in force. It struck him that it would not—that the effect of it would be to bring in a new bankrupt law, without repealing the old one. He would not have troubled the House with any remarks, but, from the fear that the incipient steps just taken towards the repeal of this act would not result as the mover contemplated. He would not say that the gentleman who moved these instructions intended thereby to impede the passage of the bill before them, or to prevent the passage of any similar bill during the session; but he feared that such would be the effect of the motion, if it prevailed. Every member on that floor understood well what was the will of the whole country, as well as that of his constituents, in relation to this question. It had been long before the public; and the public mind, having weighed it in the balance, had, as far as he could understand it, declared it had been found wanting. He was ready to act on it now, though he confessed he would like to see some little modification of the bill before the House. If he could not get that modification, he would vote for the bill as it was; though he would not vote for a single motion that, in his view, would have a tendency to defeat the measure.

We have (said Mr. B.) but a few weeks to stay here; and if we send this bill to a committee, they might require some time to prepare a bill in accordance with the instructions of the House; while the House itself will require some time to act upon it in Committee of the Whole, after it is reported to them—unless, indeed, the one-hour gag rule should be put in force. It would then have to undergo a proper degree of deliberation and discussion in the other body; so that, in the end, there might not be time enough left of the session to pass it. Were it not for these considerations, (Mr. B. said,) he would have no objection to the motion of his colleague, [Mr. BARNARD,] to send the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary for their revision; but as it was, he could not consent to any measure that would delay or endanger its passage. This was not a proper time to go into a discussion upon the merits of the bankrupt act. As he had before remarked, its merits were well understood by the whole country, and by every member on that floor. The judgment of the public had been formed, and they had now only to act on it. He would say, also, that he did not deem it proper to impugn the motives of those gentlemen who voted for this law. He was willing to believe that they acted from the best and purest motives; and he believed, also, that many of them, being now convinced that the law was inexpedient, were willing now to vote for its repeal. It was sufficient for them to say that they were wiser now than they then were; and he would, therefore, neither impugn their consistency nor their honesty. He had uniformly opposed this law, and a majority of his constituents coincided in opinion with him. He was therefore ready now to vote for its repeal. The only modification he wanted to make was a proviso that the repeal shall take effect from the passage of the act, so as to leave all persons who had already commenced the preliminary proceedings of bankruptcy under the faith of a law of Congress, at liberty to consummate them. There would be great cruelty and injustice in cutting off those who had incurred a heavy expense to obtain the benefits of this law, and who did so under the faith of an act of Congress. With this proviso, he would be perfectly satisfied to vote for the bill before them; though, if he could not get it, he would vote for the bill as it then stood.

Mr. CHARLES BROWN said he was not in so great a hurry to repeal the bankrupt law as many gentlemen seemed to be. He was opposed to its passage, and was still opposed to it as it stood upon the statute-book; and if it could not be amended as he desired, he would vote for its repeal. But, before he voted for its repeal, he was desirous of making a fair and full effort to have embraced within its provisions all the banks and other trading corporations of the country. The operation of the voluntary provisions of the law, as they were called, had been almost unmitigated evil. But it had done its worst; and, if left in full force, could do comparatively but little more evil. It had deranged and destroyed all the long-established relations of debtor and creditor—had invalidated contracts, and released from their obligations all the large and princely debtors. It had afforded an opportunity for thousands to be released from their debts, who otherwise would have paid them, and thereby enabled those to whom they were indebted, in their turn to pay their debts. This last class—the creditors of those who have taken the benefit of the bankrupt law—have been made bankrupts by its operation; and now, by its repeal, you will leave them without remedy. Was this just? Was that the way the obligation of contracts ought to be maintained? Much, if not all, the opposition in the public mind against the bankrupt law, was owing to its voluntary and retrospective action—its violation of past engagements and existing contracts. But these had been already cancelled by it; and the repeal of the law would not restore these obligations—would not place them in the situation they were before its passage. The evil it had done could not, therefore, be remedied,

If it remained in force, it could now only affect contracts made under it, and could do no positive wrong. Many had been made bankrupt by the effects of the law, who otherwise would have paid all their debts. He doubted the policy or justice of making these its victims, and then to deprive them of its remedies by legislation.

Before its passage, every man knew when he incurred a debt what were the penalties for non-payment. All knew what they had a right to expect and demand as creditors, or to give or suffer as debtors; all the debtors and creditors stood upon the same platform. If they repealed the law before all the relations of these parties that have been changed of it have been arranged according to its provisions, manifest injustice would be done to a large portion of them. Those who have been released, have had especial benefits conferred upon them; which especial benefits have bankrupted others, who will be left under all their obligations to others, again, without claims on those who were indebted to them. This was, he said, a great wrong, and one inflicted by the Government.

With these views of the subject, it having done most of the evil it could do, he was not in so great a hurry to repeal it as were some of those who had the sin of its passage on their heads. He was for making it the minister of some good, to compensate, in part, for the evil it had done. If it could be made (and he believed it could) to operate on all the banks and other corporations of the country, it would be one of the most salutary laws ever enacted. There was nothing that had so much deranged and impeded the healthy action of the business of the country, as the non-payment of specie by the banks of many parts of the country. They had for years, and now, in many places, sat like an incubus upon its industry, and blighting its prosperity. If these could be made to pay specie or to close their doors, the exchanges of the country would immediately be regulated, and its prosperity begin to advance. He was, therefore, for applying the bankrupt law to all such institutions, and to have them expunged or purified before it was repealed. He would, therefore, suggest to his colleague [Mr. C. J. INGERSOLL] so to change his proposition, as to embrace all banks and trading corporations within the provisions of the law. Of the power of Congress to do so, he had not the least doubt; nor would he make any distinction between banks whose stock was held by States and those held by individuals. No matter who or what the corporator or corporators were, it was not with them the law would have to do; but with the corporation, or rather with its property, its debtors, and its creditors; and these ought to be subject to the penalties and provisions of the bankrupt law, as much as any other property, debtors, and creditors. Believing this, he would vote against all propositions that did not embrace all banks. His object was to reach them all, and he would make no distinction, nor take anything less. If he could not get this, he would go for the repeal of the law altogether.

Mr. PICKENS said, to test the question, and to bring the House to a direct vote, he should move the previous question; and, he would add, that if gentlemen attempted to embarrass the bill with collateral issues, they would defeat it. He called, then, upon gentlemen (and more particularly as the people whom they represented had decided against the expediency and the constitutionality of that odious law) to come to the vote, and make repeal imperative. With that view, he moved the previous question; on which he demanded tellers.

Mr. HOPKINS and other gentlemen made some observations to the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. PICKENS,] which were not heard at the reporter's desk; and, in the confusion, an adjournment was moved.

The SPEAKER put the question, and it prevailed—88 in the affirmative, and 75 in the negative, and the House then adjourned.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, December 21, 1842.

Mr. BATES presented a petition from Seneca Thomas, praying for a pension: referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BERRIEN presented a memorial from a number of citizens of New York, remonstrating against the repeal of the bankrupt law, on the ground that its continuance will produce a salutary effect, by preventing overtrading, &c.: referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented two memorials from manufacturers of hats, asking Congress to repeal the 25 per cent. duty on imported furs: referred to the Committee on Manufactures.

Mr. PHELPS, from the Committee on Claims, reported a bill for the relief of Thomas Fillebrown, jr.; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

THE BANKRUPT ACT.

Mr. BENTON presented a petition from Washington county, Vermont, by W. Richardson, praying the repeal of the bankrupt act, and accompanied by a letter to him, stating that the people of Vermont were as unanimous as the Legislature of their State in condemning that act. Mr. B. would take the opportunity which the presentation of this petition offered, to declare that, holding the bankrupt act to be unconstitutional at six different points, (the extinction of the debt without the consent of a given majority of the creditors being at the head of these points,) he would vote for no repeal which would permit the act to continue in force for the trial of depending cases, unless with provisions which would bring the action of the law within the Constitution. To say nothing, at present, of other points of unconstitutionality, he limited himself to the abolition of debts without the consent of a given majority of the creditors. This, he held, no power in our country can do. Congress can only go as far as the bankrupt systems of England and other countries go; and that is, to require the consent of a given majority of the creditors (four-fifths in number and value in England and Scotland) and that founded upon a judicial certificate of integrity by the commissioners who examined the case, and approved afterwards by the Lord Chancellor. Upon these principles only could Congress act: upon these principles the Congress of 1800 acted, in making a bankrupt act: and to these principles he would endeavor to conform the action of the present act so long as it might run. He held all the certificates granted by the courts to be null and void; and that the question of the validity would be carried before the courts, and before the tribunal of public opinion. The federal judges decided the alien and sedition law to be constitutional. The people reversed that decision, and put down the men who held it. This bankrupt act was much more glaringly unconstitutional—much more immoral—and called more loudly upon the people to rise against it. If he was a United States judge, he would decide the act to be unconstitutional. If he was a State court, and one of these certificates of discharge from debts should be pleaded in bar before him, on an action brought for the recovery of the old debt, he would treat the certificate as a nullity, and throw it out of court. If commanded by the Supreme Court, he would resign first. The English law held all bankrupts, whose certificates were not signed by the given majority of the creditors, to be uncertificated; and, as such, he held all these to be who had received certificates under our law. They had no certificate of discharge from a given majority of the creditors; and were, therefore, what the English law called "uncertificated bankrupts." He said the bankrupt systems formed the creditors into a partnership for the management of the debtor's estate, and his discharge from debt; and, in this partnership, a given majority acted for the whole, all having the same interest in what was lost or saved; and, therefore, to be governed by a given majority, doing what was best for the whole. But even to this there were limitations. The four-fifths could not release the debt of the remaining fifth, except upon a certificate of integrity from the commissioners who tried the case, and a final approval by the Lord Chancellor. The law made itself party to the discharge, as it does in a case of divorce, and for the sake of good morals; and required the judicial certificate of integrity, without which the release of four-fifths of the creditors would not extinguish the debt of the other fifth. It is only in this way that Congress can act. It can only act according to the established principles of the bankrupt systems. It had no inherent or supreme authority over debts. It could not abolish debts as it pleased. It could not confound bankruptcy and insolvency, and so get hold of all debts, and sweep them off as it pleased. All this was despotism, such as only could be looked for in a Government which had no limits, either on its moral or political powers. The attempt to confound insolvency and bankruptcy, and to make Congress supreme over both, was the most daring attack on the Constitution, on the State laws, on the rights of property, and on public morals, which the history of Europe or America exhibited. There was no parallel to it in Europe or America. It was repudiation—universal repudiation of all debts—at the will of the debtor. The law was subversive of civil society; and he called upon Congress, the State Legislatures, the Federal and State judiciaries—and, above all, the people—to brand it for unconstitutionality and immorality, and to put it down.

Mr. B. said he had laid down the law, but he would refer to the forms which the wisdom of the law provided for executing itself. These forms were the highest evidences of the law. They were framed by men learned in the law—approved by the courts—and studied by the apprentices to the law. They should also be studied by the journeymen—by the professors—and by the ermined judges. In this case, especially, they should be so studied. Bankruptcy was a branch of the law but little studied in our country. The mass of the community were uninformed upon it; and the latitudinarians, who could find no limits to the power of our Government were daringly presuming upon the general ignorance, by undertaking to confound bankruptcy and insolvency, and claiming for Congress a despotic power over both. This daring attempt must be chastised. Congress must be driven back within the pale of the Constitution; and for that purpose, the principles of the bankrupt systems must be made known to the people. The forms are one of the best modes of doing this: and here are the forms of a bankrupt's certificate in Great Britain—the country from which our Constitution borrowed the system. [Mr. B. then read from Jacobs's Law Dictionary, title Bankruptcy, at the end of the title, the three forms of the certificates which were necessary to release a debtor from his debts.] The first form was that of the commissioners who examined the case, and who certified to the integrity of the bankrupt, and that he had conformed in all particulars to the act. The second form was that of the certificate of four-fifths of his creditors, "allowing him to be discharged from his debts." The third was the certificate of the Lord Chancellor, certifying that notice of these two certificates having been published for twenty-one days in the London Gazette, and no cause being shown to the contrary, the certificates granted by the commissioners and by the creditors were "confirmed." Then, and not till then, could the debtor be discharged from his debts; and with all this, the act of 1800 in the United States perfectly agreed, only taking two-thirds instead of four-fifths of the creditors. Congress could only absolve debts in this way, and that among the proper subjects of a bankrupt law: and the moral sense of the community must revolt against any attempt to do it in any other form. The present act was repudiation—criminal repudiation, as far as any one chose to repudiate—and must be put down by the community.

The memorial was then referred to the Judiciary Committee.

On motion of Mr. PORTER, leave was granted to withdraw from the files of the Senate (for the purpose of laying before the other House) the papers in relation to the claim of certain companies of Michigan militia.

Mr. KING presented to the Senate a memorial adopted by the Legislature of Alabama, upon the subject of lands which had been recently acquired from the Cherokees, which, through an error of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, had been advertised for sale in January next, contrary to the understanding with the residents thereon entitled to pre-emptions—that one year would be allowed them (from the time of the filing in the office the plats of survey) before the lands were brought into market, to prove their rights to pre-emption.

Mr. K. was understood to say that he had called upon the present Commissioner, and represented to him the understanding of the former Commissioner with these residents, (of which he was unaware;) and that the sales had been postponed so as to give the pre-emptors the benefit of the twelve months intervening the filing of the plats and the sale to establish their rights. He considered, therefore, that the object of the memorial was accomplished, though he moved its reference to the Committee on the Public Lands; which was agreed to.

Mr. MILLER presented a petition from Ezekiel Wade, praying remuneration for property destroyed by the enemy during the revolutionary war; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

THE OREGON BILL.

Mr. LINN, from the select committee on the subject, reported back, with several amendments, the bill for the occupation and settlement of the Territory of Oregon, and for extending portions of the laws of the United States over the same, and for other purposes. The amendments were ordered to be printed.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, made an adverse report on the petition of Benjamin K. Churchill for a privateer pension; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. ALLEN submitted the following resolution; which lies over one day under the rule:

Resolved, That the 40th rule for conducting the business in the Senate, and which requires the Senate to close its doors when transacting executive business, be rescinded, and that the Senate shall hereafter sit with open doors when transacting all business except treaty business.

MAIL FACILITIES.

Mr. KING rose to call the attention of the Senate to an act which was passed at the last session, establishing post offices and post routes. It would be recollected that, at the time of the passage of that act, considerable discussion arose regarding the propriety of establishing a post office near the city of Alexandria; and, after a full consideration of the subject, upon all the information that could be collected, both Houses determined that that office ought not to be established. By an error of the engrossing clerk—certainly not intentional—the clause requiring the establishment of that office was retained in the bill. The Postmaster General, however, though aware that the establishment of an office at that place was improper and uncalled for, yet, finding it in the statute-book, felt bound to execute the law. To arrest his action in the matter, he (Mr. KING) now brought it to the consideration of the Senate. If it were considered that it was a part of the law, it ought to be repealed. He hoped the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads would turn his attention to the subject; for, unless the committee brought forward some proposition for its repeal, he (Mr. KING) would feel it to be his duty to bring forward a bill to repeal it. He would await the action of the committee until to-morrow.

Mr. MERRICK, (at a subsequent part of the day,) in reference to the subject to which the Senator from Alabama [Mr. KING] had called the attention of the Senate, observed, that he was satisfied, upon looking at the law passed last session for the establishment of post-offices and post routes, that a very material error had been committed (probably in the engrossment of the bill) in that part of it which related to the establishment of a post-office in Fairfax county, Virginia, at a seminary a few miles from Alexandria. The Senate actually refused to establish such an office. He now rose to give notice that he should ask leave to-morrow to bring in a bill to repeal that portion of the law.

ASSUMPTION OF STATE DEBTS.

Mr. BENTON submitted a resolution, which was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to inform the Senate whether the late special minister from Great Britain to the United States made any proposition, informally or otherwise, to the negotiator on the part of the United States, for the assumption or guaranty of the State debts by the Government of the United States to the holders of said debts.

Mr. ARCHER wished the resolution to lie on the table for the present.

Mr. CONRAD, on leave, introduced a bill for the relief of William B. Lewis, postmaster at New Orleans; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. LINN submitted the following resolution, which lies one day on the table, by the rule:

Resolved, That the President be requested to inform the Senate of the nature and extent of the "informal communications" which took place between the American Secretary of State and the British special minister during the late negotiation in Washington City on the "subject of the claim of the United States and Great Britain to the territory west of the Rocky Mountains;" and also to inform the Senate what were the reasons which prevented "any agreement on the subject at present," and which made it "inexpedient to include that subject among the subjects of formal negotiation."

On motion of Mr. LINN, it was

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to send to the Senate a copy of Lieutenant Fremont's report of the recent exploring expedition to the Rocky mountains, made under the direction of the War Department.

On motion of Mr. LINN, it was

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to send to the Senate the report of the board of commissioners appointed to select a site for a Western armory.

CLAIMS AGAINST THE GOVERNMENT.

The proposition submitted by Mr. PHELPS to amend the rule of the Senate adopted on the 26th of January, 1842, providing that it shall not be in order to re-present a claim once reported against by either of the standing committees, such report having been concurred in by the Senate, was taken up and adopted, as follows, viz:

Provided, That this rule shall not extend to any cases whereon adverse reports, not in writing, may have been made previous to the said 26th day of January, 1842.

BILLS ORDERED TO BE ENGROSSED.

Senate bill entitled "An act to authorize the relinquishment of the sixteenth sections of land granted for the use of schools, and to select other lands in lieu thereof," was taken up as in committee of the whole, on an amendment from the Committee on Public Lands, authorizing the relinquishment by legal subdivisions, if preferred.

Mr. KING thought it was extending the privilege too far, to allow the relinquishment of less than quarter sections, and might lead to great public inconvenience and prejudice.

Mr. CRITTENDEN agreed with the Senator from Alabama in this opinion; and submitted to the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, [Mr. SMITH,] whether it was not carrying the thing too far, to allow the relinquishment of forty acres of a section to be picked out of the heart of another section.

Mr. SMITH remarked that portions of the school sections were ponds, and totally unfit for anything; and the committee, considering the beneficial objects for which the privilege was asked, had concluded to grant it.

The question was put, and the amendment was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. KING, the bill was further amended, so as to allow the selection to be made of any lands in the State where the relinquished section might lie, instead of confining the selections to the same township.

The bill was then reported to the Senate, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The Senate bill entitled "An act in relation to donations of land to certain persons in Arkansas," was considered as in committee of the whole, reported to the Senate, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill for the relief of certain citizens of Arkansas who lost their improvements in consequence of the treaty between the United States and the Cherokee Indians, came up in order as in committee of the whole; but

On the suggestion of Mr. BARROW, who wished to amend it so as to include some cases of citizens of Louisiana, it was postponed till to-morrow.

On motion of Mr. BARROW, the Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, December 21, 1842.

Mr. KING of Georgia appeared and took his seat.

Mr. KEIM of Pennsylvania presented the petition of A. Troxee and fourteen others, hatters, of Harrisburg, Pa., praying Congress that all hatters' furs be admitted free of duty.

Mr. PICKENS rose and desired to be informed as to the exact state of the question on the bill before the House, in Committee of the Whole, when they adjourned last evening. He desired to know, if he should move to strike out the proviso in the pending motion, and then move the previous question, if it would be in order.

The SPEAKER said that it would not. He would, however, suggest to the gentleman from South Carolina, that if there were any reports from the standing committees of the House, they would be the first business in order.

The standing committees were then called in their order; and reports were made as follows:

From the Committee of Ways and Means, by Mr. FILLMORE.

From the Committee of Claims, by Messrs. COWEN and GIDDINGS.

Mr. COWEN, from the Committee of Claims, reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That this House will, on Friday and Saturday, the 23d and 24th instant, meet at 10 o'clock, a. m., for the purpose of disposing of the business upon the private calendar.

The resolution having been read, Mr. C. called for the yeas and nays on the question of its adoption; but the call not being sustained by one-fifth of the members present, tellers were called for, and ordered; when, on taking the question, the result was, ayes 75, noes 68.

So the resolution was adopted.

Mr. GIDDINGS, from the same committee, offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of Claims be authorized to continue in employment their clerk, at the compensation heretofore allowed him, until the further order of the House.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON asked if that resolution was in order. If not, he should object to it.

The SPEAKER said that it was the report of a committee.

Mr. JOHNSON observed that the committee who had heretofore the charge of this subject, had examined it with great care, and had come to the conclusion that the services of this clerk were not necessary during the recess. Accordingly, when the resolution to continue his employment came up, an amendment was offered and adopted, limiting the employment to the then session of Congress [last session.] This resolution was to authorize the Committee of Claims to employ a clerk, who had annually been continued in employment for years. Now, if the Committee of Claims wanted to employ a clerk during the session of Congress only, he would not object to it; but he was opposed to the annual employment of one.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia desired to know whether this clerk was a regular and stationary officer of the House, and was employed in the recess.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON said that he had been annually employed for years.

Mr. SMITH further desired to know what the clerk's services were, and what was his compensation.

Mr. GIDDINGS said that this gentleman had been regularly employed since the year 1826 in keeping the records and doing the clerical business of the committee, during the sessions of Congress, and in preparing a digest of the decisions of the committee since the organization of the Government. Mr. G. explained the great usefulness and importance of this digest, and spoke in a highly favorable manner of the services of the clerk. Mr. G. then called for the reading of the report of the committee on this subject; which was done.

Mr. SMITH then asked what was the compensation of this clerk.

The SPEAKER replied that it was $1,500 per annum.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON moved to amend the resolution, by limiting the employment of the clerk to the present session.

Mr. COWEN observed that an inquiry had been made whether this clerk had been continued in the employment of the committee since the expiration of the last session. He would answer that question by saying, that he had been laboring very assiduously in the committee-room, during the recess, in making up its records, and in continuing the digest of the decisions of the committee, which he had a long time been engaged in. He understood and believed that he had not lost more than one or two days since the last session. He would further say, that, without the services rendered by him in the recess, the committee would not have been able to commence their labors as early as they did at this session.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON asked if the services performed during the recess were not services that had heretofore been performed by the regular clerks in the Clerk's office. Mr. J. also said that a resolution was passed at the last session limiting the employment of this clerk to that session only.

Mr. COWEN was understood to say that the resolution was so amended, but that it was not finally acted on.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia observed that it seemed extraordinary to him why it should be necessary for this committee to employ a clerk during the recess. The committee met but three times a week, and it appeared to him that the clerk could carry on the business of the committee, and perform the other services spoken of during the times the committee were not in session. The clerk had six days in the week to work in, and yet it seemed that he could not keep up his records, but must have the recess to do it in. Mr. S. further observed, that some of the most important committees of the House had no clerk allowed them, and were compel'ed to attend to their own clerical duties. There was the Committee of Revolutionary Claims, for instance, of which he was a member, who had no inconsiderable amount of correspondence and other writing to attend to without having a clerk to assist them. He thought the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee ought to be adopted.

Mr. EVERETT was in favor of the resolution; because, having the fullest confidence in the committee, he was ready to believe, from their report on the subject, that the services of this clerk were highly important and necessary. Mr. E. also spoke very favorably of the efficiency of the clerk, and the regularity of his attention to his duties.

The question was then taken on Mr. C. JOHNSON's amendment; and it was adopted—ayes 133, noes 63.

The question recurring on the resolution as amended,

Mr. HOPKINS inquired whether it was intended to provide compensation for the services of this clerk during the recess? Now, at the last session a resolution was passed, limiting his services to that session; and if it was now intended, in the face of that resolution, to pay him for the recess, he would vote against it.

Mr. COWEN observed, that the services rendered were important and indispensable; and the clerk, with the exception of one or two days, had been regularly employed. The Government had had the benefit of his services, and he ought to be paid for them; and, the simple question now was, whether the Government should take the services of this individual without paying him for them.

Mr. HOPKINS desired to know of the gentleman from Ohio whether the House, at the last session, did not, by a solemn vote, limit the services of this clerk to that session?

Mr. COWEN presumed that it was so. But he would observe, that the clerk himself knowing how necessary and indispensable the continuation of his work was, of his own motion went into the committee-room and continued his labors, relying on the justice of Congress to pay him.

Mr. HOPKINS then observed that the question was not, as stated by the gentleman from Ohio, whether the House would take the services of this clerk for nothing; but the true question was, whether the decision of the House that his services in the recess were not wanted, should stand; and whether he should be permitted, of his own motion, to thrust himself into their committee-room, and perform services which they had solemnly declared should not be rendered.

Mr. TURNEY moved to amend the resolution, by striking out the word "continue" and insert the word "employ;" the effect of which was to prevent his being continued during the recess. The House at the last session (Mr. T. said) passed a resolution limiting his employment to that session; notwithstanding which, he, of his own motion, went into the committee-room, and performed services which the House declared were not necessary, and now came forward and asked to be paid for it. If the House should now pay him for working on his own authority during the last recess, it would be setting a precedent under which he would have nothing more to do but to set the present resolution at defiance, go into the committee-room again in the next recess, and at the next session again demand pay for it. It would have been far better (Mr. T. said) to have adopted a resolution originally paying him for his services in the recess, and continuing him in regular employment, than to permit the solemn decision of the House to be thus set aside. Mr. T. concluded by calling for the yeas and nays on the question; which were accordingly ordered.

Mr. COWEN offered a few remarks in explanation, previous to the taking of the question, and expressed the hope that the House would not disregard all former precedents on the subject, and take the services of this clerk for nothing.

The House rejected the amendment—ayes 98, noes 101.

The question then recurred upon the adoption of the resolution, and it was adopted.

THE BANKRUPT LAW.

The CHAIR announced the first business in order to be the bill to repeal the bankrupt law, with the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. BARNARD] to commit the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary, and the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [C. J. INGERSOLL] to instruct the committee to report a bill excluding voluntary applicants, and banks owned by States, and including such corporations not owned by States as issue notes of circulation. The pending question was a motion for the previous question made by Mr. PICKENS.

Mr. CUSHING appealed to the gentleman to withdraw the call, in order to enable him to offer a proposition.

After some conversation backwards and forwards,

Mr. PICKENS assented, on condition that the motion should be renewed.

Mr. CUSHING then said that the effect of the previous question would be cut off all amendments and instructions, and bring up the question upon the engrossment of the bill as it now stood. What he proposed was, that the gentleman from New York [Mr. BARNARD] should withdraw his motion to commit the bill, in consequence of which the instructions would fall to the ground, and he (Mr. C.) be enabled to tender an amendment to the consideration of the House. He would send his amendment to the Chair, that it might be read for information. The amendment was then read by the Clerk, as follows; so that, instead of taking effect on the 5th December, 1842, it shall read:

k. "That this act shall not affect any case or proceeding in bankruptcy commenced before the passage of this act; or any pains, penalties, or forfeitures incurred under the said act; but every such proceeding may be continued to its final consummation, in like manner as if this act had not been passed."

Mr. BARNARD said he would consent to withdraw his motion to commit, on one condition; and that was, that he be permitted to offer a substitute for the bill as it now stood. He would send his substitute to the Chair, to be read for information:

Be it enacted, &c., That so much of the act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," approved on the 19th day of August, 1841, as authorizes any person owing debts to apply, by petition, for the benefit of said act, together with all the parts of such act which are applicable solely to the mode of obtaining the benefit of the provisions of such act in behalf of debtors, by the voluntary petition of such debtors, without the concurrence or aid of the creditors, be, and the same is hereby, repealed: Provided, That this act shall not affect any case or proceeding in bankruptcy already commenced, or which shall be commenced before the 4th day of March next, or any pains, penalties, or forfeitures prescribed in and incurred, or which shall be incurred, under said act.

He proposed this, hoping that it might prove acceptable to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. CUSHING,] in lieu of his own.

Mr. CUSHING was unwilling to accept of the amendment, because it went beyond the object which he desired to attain. His object was to perfect the bill, without going beyond it.

Mr. BARNARD. If my proposition be admitted, it will include that of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. CUSHING. Yes, and something more.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON objected to the proceedings, as out of order.

Mr. CUSHING again appealed to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BARNARD,] to withdraw the motion to commit.

Mr. BARNARD here declined.

Mr. CUSHING, in accordance with the pledge he had given, moved the previous question.

Tellers [Messrs. HOPKINS and LINN] were appointed, who reported—ayes 60, noes 94.

So the House refused to sustain the previous question.

The SPEAKER then announced the question to be on the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. UNDERWOOD wished to make one or two observations. When the bankrupt bill was under consideration, and before it was passed, he talked to the House by the hour against it; and he proposed some twenty or thirty amendments, but no attention was paid to them. The bill was passed hastily, and without due consideration; and the effect was seen in these propositions to repeal it. The House was now proceeding with the same haste to repeal, as they proceeded to pass the bill; and he wished to make a few suggestions, and to ask the House to deliberate on a measure which was to affect so many interests in the country. If they repealed this law, without qualification or restriction, they would affect a class of vested interests which he considered good faith would not allow them to touch. And what were they? They were interests of this kind: In all cases of involuntary bankruptcy, where creditors were proceeding against their debtors, they had the right, if an act of bankruptcy had been committed, to have the debtors declared bankrupts, and their property distributed pro rata according to their debts; to set aside all fraudulent conveyances which had been executed within sixty days before the application; and to disregard all preferences which the bankrupts might have made. But, by this hasty legislation, they would do away with all these rights. He could illustrate his meaning by citing his own case. He had had to proceed against an individual, to compel him into bankruptcy, to cause a distribution of his assets; the case was afterwards settled by compromise, and therefore, as it was now at an end, he had no personal interest; but he doubted not there were hundreds of similar cases existing, and they were now, by hasty proceedings, about to nullify the whole that had been done. There was, however, a proposition made, by way of proviso and salvo, to this effect: that the repealing act shall not take effect except from its passage; or the 5th day of December, as it now stood; or from the 1st of July, as was proposed by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BARNARD.] And what was the object of a provision of that sort? He would tell the House, and he would show its injustice to the community. That proceeding was, to allow all those who had not already done so, to cut their legal obligations to their creditors. Why was the act to be repealed? It was, as gentlemen said, in obedience to public sentiment. What did public sentiment demand? That they should not touch the legal obligation of contracts; and, in pursuance of that sentiment, it was proposed to repeal this law. But, in the proviso, they said they would allow time to cut as many legal obligations as possible. And what was their plea for that? Why, it had been said, because they had done it in respect to some, they should therefore do it in respect to others. Their having done it in respect to some, was made the pretext for doing it towards all: and that was their respect for public sentiment! and that was the way they proposed to do for the people what it was said the people required to be done;—that is, the people required at their hands that the obligation of contracts should not be violated; and they proposed to comply with that demand, by allowing time for their violation. If they had done what was wrong by the passage of the act in respect to contracts heretofore existing, the sooner they made reparation the better; therefore, they ought to have no proviso of that sort.

When he rose, he did not intend to make a long speech, and therefore he should now merely say that he should make no proposition to amend; but he should give such a vote as would tend towards carrying out the principles he had always held. When the bankrupt act was passed, he told Congress that he was in favor of a bankrupt law, but not such a bankrupt law as this. He was in favor of a bankrupt law now, and he expected to die in favor of one. He knew the value of a bankrupt law, by experience. He never was sued for any debt contracted on his own account, in his life; but he had had a vast number of writs for debts of other people. He had been made bankrupt to the amount of a hundred thousand dollars, and he had had to surrender even the books of his office to pay other people's debts. Fortunately for him, he had got clear of the whole of it. The principle of bankruptcy which they ought to sanction was to relieve a man from debts incurred by calamity, and not by imprudence; but in the passage of this bankrupt law, they had failed to make that distinction; they had undertaken to relieve everybody from his debts created by imprudence, or from the consequences of his frauds, by means of which debts might have been contracted; and it was against a principle of that extent that society had risen up as with the voice of one man. No man in his section of the country had ever said that in a case of calamity or misfortune—for Heaven, by tempest, or by flood destroys a man's property—a man should not be relieved.

He (Mr. UNDERWOOD) protested against their mortgaging the faculties of a man under such circumstances, or, Shylock-like, claiming that his flesh should be meted out: yet there were many who, by their extravagance or imprudence, had got into debt; and to relieve them by this bankrupt law, was to permit them to go into the community, and do the same thing again. Now, he (Mr. U.) would vote for the bill of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BARNARD,] if he would reduce the time for voluntary bankruptcies.

Mr. BARNARD agreed to amend his proposition, by changing the day from the 1st July to the 1st April.

Mr. UNDERWOOD would then consider that alteration as made in the gentleman's proposition.

Mr. BARNARD, after conversation with several gentlemen, again changed the day, from the 1st of April to the 4th of March.

Mr. BLACK inquired if it was in order to move to lay that amendment on the table.

Mr. BARNARD withdrew his motion to commit the bill to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. BLACK said, when the proper time came, he would move to lay the gentleman's amendment on the table.

Mr. C. J. INGERSOLL obtained permission from the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. UNDERWOOD,] (who still kept possession of the floor,) to move to amend the proposition of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BARNARD,] by the addition of the words, "and to include banks."

After a few words from Mr. CUSHING on a point of form and order,

Mr. EVERETT intimated his willingness to amend his original bill, by substituting the 25th for the 5th of December, as the day fixed by the proviso as the limit for the application in bankruptcy.

Mr. UNDERWOOD then resumed. He had but very little to say; but he wanted the amendments presented, which would exhibit the whole subject in the aspect which he had pointed out. First, he wanted a proposition made from some part of the House for the repeal of the bill heretofore passed, so far as related to applications for voluntary bankruptcy, without proviso or qualification. He then wanted a motion made, in some shape or other, by gentlemen who had been acting on this subject, to retain so much of the bill as allows of compulsory bankruptcy, and the distribution of the property of the bankrupt among his creditors, according to their respective debts, pro rata. For the reasons which he had already advanced, he thought it would be proper to repeal the voluntary principle of the bankrupt law, and to retain the involuntary part of it. That was the proposition of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BARNARD,] except that he proposed to permit voluntary bankrupcies, first until the 1st July, then until the 1st April; and as the proposition now stood, until the 4th day of March. Now that was the very thing which the people had condemned; and he (Mr. U.) wished to get clear of that part of the proviso; and he would move, if it were in order, to strike out so much of the gentleman's amendment as proposed to extend the time until the 4th of March for voluntary bankrupts to file their petitions.

The SPEAKER said such a motion was not then in order.

Mr. CUSHING submitted, as a point of order, that the amendment which had been proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. C. J. INGERSOLL] was not in order without the consent of the House; which had not been given. He then went on to state the nature of the proposition which he desired to make—which was, in effect, to substitute the time of the passage of this act for the days which had been proposed. Various propositions and observations were made by several gentlemen.

Mr. HOPKINS then rose, and said, if the people of this country had decided anything in relation to this question, they had decided that the bankrupt law should be repealed; and he should regard any proposition to clog it with exceptions, or provisoes, as calculated to disappoint, rather than to promote, the public expectation. What he desired was a direct vote of this House upon the immediate and unqualified repeal of the law. He believed that was what it was expected, on the part of the people, that they would do; and he called upon the friends of repeal there to disregard all these exceptions and provisoes, and to consent to take nothing until they got a vote on the unqualified repeal of the law. For himself, he should vote against every amendment which contained such a proposition as was incorporated in that offered by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BARNARD,] or the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. CUSHING.] He would not say how he would vote on the bill of the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. EVERETT.] He went for the repeal of the law—for an instant repeal of the law, and the unqualified repeal of the law; and he called upon those who were looked to here to execute the public judgment, with regard to this law, to be cautious how they voted on these various propositions.

It was in the power of the majority (which he doubted not might be found there in favor of repeal) to bring the House to a direct vote on the question of repeal, instead of on those propositions, some of which would make repeal of no utility. The proposition which designed to continue voluntary bankruptcies until the 4th of March, gave notice to every debtor to come and be discharged from his liabilities, and then there would be nothing to remedy; for the whole mischief would be done. If, however, they came up to an unqualified repeal of the law, they might prevent much of the mischief that would result from its operation. He (Mr. HOPKINS) had seen nothing in the indications of public sentiment about a qualified repeal; he had seen nothing about voluntary or involuntary bankruptcy. On the contrary, the people had called on their Representatives to repeal the law; and, in his judgment, they would disappoint the people if they accepted any of these various propositions to amend. He was satisfied there was a majority on that floor for repeal—unqualified repeal; and he called upon them to stand by the bill in that shape; if not, they would repeal but in name. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. UNDERWOOD] had spoken of a repeal which would interfere with vested interests; but, in his (Mr. H.'s) judgment, it was not repeal which interfered with vested interests: it was the passage of the law which interfered with vested interests, and impaired the obligation of contracts. He repeated, that, unless the bill should be passed so as to secure an unqualified repeal of the bankrupt law, as at present advised he should vote against every proposition; for no other would meet the expectations of the country.

Mr. BRIGGS was understood to move the committal of the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON submitted, as an amendment, a simple proposition for the repeal of the bankrupt law; and he was afterwards understood to say that he would consent to the committal to the Judiciary Committee, but with instructions to report a bill for the repeal of the bankrupt law to-morrow at two o'clock. This (he said) would bring the House to the question whether there should or should not be a repeal.

Mr. WISE said he had been sitting there watching the Protean shapes given to the bill, until he was tired. If they intended to repeal that law, now was the accepted time. The House could come to the question of repeal, if they chose, at once, by voting down the motions to commit, and the motion to instruct; and then, by refusing to entertain the previous question, make it a bill to operate from the time of its passage, and not from the 5th of December, or any other specified day. That was all that was wanted; and that could be done to-day, just as well as it could be done if it were referred to a committee.

He (Mr. WISE) had said nothing about this bankrupt bill, except once; and that was when the potent argument was advanced to the House and the country, that there were 500,000 bankrupt voters in the United States ready to avail themselves of its advantages.

This power it was (and a political power, too) that was urged at the time of the passage of the bankrupt bill, by which it was kicked through in such hot haste. He warned gentlemen, however, (and it was all he had ever said on this subject,) that if there were 500,000 bankrupts in the country, there were at least 500,000 creditors also. Their condition, too, was changed. The debtors being released—gentlemen no longer having the debtor power to press, now pressed the creditor power. When they thought the bankrupt law was popular, they passed it; but now they think its repeal is popular, they press the repeal. Though he could see mischiefs growing out of the repeal of this law, still he thought that it ought to be repealed. He believed that this bankrupt law had produced one-half the distress of the country, by destroying confidence, and inducing creditors to put the screws on their debtors. At the moment that the Legislature stepped forward to interfere between the debtors and the creditors, the latter were stimulated to commence suits for the recovery of their debts. Mr. W. strongly opposed the including of banks and corporations in the provisions of the bankrupt law, on the ground that the same evils would be produced by it. The banks would be compelled to put additional screws on their debtors; and he hoped there was no one who would be willing to see the people depressed further than they already were. The best thing that could now be done would be, to repeal this law, for the purpose of restoring confidence, and enabling creditors, with more safety, to indulge their debtors.

Mr. CHAS. BROWN said he rose upon the impulse of the moment, to enter his protest against the assumptions of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] who had just taken his seat, in relation to the effects upon the people of Virginia, and all the other States of the Union, that would follow the adoption of the amendment proposed by his colleague, [Mr. INGERSOLL,] to embrace all "banks" within the involuntary provisions of the bankrupt law. It had been, and now was, the desperate struggles of involved and insolvent banks to collect their debts, that had ground the people to death. The fear of protests and bank disgrace compelled many to sacrifice their property, to keep up their credit in bank. The banks sacrifice nothing, but compel their debtors to sacrifice their property to redeem the bank's notes: thus do they go on, compelling the payment of ten, twenty, or fifty per cent. every sixty days; and that it was that had spread such ruin and distress through many parts of the country, and would continue to be the case, as long as the involved or insolvent banks were suffered to exist. Let but these banks be forced to stop banking—to stop discounting individual notes, and issuing their own, and their debtors would feel immediate relief. The banks would no longer have any inducement to oppress their debtors, but would collect their debts without oppressing them; and if the Virginia banks could be thus stopped now, the people of Virginia would soon breathe freely. In a single day, or month, they would feel themselves relieved as from an incubus; and their prosperity would be soon restored. Mr. B. said he knew what he stated to be true. He was not theorizing, but giving to the House and to the gentleman from Virginia the results of experience. In the city of Philadelphia, while its dozen of banks pursued the course now being pursued by the Virginia banks, all was distress, and difficulty, and oppression; but the very hour that one-half of them closed their doors, (which they did nearly on the same day,) and three-fourths of its bank capital was thus forced into entire bankruptcy, and they obliged to stop banking, the people felt relief, and have been going on ever since increasing in prosperity. Money, instead of being scarce, has been increasing in quantity, and improving in quality. Property ceased to be sacrificed to meet the grinding requisitions of insolvent banks. Nor was this salutary influence felt at Philadelphia alone; but wherever the banks had been forced to pay specie or close, the same relief had been felt. Under the bankrupt law, the bad will be forced to close, and the good be relieved from the weight of the bad, and the community be relieved from the oppression of them all. The idea that there would be no money in circulation if the banks were closed, was an absurdity too palpable to need contradiction. Such had been always feared, but had never been the consequence.

One word as to the power of the General Government to bring those State institutions under their bankrupt law, and he had done. Of that power I have not the least doubt. The sole or main object and intention of giving to the General Government the power to pass a general bankrupt law, was evidently to establish general rules and laws regulating and controlling the relations of debtor and creditor throughout the Union—to prevent any one State from throwing over the property of its citizens a shield against their creditors in another State. If, therefore, no State could protect the property of its citizens, as individuals, from the operation of a general bankrupt law; how could it, or why ought it to have the power to shield the property of its corporate bodies from the same liabilities that its citizens are under? What were banks or corporations? Were they not merely "artificial persons"—usually a number of individuals invested with power to bear a single name, with the same powers as individuals pursuing the same business? Thus a bank corporation had the same power as a single banker—a manufacturing corporation as a single manufacturer—a mining corporation as a single miner. If, then, the general bankrupt law overrode the State laws so far as it affected the property of each individual as a private banker, manufacturer, or miner, why should it not override State laws as to the property of the same individuals, as corporate bankers, manufacturers, and miners? These debtors and creditors were all alike, and the same general laws ought to regulate and control them. He could not see what principle of State rights would be impaired; and believing that a great good would be done, he would go heartily for bringing all banks and corporations under the involutary provisions of the bankrupt law; and would assure his friend from Virginia [Mr. WISE] that the people of Virginia and the whole country would, instead of being "screwed down" further, as he asserted, find the screws immediately loosened, and themselves free and prosperous. If banks were not so brought within the province of the law, he should vote for its repeal; believing, as he did, that its continuance would do more evil than good. Evil it had worked, and no doubt, to some extent, would continue to work; but he was confident that the immense amount of good that would be done to the whole country by a general strangulation of all the note-issuing insolvent banks, and a consequent purification of the currency, would more—far more—than compensate for all or any of the evils of a continuance of the bankrupt law upon individuals.

Mr. ARNOLD wished to say a few words before the question was taken. The House had long presented a strange spectacle to the country, by undoing at one session what was solemnly done at another; acting under the impulses of patriotism and love for the people. The Democracy, too, presented an extraordinary spectacle. They, as friends of the people, were demanding the repeal of the law, and especially that part applying to the poor debtor. This was the tune of modern Democracy—the subterranean Democracy—that the act went too far in its provisions for the benefit of the poor! Whilst making these remarks on the Democratic party, he could not refrain from expressing his dissent from many acts of the Whig party. He thought they were too soon tired of well-doing, and too soon yielding to the one-man power at the other end of the avenue. He thought they should leave the undoing of their own measures to another Congress, when, all conceded, the Democracy would have a large majority. Let the Democracy and John Tyler carry on the Government for two years.

As for the bankrupt law, he regarded it as the best measure which had been passed by the Whigs. Its evil had been accomplished, and, should it be allowed to remain in force, he predicted that, in five years, it would be the most popular law in the country. He commented on the coalition which he said had been formed between the Locofocos and a portion of those claiming to have belonged to the Whig party, by which defeat had been brought upon the Whig cause. There seemed to be an especial desire on the part of this coalition to have the bankrupt law repealed, and to set themselves up as the enemies of debt.

He commented on the fact that many Democrats in New York, particular friends of Mr. Van Buren, were against the repeal of this law. Indeed, he had the best reason to believe that Mr. Van Buren himself was in favor of the present bankrupt law. A large number of the Democracy of New York had petitioned against the repeal of the law. In 1827, Mr. Van Buren had advocated a bankrupt act in the Senate; and now every mountebank in the country was setting himself up to know more about it than Mr. Van Buren.

Mr. A. then went into the subject at large, and spoke until the expiration of his hour, treating the subject in its personal, political, and commercial aspects.

After he had concluded,

Mr. SALTONSTALL obtained the floor, and moved an adjournment; which was carried.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 22, 1842.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented a memorial from Mary Reeside, the widow of Jas. Reeside, deceased, who was a mail contractor with the Government, praying that Congress might pass a law, appropriating the amount of the verdict obtained by her deceased husband in the Supreme Court of the United States, against the United States, for the sum of $188,496 06, a large portion of which verdict was for money actually borrowed on his orders, and a mortgage on his property, to aid the Post Office Department. The memorialist states that the mortgaged property is threatened to be sold, to satisfy the mortgage. Mr. B. moved, as this presented a legal question, that the memorial, and the memorial of James Reeside, deceased, now on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Judiciary Committee: agreed to.

Mr. WOODBURY presented a memorial from the assistant messengers in the Post Office Department, praying an increase of their compensation: referred to the Committee on Finance.

Also, presented a petition from Daniel Currier, for a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

On motion by Mr. CONRAD, it was ordered that the memorial of Juan Quarro, for property taken from him in 1841, be taken from the files of the Senate, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported back, without amendment, the bill to provide for ascertaining and disposing of the lead-mineral lands in the States of Illinois and Arkansas, and the Territories of Wisconsin and Iowa.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE, from the Committee on the Library, reported back to the Senate, without amendment, and with a recommendation that it do pass, the joint resolution for the distribution of the catalogues of the Library of Congress.

Mr. McROBERTS submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be directed to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation to remove the obstructions to navigation at the Des Moines rapids, in the Mississippi river.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and adopted.

Mr. McROBERTS said he had a petition to present from citizens of Iowa Territory upon the same subject, and which he should ask to have referred to the same committee.

In explanation of the resolution and petition, he said the rapids referred to had been, and continued to be, an obstruction to the commerce upon the Mississippi, between St. Louis and the northern part of Illinois and the Territories of Wisconsin and Iowa. The rapid is impassable, at least without great delay and danger, at low stages of water. For the last few years, the impediment to the navigation of that noble river had been more sensibly felt, from the great increase of population and commerce upon the Upper Mississippi. The whole commerce of Iowa, and most of that of Wiskonsin and the northern part of the State he represented, so far as depended upon water communication, had to pass these rapids. Looking, then, to the growth and resources of the immense territory north of the rapids, no one could mistake the importance and necessity of this improvement. He believed that no part of the Mississippi valley had surpassed, if it had ever equalled it, in the same period of time, in population and improvement. During the fall season, when emigration was pouring in most numerously, the delay, and expense, and loss of property were greatest at these rapids. No stronger appeal could be presented than the existing state of things, to the justice of the Government to appropriate means to remove the obstruction complained of in this petition.

Mr. B. said that the great MINERAL REGION lies north of these rapids. In lead, and possibly in copper, the territory referred to was the richest upon the face of the globe. The whole people of the country were interested in protecting this interest. In 1839, the amount of lead which descended over these rapids, the products of the upper mines, was twenty-six millions of pounds; in 1840, twenty-five millions; and for the first eleven months of 1841, twenty-seven million six hundred and fifty thousand pounds. At ordinary prices, the net proceeds would amount to more than a million of dollars per year. This lead finds its way to the Eastern cities, and supplies the demand for the article in all the various purposes to which it was applied. The opening of these mines has supplied the home market, and prevented importations from abroad. From 1821 to 1838, inclusive—a period of eighteen years—we imported but 2,625,133 pounds; while we have exported more than that amount to China alone in a single year. In 1840 we imported about half a million, and exported twice that amount.

But, sir, (said Mr. McR.,) independent of these considerations, the highest dictates of national duty require that the appropriation should be made. That river, and the part of it which includes the obstruction referred to, was the channel to navigation for two Territories, and no inconsiderable portion of one of the States. The subject, therefore, assumed an importance that made the work one of national concern. They were yearly appropriating millions for the improvement of harbors, rivers, inlets, and other works to protect the commerce upon the sea-board; and he claimed the same measure of justice for the people of the Mississippi valley.

The petition from the citizens of Iowa was then presented, and, upon his motion, was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MERRICK, agreeably to notice, and on leave, introduced a bill to repeal certain portions of the act of Congress, approved August 1st, 1842, entitled "An act establishing certain post offices and post routes," which was read.

Mr. MERRICK desired that the bill might be read a second time and disposed of, without being referred to the committee; as it was merely to correct the error which was made in engrossing the bill of August last, and which had been spoken of yesterday; which error was the cause of continuing the post office at the high school in Fairfax county, a few miles from Alexandria, when Congress actually, by a formal vote, struck from the bill such office.

The bill was read a second time, considered as in committee of the whole, reported to the Senate, and, being engrossed according to order, was read the third time and passed.

Mr. BENTON said he took pleasure in presenting to the Senate the credentials of his colleague, LEWIS F. LINN, who was elected by the Legislature of Missouri a Senator from that State for six years from the 4th of March next; which Mr. B. moved to have placed on the files of the Senate, as the oath of office would not be administered until after the expiration of this Congress.

Mr. FULTON presented the credentials of his colleague, AMBROSE H. SEVIER, who was elected by the Legislature of Arkansas a Senator from that State for six years from and after the 4th of March, 1843. Mr. F., in presenting the credentials, remarked that a misstatement had gone abroad as to the term for which his colleague was elected. That some of the papers had published that he was elected from the 4th of March, 1845, instead of the 4th of March, 1843. He wished this error in the public mind corrected. The credentials were ordered to be placed on the files.

Mr. BARROW submitted the following resolution, which lies for the present on the table, viz:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of granting to the State of Louisiana every alternate section of the public lands in the limits of that State, which have been returned as not worth the cost of survey; and each alternate section of such lands as are subject to inundation by the overflowing of the Mississippi river, on the condition that the said State construct levees, by means of which said lands shall be effectually protected, thereafter, from inundation: And provided, That the proceeds of the sales of lands reclaimed by means of such levees, shall be exclusively appropriated by the State of Louisiana to the making of roads and the improving of rivers and bayous within its limits.

Mr. WOODBURY said a bill had been introduced, and approved by the Committee on Commerce, to allow a drawback on goods exported in original packages by way of the Northwest. He had wished that the bill might be made general in its provisions; and he threw out some suggestions to the Committee on Commerce, a few days ago, when the bill alluded to was referred to it, with the hope that they might consider it just and proper to make the bill a general one. He also stated on that occasion, that if they did not do so, he would feel it his duty to move an amendment to the bill when it was taken up for consideration. He had determined, however, not to embarrass action on that bill, and would move the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of allowing a drawback on foreign merchandise exported in original packages, as well by sea as over land.

The resolution was adopted.

The following resolution, introduced by Mr. WRIGHT on yesterday, was taken up, and, being explained by the mover, was adopted, viz:

Resolved, That the Committee on Retrenchment be instructed to inquire and report to the Senate the number of clerks of committees who have been appointed and paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate, during the last and present Congress; the amount so paid to such clerks, and the rate of compensation; and whether any, and what, other mode can, in the opinion of the committee, be adopted, by which a more general, and equal, and effectual aid to all the committees of the Senate may be secured in a more reasonable form, and on more economical terms.

The resolution by Mr. ALLEN, to rescind the 40th rule of the Senate, concerning the business in secret session, came up in order; but was, on the motion of the mover, postponed till the 2d Monday in January next, and made the order for that day.

On motion by Mr. WOODBURY, 300 copies additional of the report of the coast survey were ordered to be printed for the use of the Senate.

THE OREGON TERRITORY.

The resolution introduced on yesterday by Mr. LINN, came up in order, and was read as follows:

Resolved, That the President be requested to inform the Senate of the nature and extent of the "informal communications" which took place between the American Secretary of State and the British special minister, during the late negotiation in Washington city, on the "subject of the claim of the United States and Great Britain to the territory west of the Rocky Mountains;" and also to inform the Senate what were the reasons which prevented "any agreement on the subject at present," and which made it "inexpedient to include that subject among the subjects of formal negotiation."

Mr. ARCHER suggested to the Senator from Missouri, that, inasmuch as it might be inconsistent with the public interests that this information should be communicated at this time, it would be better to amend the resolution by inserting the words "if not inconsistent with the public interest." His own opinion was, that the honorable Senator would be nearer to the accomplishment of his purpose by not pressing the passage of the resolution at this time.

Mr. LINN said he considered the suggestion of the honorable Senator exceedingly reasonable. The reason why he had introduced the resolution was, that they might have some information regarding the condition of the Oregon territory. The negotiations upon that subject had slept for the last twelve or fourteen years. It appeared that some correspondence had taken place, informally, between the Secretary of State and Lord Ashburton; and he felt great anxiety that something positive should be known regarding the course which had been pursued in reference to this subject. Many of our citizens were now going to that Territory, and they were desirous of knowing in what position they were likely to be placed. The claim of the British Government appeared to be in some degree strengthened by lapse of time; and the public feeling in many of the States throughout the valley of the Mississippi generally, and, indeed, throughout the whole United States, demanded that some definite action should take place. We want to know what the British Government are disposed to tolerate us the possession of. That seemed to be the nature of the case; not what we are disposed to assert our right to and to claim, but what they will allow us the possession of. He was of opinion that the resolution would do very well as it was; if, however, the gentleman from Virginia was desirous that it should be modified in accordance with the suggestion he had made, he (Mr. LINN) had not the least objection.

Mr. ARCHER observed, that if the resolution was to pass at all, it should be with the usual modification; but the resolution seemed to have been brought forward under a misapprehension of the fact—under the supposition that all negotiations upon the subject had been totally laid aside. If this were the ground upon which it had been introduced, it was, as he (Mr. ARCHER) was advised, a mistaken supposition. The subject had not been laid aside: it was still a pending subject of negotiation between the two Governments. And in this view of the subject, he would submit to the honorable Senator whether it was fit that they should make the inquiry at this time; or whether he would promote his object by pressing the matter now; and whether it would not be better, therefore, to permit the resolution to lie upon the table for the present. If his honorable friend, however, would accept the modification which he had suggested, he would offer no opposition to its adoption.

Mr. LINN assented, observing that he did not consider it at all material, as, if the furnishing of the information should be considered by the Executive as detrimental to the public interests, it would be withheld in either case.

Mr. KING said he was exceedingly desirous that an investigation of this subject should take place at an early day, and that the question should be set at rest. It appeared to him, however, that if negotiations were now actually pending, it would be utterly idle and nugatory to ask the Executive for any information upon this subject. His answer must necessarily be, that it does not comport with the public interest to make such communication. He (Mr. KING) had had some experience here; and he knew very well that calls of this kind frequently embarrass negotiations. They were too much in the habit of pushing things to publicity at so early a period, that the whole world were aware of the precise position in which their negotiations stood, and were enabled to avail themselves of that knowledge to embarrass the negotiation, and counteract its objects.

Mr. BENTON sustained the resolution, and enforced the arguments urged by his colleague [Mr. LINN] in favor of its immediate adoption. In the course of his remarks, he dwelt particularly on the fact, that, in the correspondence furnished to the Senate relative to the late negotiation between the British special minister and our Secretary of State, not one word is said about the propositions made by either party for an adjustment of the claims to the Columbia river. The President's message alluded to "informal communications," but they are not found in the correspondence furnished to the Senate. The resolution makes two inquiries: one as to the "nature and extent of these informal communications;" and the other as to the "reasons which prevented any agreement on the subject at present," and which made it "inexpedient to include the subject among the subjects of formal negotiations."

There could be no reason for withholding the nature of the conference in those particulars. There is no necessity for State secrets in this country. Our right to the Columbia river, and all the territory we claim in that region, is undoubted; and we assert it to the world. If Great Britain has a claim, let it too be taken in hand, and spread before the world. The delay had been entirely to her advantage. When all the subjects of negotiation were in our hands, we could have coerced Great Britain to recognise our rights; but by postponing this subject, and settling others, we parted with the means of insisting on our rights, and strengthened her claim. If Great Britain has a better claim, let her show it. There was nothing to be ashamed of in the matter, if it was an honest claim. We made no secret of the nature of our claim. There should be none about the propositions to put the question of right at rest. The correspondence and nature of the conference on other subjects, not included in the treaty, were made known; and why not all relating to this subject of the Columbia river and Northwest territory? The resolution was not only proper, but necessary; and he hoped it would be adopted. If the opposition to it was persisted in, he should call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. LINN said there was a particular point involved in the resolution, which, probably, his honorable friends were not acquainted with. It was founded upon certain informal conversations which took place between Mr. Gallatin and the British ministry, in London, respecting the intention of the British Government to district the territory of Oregon. The British had asserted their intention to insist upon the extension of their boundary to the forty-ninth parallel of latitude, and along that parallel to the Columbia—taking in the whole valley of the Columbia. This will, of course, deter United States citizens from settling north of the Columbia river. He (Mr. LINN) desired that the country should know precisely the state of the case. He had no desire to embarrass the Administration. If the President supposed the public interest would be jeopardied by the disclosure, he could, of course, say so; and that would be an answer to the resolution.

The question was then put on the resolution, and it was adopted.

ASSUMPTION OF STATE DEBTS.

Mr. BENTON'S resolution, offered yesterday, was taken up for consideration, and read as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to inform the Senate whether the late special minister from Great Britain to the United States made any proposition, informally or otherwise, to the negotiator on the part of the United States, for the assumption or guaranty of the State debts by the Government of the United States to the holders of said debts,

Mr. ARCHER observed that, with regard to the subject of this resolution, he could furnish the Senator from Missouri with as much information as he could obtain from the executive department. As advised, he could assure the Senator that no proposition whatever, or even allusion to the subject of the assumption of the State debts, had been made in the course of the negotiation with this Government. After this answer, he submitted to the Senator from Missouri whether the resolution ought to be adopted by the Senate.

Mr. BENTON was very much pleased with the information given by the Senator from Virginia; but he would prefer having it directly from the Executive. He therefore should urge the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. ARCHER said the answer he had given was advisedly; and he understood from the department itself, that no other answer could be returned by the Executive. He did not think it right to pass a resolution calling upon the department for information already derived from it; he should therefore vote against the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. BENTON called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and resulted in the affirmative—yeas 26, nays 12, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Barrow, Bayard, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Crafts, Crittenden, Fulton, Henderson, King, Linn, McRoberts, Mangum, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, White, Wilcox, Williams, Woodbridge, Woodbury, and Wright—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Bates, Berrien, Clayton, Conrad, Evans, Graham, Huntington, Merrick, Miller, Morehead, and Phelps—12.

Engrossed bill, entitled "An act authorizing the relinquishment of sixteenth sections granted for the use of schools, and to enter other lands in lieu thereof," was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CRITTENDEN submitted the following resolutions, which were adopted.

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of creating, in the State of Kentucky, an agency for the purchase, and an establishment for the manufacture, of American water-rotted hemp, for the use of the navy of the United States; and to inquire into the expediency of establishing a navy-yard at some suitable place on the Ohio or Mississippi rivers.

Resolved, That the report of the Secretary of the Navy, made on the — instant, in relation to the manufacture of hemp, be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. CRITTENDEN made some remarks, showing that the cultivation and manufacture of hemp was a subject of great interest, not only to his constituents, but to the whole country; and appealed to the committee to which the subject was referred, to give it a full investigation.

Mr. TALLMADGE presented several memorials from the city of New York, against the repeal of the bankrupt law; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MOREHEAD moved the printing of 500 copies extra of the report of the Secretary of the Navy upon the subject of the cultivation and manufacture of hemp; which report, he said, contained much information valuable to the growers of that article.

Mr. CRITTENDEN suggested 1,500 copies; which suggestion was yielded to, and that number was ordered to be printed.

Engrossed bill entitled "An act in relation to donations of land to certain persons in Arkansas," was read the third time, and passed.

FINE ON GENERAL JACKSON.

The bill introduced by Mr. LINN, to indemnify General Jackson for the fine imposed on him at New Orleans while in the discharge of his official duty, came up for consideration, as in committee of the whole; and there being no motion to amend, it was reported to the Senate.

Mr. LINN suggested the propriety of immediately putting the bill upon its third reading; and, if there was a disposition on the part of any Senator to oppose it, the opposition could be made after it had received its third reading.

Mr. CRITTENDEN saw no good reason for exempting this bill from the usual course of legislation; and moved its reference to the Committee on the Judiciary.

This motion led to a very interesting and animated debate, in which Messrs. CRITTENDEN, LINN, HUNTINGTON, BAYARD, BUCHANAN, ALLEN, WRIGHT, and CONRAD participated, to so late an hour that it was impossible to write it out for this evening's paper, even if there had been room for its admission. The bill was finally postponed till Tuesday next.

Mr. CONRAD presented to the Senate a copy of the record of the trial of General Jackson at New Orleans, which was made out thirty years ago, by the then clerk of the court. It was,

On motion of Mr. LINN, ordered to be printed for the use of the Senate.

The civil and diplomatic bill was then read and referred to the Committee on Finance; after which,

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, December 22, 1842.

Mr. THOS. J. CAMPBELL presented a petition of 420 citizens of McMinn county, Tennessee, praying a repeal of the bankrupt law: referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SHAW presented the petition of Benjamin Watson, of Newmarket, New Hampshire, praying for a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. C. J. INGERSOLL submitted the memorial of Mary Reeside, executrix of James Reeside, deceased.

Mr. BREWSTER presented (under the rule) the petition of ship-owners, merchants, and traders, of Oswego, New York, asking that drawback may be allowed on goods exported from this country to Canada: referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Also, the report of a special committee of the Legislative Assembly of Canada, on the subject of a free trade with Great Britain in the agricultural productions of British North America, and of a protection to those productions from the competition of foreigners in the colonial and home markets, including the memorial of the colonial committee and the despatch of Lord Stanly: referred to the same committee.

Mr. J. P. KENNEDY asked the House to take up a small bill from the Senate, to authorize the issuing of a new register to, and to change the name of, the packet ship Westchester to that of the Atlantic, of New York. He said the vessel now lay in the port of New York, at a great expense, being unable to sail until this bill was passed.

The bill was taken up, read three several times, and passed.

Mr. C. H. WILLIAMS presented the proceedings of the board of mayor and aldermen of the city of Memphis, Tennessee, on the subject of the establishment of a Western armory and naval depot and dock-yard at Memphis; together with the report of Colonel D. Morrison, civil engineer; the report of the committee appointed by the board &c. &c.

He then moved that it be printed. [It was a pamphlet of some 22 pages, with accompanying maps and profile.]

Objections were made in various quarters.

Mr. WILLIAMS moved that the rules be suspended, to enable him to get in his motion; but the House refused its assent.

THE GENERAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FILLMORE said he had been much pressed to urge upon the House the necessity of disposing of the general appropriation bill. To-morrow and Saturday were set apart for the business on the private calendar, and at the other end of the avenue there was a great want of the money which this bill would appropriate; he therefore asked the House to go into Committee of the Whole on the bill entitled "A bill making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the half calendar year ending the 30th day of June, 1842."

Mr. STANLY suggested to the gentleman from New York that it would be necessary to fix some time for terminating debate on this bill; otherwise it might be run on to an unnecessary length.

Mr. FILLMORE assented; and moved a resolution fixing 2 o'clock this day to terminate debate in Committee of the Whole on this bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FILLMORE then renewed his motion that the House go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on this bill.

The motion was agreed to, and Mr. BRIGGS took the Chair.

Mr. BURNELL was entitled to the floor from the last day on which this bill was in Committee of the Whole, on the pending question to reduce the appropriation from $50,000 to $20,000, on the motion of Mr. GILMER. He first glanced at the importance of this last survey—not a particular, but a general importance to the South and to the West, as well as to the East and to the North. In this point of view he confessed he had been not a little surprised at the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. REYNOLDS] in the discussion of this question the other day. The sea was the great highway in which every part of this country was interested: there might, with some gentlemen, be a peculiar interest in the prolongation and maintenance of the Cumberland road; but there was a general interest in the removal of the obstructions that existed in this great highway of the national commerce, or the discovery of their precise position; whether at the commencement of the navigation of the Mississippi, or the Balize, at New Orleans, or at any other point of their coast. But now the proposition was virtually to abandon the survey, by cutting down the appropriation from $50,000 to $20,000, the usual annual appropriation having been $100,000; and this was put on the ground of economy—an economy which would be a saving at the spigot, and a loss at the bunghole. On what sort of principle did gentlemen put this case? In some quarters, gentlemen had taken an abstraction—and on that abstraction the question had been put, whether the lives and the property of their countrymen, to an illimitable extent, should be protected; or whether that immense interest should be sacrified, for the purpose of saving an insignificant number of dollars in the treasury. He might ask, where was it that the money in the treasury itself was raised, if it was not from the resources which commerce creates? But it had been said that the committee ought not to make any appropriation, so long as the Government could get along without it. Why, whatever might become of the people, the Government could get along without the Cumberland road; or if the whole of the river Mississippi were choked up with snags; or if every light house on the coast were extinguished. The argument was in favor of economy; and the trade of a great nation was to be put against a few thousand dollars in the treasury! Why did they want the snags taken out of the Mississippi? And here he would direct the attention of the committee to the recently received relations of the destruction of property in the western district of this country; and he would tell the gentlemen from the West, that he, as a Northern man, wished to see the Western gentlemen bring forward their bills, and he should be treacherous to his constituents if he did not stand by and see the obstructions to Western navigation all removed. That was the ground on which he stood as one of this national committee. Now, during the last seventeen months, there had been sixty-nine vessels wrecked on the Mississippi, in consequence of obstructions to its navigation; and yet the gentleman from Virginia had proposed to reduce the appropriation for the coast survey from $50,000 to $20,000; and he would reduce it to $10,000 if he could have his own way. Why, those wrecked vessels were, perhaps, worth $10,000; but the Government could get on, according to some gentlemen, without the removal of the snags from the river!

Again: look at the seaboard at the other end of the great natural highway. Why, within a very limited period, 575 souls had gone down to a watery death, never to rise again. He could not tell them the amount of property which had been lost on that coast, but it was immense; and discoveries had been made by this coast survey which were of the utmost importance to navigation and the preservation of commerce, though they might be deemed of no importance to the Government. He confessed he was sorry to hear such narrow views expressed as those to which he had been alluding—and made, too, by gentlemen to whom this survey was important, although, in their native counties, they did not hear the raging of the storm. He could scarcely deem it necessary to state, much less to argue, the necessity of the survey of the coast of a country which had 2,240,000 tons of shipping—a nation only second in the world in amount of its shipping, the first having but 2,800,000 tons!

He then noticed several shoals in his own neighborhood, about whose position and extent there had been much controversy, and the consequent loss of time which was occasioned by the sweeping route which its uncertain position compelled vessels to take; and, also, to the inaccuracy with which shoals had been hitherto laid down, whereby both lives and property had been sacrificed. These shoals were found on every part of their coast; and, in consequence of the uncertainty attending their positions, wrecks occurred; and the owners of one wrecked vessel alone had suffered recently to the extent of $50,000. He could appeal to his friends from Maine, (whose constituents were deeply interested in this survey, especially those engaged in the lumber trade;) but he took it for granted that a survey of the coast was deemed necessary to all parts of the country, and that a wise economy would dictate it to the Government, for the sake more particularly of every part of the nation where there was a surplus of products, and a desire to send that surplus to market.

It was, however, proposed to abandon the survey now; and it was added, that it could be resumed by-and-by. He looked upon this survey as one of the most splendid monuments of human genius which science had ever erected in the world; and he represented Mr. Hassler as entitled to the nation's gratitude; and as regarded the survey, in point of economy, he considered its continuance as the most economical course that could be pursued. The work was in progress; the difficulties attendant on the commencement of all great works had been surmounted; skill was employed, which the country had paid for, and instruments and vessels were provided. If, therefore, these persons were disbanded, and these instruments and vessels were disposed of, they would not only lose all they had been acquiring, but a very large expenditure would be requisite whenever the work was resumed, which its continuance would not call for.

Some conversation here ensued between Mr. BURNELL and Mr. AYCRIGG on the points disputed at an earlier period of the debate.

Mr. BURNELL then proceeded to show the necessity of the continuance of the survey: first, by calling attention to the discoveries which had been already made, and the partial advantages which it had afforded; and then by stating, particularly, certain errors respecting the positions of shoals, which had occasioned the loss of property equal to the whole cost of the survey; and the absolute necessity which existed of affording to mariners correct charts for their guidance.

Mr. C. J. INGERSOLL said he did not rise so much to make a speech, as to state a motion which he should submit, in case the pending motion was voted down. He had taken great pains to be correctly informed as to this survey; and he was convinced that it was a subject of great national importance, and on no account to be abandoned. He was equally satisfied and convinced that Mr. Hassler's supervision was the best that could be obtained in the country. Without, then, intending to imply any want of confidence in Mr. Hassler, he was still convinced that $25,000 a year might be saved by simply requiring our own officers of the army and navy to perform the duties, for performing which others were paid so highly. He should move to insert the following proviso to the appropriation:

Provided, The superintendent shall have no power over the disposition of said money; but that the officers of the army and navy shall be exclusively employed upon the survey of the coast, under the direction of the Secretaries of War and the Navy, respectively.

By reference to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, it would be seen what large sums had been expended. In 1833, $20,000 was expended; in 1836, $47,000; in 1837, $91 000; in 1838, $88,000; in 1839, $88,000; in 1840, $68,000; during the first two quarters of 1841, about $34,000; and for the expenses of the hydrographic parties from 1835 to 1841, $32,000. There had also been expended, in the shape of extra pay to officers of the army and navy, (being the difference between their regular pay and their allowance when employed on the survey) $114,584. It would be perceived that the sum appropriated was annually increased, and it was not until within a year or two past that $100,000 was annually appropriated. He saw no reason why the increase had been made. In the report, he found a long list of officers with large salaries; and, in fact, Mr. Hassler had more money at his disposal than any officer of the Government except the President.

He agreed with his friend from Illinois, [Mr. REYNOLDS,] that if the officers educated at West Point Academy were not capable of making surveys required by the Government, it was high time the country should be informed of the fact. Mr. Hassler, too, was old; and it could not be expected that a man so advanced in life would long survive to be at the head of the survey. Acting upon this fact, he thought we should be training our officers to succeed him in the performance of his invaluable services. That those officers should be allowed extra pay when making surveys, he thought essentially wrong. Our navy officers were now paid liberally—higher than those of any other navy in the world. Should the committee vote down the motion pending, (which seemed to him to be a mere forcible cutting down of the appropriation, without rhyme or reason,) he should move that they be employed to the exclusion of other persons who were now paid high salaries by the Government.

Mr. MALLORY said he was aware of the anxiety of the committee that the debate should be brought to a close; yet, he felt it to be due to himself, as the chairman of the select committee, not to permit the question to be taken without offering a few remarks. He regretted that this discussion should have taken place in advance of the report of the select committee, because he was convinced that, when that report should have been made, the evidence by which it would be accompanied would bear him out in what he had said when he last addressed the committee, as well as what he should now say. He was no enemy to the coast survey; but it was because of his great anxiety to have it finished that he had instituted the inquiry to know why, after the expenditure of $100,000 a year, (making a gross sum of $750,000 to $900,000,) no practical results had been accomplished, except three pitiful charts, one of which was known to be incorrect. Gentlemen might make light of this; but those who are acquainted with maritime affairs know that it was by no means a light matter to have charts placed in the hands of mariners which were incorrect. But the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BURNELL] seemed to think that it made no difference how the scale was, so the chart itself was correct.

Mr. BURNELL explained. What he had said was, that the survey might be very accurate, and yet the scale of the chart so placed as to give an erroneous idea.

Mr. MALLORY resumed. As he had said, after the expenditure of (to speak in round numbers) $800,000; after the employment of one brig, four schooners, twenty barges, and scores of men from the army and navy, for ten years, nothing perceptible had been done—nothing to show to the country for this vast expenditure of money! And yet, because he had instituted inquiries, and investigated the proceedings of this extraordinary prodigy of science—this Galileo—this Sophocles—this Nestor—this Ferdinand R. Hassler;—because he had presumed to question a man thus plastered with praise by gentlemen here, he was to be charged with having been guilty of a scandalum magnatum! Surely, no philosopher of ancient or modern times ever had such eulogies passed upon him. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HOLMES] might say that he felt rebuked that a committee of the House—men learned only in the alphabet of science—should interpose to correct such a mathematician as Hassler. But he (Mr. M.) felt rebuked from a different cause. He felt rebuked for the army and navy of his country—rebuked to think that none of the officers were capable of conducting the surveys ordered by the Government. It would seem, from passing events, that Congress had to deal with a privileged order of men, and that it could not call in question the conduct of any of the officers and employees of this Government, without bringing upon itself a shower of denunciation and abuse. These complaints on the part of interested individuals had become stereotyped; and, a few days since, a correspondence was even carried on between a gentleman advocating Mr. Hassler on the floor, and a portion of his corps of observation in the gallery. It might be a part of Mr. Hassler's diplomacy to have this corps of observation in the gallery, instead of in the field; and he wondered that the friends and eulogists of that gentleman did not think of him as a fit person to conduct the negotiations with Lord Ashburton.

But, the time admonished him that he must hurry on with his remarks. Eccentricity was, with him, no excuse for arrogance and insolence, and confusion of ideas was no test of greatness; for, when he was a school-boy, one of the first lessons taught him was, that the individual whose head thought clearly, always spoke clearly and wrote clearly. So much in reply to his colleague's remarks on Mr. Hassler's eccentricities and confusion of ideas. But he was known in Europe, gentlemen said. How known? and for what? What had he done to cause his name to be known throughout the world? Any common navigator and mathematician, with one little vessel, could have traced out the soundings of a few bays and rivers, as well as this Galileo, Sophocles, or Marshal Blucher has done it, (for Mr. Hassler had been compared by his eulogists to all these great men.) In one respect, it appeared to him that it did require the talents of Marshal Blucher to conduct this great army and squadron of the coast survey. What were they? First, there was his Noah's ark, with its four foaming steeds; next, his theodolitse; vertical and reflecting circles; transit instruments; his box-chronometers; mounted barometers, (on horseback, he supposed,) reflecting telescopes, thermometers, and alhidades; his arm-protractors; his microscopic comparateur; his subdivided kilogrammes; micrometer screws; and, last, his box of wooden legs. These (said Mr. M.) are the accoutrements of the commander-in-chief. Then we have a brilliant array of army officers, with their sixty tents, with a retinue of wagons and horses. Then came the navy force, headed by a captain in the navy, with several naval officers, and twenty boats, with their crews. Now, he would say that it did require the talents of Marshal Blucher to manage this grand array of naval and military force.

While speaking of the arrogance of this foreigner, he did not wish to be understood as having any hostile feelings to any foreigner that came to this country. On the contrary, he was willing that he should enjoy the same rights that he (Mr. M.) did; willing, in short, to place him on the same footing with himself; but he was unwilling that he should exalt himself above every other man in the country, and to see the Congress of the United States endorse the calumny. Such was the prejudice of this foreigner against the United States, that he would not even get the copper for his plates in this country, but sent for them to Europe; and when he did get it, it was found to be worthless, and unfit for the purpose. He also sent to Hamburgh for two engravers, when it was well known that there were a number of engravers in this country capable of executing any work that might be given them. Speaking of his arrogance, there was not a department of the Government, in which he had not given a sample of it. He was first attached to the Navy Department, and at one time he had several serious difficulties with Secretary Dickerson. Then he was transferred to the Treasury Department, and we find him there (said Mr. M.) conducting a voluminous correspondence with the Secretary about his pay, and the pay of those under his command. Though so much had been said about his disinterestedness, yet he was willing to absent himself from his duties for months, to squable with the departments about the amount of his compensation. And as to his great qualifications—why, he tells you himself, in one of his reports, that he was five years getting ready to begin his work; and all that time, too, drawing full day from the Government.

One instance of Mr. Hassler's want of temper, and disrespect to Congress, he would mention. The committee, anxious to ascertain when the charts of the surveys that had been made could be published, with the cost of them, inquired of the engraver who was summoned before them, what the cost of engraving them would be. He answered, that he could not tell without seeing the manuscript charts: Upon this, the committee addressed a letter to Mr. H., which was sent by the engraver, requesting him to permit that gentleman to see the charts, and telling him the purpose for which they were to be inspected. The engraver came back to the committee-room, and said that Mr. H. refused to let him see the charts, and had used language, both towards the committee and Congress, so exceedingly disrespectful, that he would not like to repeat it. This would be sufficient to show the temper of this Galileo, who was always courting inquiry, and, when it was instituted, loudly complained about persecution. Here was a letter from Mr. H., in reply to the respectful note addressed to him by the committee, which he would ask the Clerk to read, in order to show the temper of this man, and the disrespectful manner in which he treated a committee of the House.

Mr. WISE objected to the reading of that letter. It was a part of the journal of the committee; and he, as a member of the committee, protested against the reading of any part of its journal, unless all the members of the committee had access to it, to make a report.

Mr. MALLORY said that the papers of the committee had passed freely about from member to member; and Mr. Hassler himself had been permitted to take a copy of his evidence, for the purpose of explaining it; though, in doing so, he made about ten lines for every one of his testimony, and confused it so that it would take a Philadelphia lawyer to understand it. He would not, however, violate the rules of the House by reading the letter, though it would seem but fair that he should be permitted to do what other gentlemen had done in the course of the debate. His colleague, the other day, in his remarks, made use of testimony that was before the committee; and the friends of Mr. Hassler had made use of information derived from the officers of the coast survey.

[Here several gentlemen called for the reading of the letter; and it was read, as follows:

WASHINGTON, May 30, 1842.

SIR: The unprovoked insult offered to me by sending the engraver Stone to me to inspect the work of the coast survey is the map of New York, is too much, as well for the powers of the committee, as for the feelings of an honest man.

You know that the maps of the coast survey cannot be engraved but in the office under my own inspection. You know that the map in question is already cut up in plates, two of which are under the engraver's hands nearly finished, two others just beginning, for two more the drawing is nearly finished, and two more are half finished drawings.

You know that the engraver Stone is in no way qualified to do such work, nor that I could be made responsible for any of his doings. Hence you cannot otherwise but conclude that the measure you begin is destructive to the work, therefore to the execution and expenses hitherto incurred, therefore directly opposite to the aim professed by the committee to favor the coast survey work.

No man can expect that I, who am answerable for the work, could be compelled to give the final execution in the hands of a man in whom I have not the slightest reason to have any confidence whatever.

I consider the sending of Stone to inspect my work, as he said first, an unmerited insult; and I am certain that every member of the committee, placed in my situation, would consider it so.

With best respect and good wishes,
Your obedient servant,
F. R. HASSLER.

Hon. FRANCIS MALLORY,
Chairman of the Committee on the Coast Survey.

Here was a specimen (Mr. M. said) of the temper and ability of this Galileo, who reminded him of Paracelsus of old, the greatest boaster of the age he lived in. This empyric said that he had discovered an elixir, the drinking of which would render a man immortal; yet he died with a vial of it in his pocket.

Now, as he had but little time left him, he would give the reasons why he thought the superintendence of this coast survey should be placed in other hands. Though Mr. M. had been for such a number of years employed in this work, no part of the survey was yet complete. When the committee examined him, they found that there had been no deep soundings from Point Judith to the Delaware; and when questioned on that subject, he answered that it could not be done unless Congress would make an additional appropriation of one hundred thousand dollars. He said that he had discovered great errors in Bowditch and the American Almanac as to the latitude and longitude of several parts of the coast; and yet he has not made them public, so that his discoveries are of no manner of benefit to navigators. Then, as to the Gedney channel, for which so much credit has been given him on that floor. Why, he did not discover it. It was discovered by Capt. Gedney, an officer of the navy, and though it was discovered as long ago as 1835, it was not yet published. Then the famous shoal in the Delaware, of which so much was said by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. J. R. INGERSOLL,] was discovered three years ago, and no chart of it has yet been published. One great objection to him was the slow progress he had made in the work, and the probability that it would be equally slow in future. We have a coast of 3,000 miles in extent, and only 300 of it has yet been surveyed. Now, any school boy, with his slate, could calculate that, if it took ten years to go round 300 miles, it would take one hundred years to go round 3,000. None but a Rosicrucian, therefore, could expect to see the completion of the work. Whether it was to cost two or twenty millions, no man could tell. When Mr. Hassler was asked that question, he could give no information on the subject. In conclusion, Mr. M. said that the direction of the work ought to be changed. It ought to be placed under the charge of the officers of the army and navy; and, by this means, a saving could be effected of $40,000 a year.

The hour having arrived at which, by the resolution adopted this morning, the debate was to terminate, Mr. M. was cut short in his remarks, and took his seat.

Mr. GILMER then modified his resolution by substituting $10,000 for $20,000, so as to strike out $50,000 and insert $10,000.

Mr. SPRIGG asked if it would be in order to move a division of the question.

The CHAIR said that it would not.

Mr. TRIPLETT inquired what course gentlemen were to take who wanted the appropriation stricken out altogether. He did not want to vote a cent.

The CHAIR said that, after the question was taken on the pending motion, it would be in order to move to strike out the whole clause.

The question was then taken by tellers, (Messrs. WELLER and TRIPLETT,) on Mr. GILMER's motion, and carried—ayes 82, noes 63.

So the appropriation was reduced from $50,000 to $10,000.

Mr. GWIN then moved to strike out the whole clause making an appropriation for the coast survey; and the question having been taken by tellers, (Messrs. BLACK and C. J. INGERSOLL) was carried—ayes 79, noes 64.

So the appropriation for the coast survey was stricken out.

Mr. TILLINGHAST offered an amendment, appropriating $5,000 for preparing and publishing an account of the exploring expedition; which was adopted.

Mr. SPRIGG moved to strike out the appropriation of $25,000 for the custom-house at Boston: rejected—ayes 47, noes not counted.

Mr. THOMPSON of Indiana offered an amendment, to come in after the clause providing for miscellaneous claims, that no part of that sum should be applied to the furnishing the new custom-house at the city of New York: carried—ayes 64, noes 62.

The clause making appropriations for light-houses having been read and concurred in—

Mr. SPRIGG offered an amendment, providing that the Secretary of the Treasury shall cause an account to be kept of all the expenditures, of every description whatsoever, in relation to light-houses; and that he report the same annually to Congress: rejected—ayes 55, noes 71.

Mr. McKEON moved to strike out the appropriation for the pay of ministers to Prussia, Austria, Spain, and Brazil: lost without a count.

Mr. McKEON moved to strike out the whole clause making an appropriation for the salaries of chargés des affaires to Portugal, Denmark, Sweden Holland, Belgium, Chili, Peru, Venezuela, New Grenada, Texas, Naples, and Sardinia: lost without a division.

Mr. C. J. INGERSOLL offered an amendment appropriating $5,000 for the pay of a commercial agent to Europe: rejected.

[The reporter has been furnished by Mr. INGERSOLL with the following, as the substance of the remarks he would have made, had he not been prohibited from doing so by the resolution which cut off further debate on the bill.]

Mr. C. J. INGERSOLL hardly expected his motion to succeed, because the project was novel, involving expense, and a new office. Yet he would explain why he was convinced it ought; believing that, eventually, it would; for the more it came to be considered, the greater favor it would find. The productive interest of this great country is immense, and may be much improved by Government. During the current year, two million two hundred thousand bales of cotton, incalculable quantities of grain, meat, coal, lumber, and other staples, have sprung from the soil, craving consumers. They are all cheap beyond former experience. While superabundant here, there is crying want of them in other countries. We have a vast deal more than we can consume, while they want a vast deal more than they can get, merely because commercial restrictions prevent our supplying them, and thereby greatly augmenting our navigating wealth, too.

What I propose is a cheap and rational endeavor to promote an object so desirable, by a commercial agency—national, but not political—productive, not diplomatic—a foreign minister, to represent abroad not the Government, but the produce of the United States—the cotton, grain, meats, coal, rice, lumber, and whatever else our teeming mother earth annually brings forth for the comfort of mankind, to clothe, feed, warm, and make them happy. This House did originate such a minister for one staple—tobacco; and the minister plenipotentiary of the United States to Austria is, in fact, nothing more than a tobacco agent. All our foreign ministers are, indeed, but commercial agents; and what I propose is, to aid them by an attorney ad hoc, whose sole business shall be to remove the obstacles to more extended American commerce, by demonstrating to foreign Governments—and, more than Governments, by convincing foreign nations—that it is their interest not to let their people suffer while we can easily and cheaply prevent it. Our political foreign ministers are well enough in their orbits; though we have too many little ones. But what we want is not politicians, or even statesmen; but practical men of business, without the parade or restraint of diplomacy, yet with the recommendation and support of Government, to enlighten the understanding, and enlist the interests of other countries—to awaken their minds to the demonstrable policy of improving their condition, by connecting it with what we have and they have not, fairly exchanged for what they have more than we. Foreign political ministers alone cannot do this: consuls still less. They are both stationary—the consuls without salaries, mostly merchants, having their livelihood to earn. What we want is intelligent men, to go everywhere, mix informally with all classes, act in every proper way on public opinion, break inveterate habits and prejudices, and bring about convictions undoubtedly rational.

Perhaps twice as much cotton as is raised in the United States could be wrought in France and Germany, where the cheap labor, the ingenious handicrafts, the taste and scientific knowledge, exceed those of England; and the filations and industrial progress of both those great countries, and in developments as energetic as those of Great Britain, from 1810 to 1830; and in neither France nor Germany has American cotton any rival home-interest, such as English India. The late German trade union—called, I believe, Zoll Verein—has, no doubt, not escaped the attention of our Government, where Prussian, Austrian, and perhaps other ministers must be alive to its vast importance to American commerce. But such ministers, with their formal correspondence, cannot see all that the occasion calls for. This is the moment of universal peace and universal struggle for productive independence of British manufacturing supremacy. We ought to strain every nerve for our share of the wealth of nations. We ought to have special, informal agencies to recommend, explain, and introduce our staples. A friendly feeling is said to exist in Germany towards our intercourse. It certainly did in France; and even yet does, notwithstanding our late most ill-advised acts of Congress to alienate the French. The consumption of our rice has considerably increased through the northern German ports, I believe, since, by mutual concessions, we have cultivated more dealings with them. The same thing may be done for cotton, coal, meats, grain, and lumber, with Germany, France, and England too, by similar means. The increased consumption of our cotton might be immense. But we must act with all our faculties—by commercial as well as diplomatic instrumentality—and do it without delay. Now is the very time, when all Europe is casting about to remodel their industry, with all good will, to cultivate our acquaintance; and we are groaning with excessive production, clamoring for consumers. Habit in Europe is an umpire we have no idea of, which it requires revolution to change; and we must not let those great customers acquire the habit of using Egyptian, South American, or East India cotton, inferior to ours. We can beat them all easily, at any price. And so of several other great staples. Reciprocal commercial concessions would soon work miracles for us in all the countries of Europe, just now shaking off the English yoke. But, for this accomplishment we must not rely on our foreign ministers, or consuls, or merchants alone. Government must interpose by special agency to dispel prejudice, impress information, enlighten public sentiment, (especially the press,) and by all fair, open, and active action, carry conviction home upon communities.

See what the late English duties act has done in the way of awakening them to the advantage of being supplied with American meat. And not only Great Britain, but France may be supplied with it. Pork, for instance, worth 3 or 4 cents a pound in Cincinnati, would bring from 12 to 16 in Lyons or Toulon, as well as London and Dublin. Of the nine hundred thousand people of Paris, and two millions of London, many thousands are half starved because they cannot pay 12 cents for pork we can sell them at six. The whole Western country, with its inexhaustible productions of food and clothing, is vitally interested in the measure I propose.

American cotton—the mightiest of staples, before which even iron is eclipsed—hitherto the sun of the world of industry—may be readily made to supersede Egyptian, South American, and East India cotton, which, for coarse fabrics, is used in France, Germany, and Switzerland; but, to do that, habit must be overcome. Egyptian cotton, introduced mostly through French ports, has had considerable foothold in many parts of Europe. The ascertained consumption, the kinds preferred, and the quantity and quality that might be wanted, regularly published by an American agent ad hoc, would be reliable information to our cotton-growers, alone worth much more than all the cost of the agency I propose. Merchants know that mercantile prices current are often published, and circulars disseminated, to conceal, not tell the truth, for the benefit of speculators. Fine North American cotton, which cannot be rivalled by Egypt, Brazil, or India, is to clothe men, ships, and dwellings throughout the world, and render it tributary to this country, if it will but do justice to that inestimable production, of which even the various uses yet remain to be discovered. The agency proposed should bend its whole force to the greater establishment of this; and might, at least, double our export of it.

Another American growth may, I think, be familiarized to European adoption—stone coal. The industry of France is cramped for want of fuel. There is none but very inferior wood, costing at Paris about $18 the cord. English coal is subjected to a heavy export duty before it leaves England, and a heavy impost in France; so that it is not used there. Coal from Belgium is taken to France; but it is not near as good, or, I believe, as cheap as our coal. It is bituminous. What French coal there may be is inaccessible, for want of roads and canals to it. Now, Pennsylvania coal, if taken to France as ballast, might be delivered there at less than one-third of the price of French fire-wood; and if even paying freight, at about one-half, I suppose—at from five dollars to eight dollars the ton. Connected with cotton, what a prodigious impulse it might give to French industry! I have long thought that the coal-miners, or even the Legislature of Pennsylvania, ought to send a coal agent to France, without waiting the action of Congress. But the commercial agency I propose would embrace all our staples—cotton, coal, grain, meat, rice, lumber, and others.

I have not mentioned tobacco, because I believe it would be by far the most difficult to get introduced freely. But there is no reason why the commercial agency suggested should not embrace tobacco with the rest.

It is not necessary to point out the advantages of such commercial extension to navigation. But it ought to be added, that its success would be the best remedy for the evils of the bad currency, which all agree we suffer under.

I have but sketched what might be drawn at large. It would be easy to carry these views much further, to explain their intimate connexion with our currency—our very Union itself. But I omit much that might be presented, confining myself to the shortest intimation of what I am sure the more it is thought of, the more convincing it will prove, when abler and more practical minds than mine come to consider it. American cotton, coal, grain, rice, meat, lumber—all the principal staples of this teeming country, need but foreign markets for their exports to be increased beyond belief. They are as much needed abroad as they are superabundant at home. A few thousand dollars—not more than a very few days of debate, or even of adjournment of Congress, cost—would amply pay a special agent, (or more than one, if deemed advisable,) to visit the capitals and other proper places of Europe, openly and freely to enlighten public sentiment, enlist private interest, incline Governments, inform the press, and prevail on nations to cultivate a greater commercial intercourse than now exists with this people. We have been, I think, extremely remiss in this endeavor. I took the liberty of mentioning it personally to the last administration; I have taken the same liberty with the present; without much encouragement from either. I now lay it before Congress and before the country, hardly flattering myself that it will have immediate acceptance; but well assured that the more it is thought of, the more favor it will find. One such agent as is contemplated for a sum insignificant in amount, if properly selected—no party hack or mere personal favorite—may render more public service than two-thirds of the diplomatic instruments we maintain abroad. Mr. I. concluded by invoking the aid of those representing the interests of cotton, and coal, and grain, and meat, on the floor, to support his motion. It asks for a very small sum, which, even if all his notions on the subject were unsound, would be less than is continually paid for printing some useless document, or paying some undeserving applicant. If even partially successful, its results would be inestimably valuable. It is a kind of cheap utilitarian mission, more deserving of attention than all the sham diplomacy we send abroad. If this plan had been recommended by the Executive, and introduced by a committee heralded by a report, there would be no doubt of its adoption. The Committee of the Whole would determine whether an individual effort, without any such advantages, is deserving of support.

Mr. T. W. WILLIAMS moved to add an appropriation for the salary of the consul at Beyrout, in Syria, $500: rejected without a division.

Mr. MERIWETHER offered the following amendment:

And be it further enacted, That no part of any appropriation hereby made, shall be transferred to any other object than that for which it is specifically appropriated.

Rejected.

Mr. McKENNAN submitted the following amendment:

Provided, further, That it shall not be lawful for any clerk appointed after the commencement of the present session of Congress to be allowed or paid out of any moneys appropriated by this act, only at the lowest rate of salary authorized by law to the clerkships in the office where such clerk may be so appointed: And provided, further, That the senior efficient experienced clerks in office previously to the commencement of the present session of Congress shall be allowed and paid at the higher rates of salary, according to their seniority in office, and their efficiency and experience in the business of the office wherein they are employed, and of which efficiency and experience the immediate head thereof shall judge and determine.

Rejected without a count.

On motion by Mr. FILLMORE, the bill was further amended by inserting an appropriation for the contingent expenses of the bureau of navy yards and docks, $250.

On motion by Mr. FILLMORE, the committee then rose, and reported the bill to the House as amended.

Mr. YORKE moved the previous question; which motion prevailed, and the House immediately proceeded to vote upon the amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WISE asked for the yeas and nays on concurring with the committee in striking out the appropriation of $50,000 for the coast survey under Hassler's superintendence; and they were ordered.

The House concurred by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Landaff W. Andrews, Sherlock J. Andrews, Arnold, Arrington, Atherton, Aycrigg, Babcock, Beeson, Bidlack, Black, Boardman, Botts, Boyd, Brewster, Bronson, Aaron V. Brown, Milton Brown, Charles Brown, Burke, William Butler, William O. Butler, Green W. Caldwell, Patrick C. Caldwell, William B. Campbell, Thomas J. The amendment of the committee reducing the appropriation for the contingent expenses of the Bureau of Medicine and Surgery to $200, was nonconcurred in.

The remaining amendments were concurred in.

Mr. C. J. INGERSOLL attempted to get in an amendment reducing the appropriation for the Judiciary; but

The SPEAKER ruled him out of order, inasmuch as the previous question had been ordered.

The engrossment of the bill was then ordered.

Mr. FILLMORE asked the unanimous consent of the House to have the question now taken on its passage.

The bill was then read a third time, and passed.

OHIO RIVER.

Mr. W. W. IRWIN offered the following resolution; which was adopted:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and is hereby, directed to cause to be communicated to the House of Representatives, as soon as convenient, the report by Captain George W. Hughes, of the United States corps of topographical engineers, of his late reconnoissance and survey of the Ohio river.

The SPEAKER submitted a number of Executive communications, as follows:

1. A communication from the Treasury Department, transmitting the report of F. R. Hassler, upon the progress of the coast survey; also, a report upon the subject of the standard weights and measures: referred to the Select Committee.

2. A communication from the Treasury Department, covering the annual report and list of insolvent debtors in the United States: referred to the Judiciary Committee.

3. A communication from the Navy Department, in answer to the resolution of the House, passed 17th December, calling for information in relation to the dry dock contemplated at Brooklyn: referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. FILLMORE moved that the communication be also printed.

Which motion was opposed by Mr. WISE.

After debate, it was carried—ayes 83, noes not counted.

COAST SURVEY BY NAVY OFFICERS.

Mr. MERIWETHER offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Select Committee on the Coast Survey inquire into the propriety of dispensing with the topographical survey of the same; of limiting the number of persons (including the superintendents and assistants) engaged therein; and of employing officers of the navy in the same.

Mr. WISE remarked, that all that was embraced in the resolution was now under consideration by the select committee raised at the last session, and continued at the present. He pledged himself, as a member of that committee, to investigate the whole subject, and to summon every topographical engineer in the city to testify; and he ventured to say, that if all the testimony already taken had been read, the House would not have come to such a vote as it did to-day, when the whole appropriation for the survey was stricken out.

Mr. EVERETT was of opinion that a blow had been to-day struck at the coast survey, from which he doubted if it ever would survive. Besides the intrinsic usefulness of such a survey to the country, it was due to our national pride that it should be kept up, and the United States thereby contribute its share to the science of the world. He then commented upon the evil effects which would flow from the casting a suspicion abroad that Mr. Hassler was a humbug. Such a course would, he thought, destroy the efficiency of any successor who might be appointed in resuscitating the work.

Mr. CHARLES BROWN said the House had struck no blow at the coast survey, as was asserted by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] and the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. EVERETT;] it had only decided that it would relieve the treasury of the country from an annual expenditure of one hundred thousand dollars, and the survey from the paralyzing influence of a superannuated superintendent and his corps, and place the whole under the officers of the navy and army of the United States, where it ought always to have been. If the Government had no officers in its navy and army capable of carrying on the work, it was time it had; and which, if it had not, it could soon get. He hoped, therefore, that the resolution of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. MERIWETHER] would be adopted; and that the committee would introduce a bill, at an early day, placing this important work under the charge of the President of the United States, to be conducted by officers of the navy and of the topographical engineers of the army—of those officers that the Government had been educating, at a large expense, for forty years. He had not the least doubt but, under them, the survey would be as well done, and far more expeditiously, than under Mr. Hassler.

Mr. WISE would merely say that our engineers, from Abert and Totten down, would all declare that they were not so competent as Hassler; and not only that, but also that no other man could be found as competent.

Mr. MERIWETHER said, it was true he had voted against the appropriation to-day, and he could tell the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. EVERETT] that if a blow had been struck at the coast survey, as conducted by Mr. Hassler, he was glad that he had been enabled to assist in striking that blow.

He did not believe that there was a greater humbug in the country than this same Mr. Hassler. He was disposed to carry on the survey, because his constituents were interested in it; but they wanted it completed before the next century. Under present auspices, there was no prospect of accomplishing such a design.

The question was then taken upon the resolution, and it was adopted.

After which, the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, December 23, 1842.

Mr. CLAYTON presented the memorial of the heirs of Robert Fulton; which, in connexion with the papers on the files of the Senate relating to the claim, was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. MILLER presented a memorial from the president and directors of the Patriotic Bank of Washington, praying an extension of their charter; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. BAYARD presented memorials from the president and directors of the Bank of Potomac, and the Farmers' Bank of Alexandria, praying for an extension of their charters, respectively; which were referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. BAYARD gave notice of leave to introduce a bill to establish naval schools.

Mr. McROBERTS presented a memorial from certain citizens of Ottowa, Illinois, praying the establishment of a mail route from Ottowa, via Middle Point, to Napierville, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

On motion by Mr. TAPPAN, it was ordered that the petition of the heirs of George C. Johnson be taken from the files, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. STURGEON presented a memorial from manufacturers of furred hats in Harrisburg, Penn., praying Congress to give them incidental protection, by removing the 25 per cent. duty imposed on imported furs by the tariff of last session: referred to the Committee on Manufactures.

On motion by Mr. STURGEON, it was ordered that the petition and papers of Charles M. Keller be taken from the files of the Senate, and referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

On motion by Mr. HUNTINGTON, it was ordered that the papers of Charles Kohler be taken from the files of the Senate, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. EVANS, from the Committee on Finance, reported back, without amendment, House bill entitled "An act making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the half calendar year ending the 30th day of June, 1842."

Mr. E. gave notice that, if agreeable to the Senate, he would, at 1 o'clock, move to go into the consideration of this bill.

Also reported back, from the same committee, without amendment, Senate bill to regulate the currency of the foreign gold and silver coins.

Mr. BATES, from the Committee on Pensions, reported back, without amendment, Senate bill to regulate the compensation to pension agents.

Also reported back, from the same committee, without amendment, Senate bill to continue the office of Commissioner of Pensions.

Mr. McROBERTS, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported back, without amendment, and with a recommendation that it do pass, the bill for the relief of the Nantucket Steamboat Company.

Mr. SEVIER, on leave, introduced a bill for the relief of the persons residing within the reputed limits of the States of Arkansas and Louisiana, beyond the boundary line between the United States and the Republic of Texas, as established by the commissioners appointed to ascertain the same; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Messrs. TALLMADGE and PORTER presented memorials from the city of New York, remonstrating against the repeal of the bankrupt act; which were referred to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. WILLIAMS submitted the following resolution; which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be directed to inform the Senate whether or not any pensions for disability to officers, seamen, and marines, while in the service and receiving pay, have been paid since August 16, 1841; and if any, what has been the amount thus paid, and under what law such payments have been made, since the passage of the act of July 16, 1841.

Mr. WOODBURY presented the petition of James Rundler, praying indemnity for losses by the depreciation of funds paid him for supplies furnished the Government during the late war; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. W. also presented documents in relation to the claim of William Russell for fishing bounty; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. LINN, on leave, introduced a bill for the relief of the heirs and legal representatives of Madame De Lusser; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Also, introduced a bill for the relief of Elizabeth Munroe; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Also, a bill for the relief of Capt. J. Throckmorton; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HENDERSON, on leave, introduced a bill to confirm the survey and location of claims to land in the State of Mississippi, east of Pearl river, and south of the thirty-first degree of north latitude; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Also, introduced a joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to settle, on certain terms, the liabilities of the sureties of Gordon D. Boyd, late receiver of public moneys at Columbus, Mississippi; which was twice read, and referred to the Judiciary Committee.

The following resolution, submitted by Mr. BARROW on yesterday, was taken up and agreed to, viz:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of granting to the State of Louisiana every alternate section of the public lands in the limits of that State, which have been returned as not worth the cost of survey; and each alternate section of such lands as are subject to inundation by the overflowing of the Mississippi river, on the condition that the said State construct levees, by means of which said lands shall be effectually protected, thereafter, from inundation: And provided, That the proceeds of the sales of lands reclaimed by means of such levees, shall be exclusively appropriated by the State of Louisiana to the making of roads and the improving of rivers and bayous within its limits.

AFRICAN SQUADRON AND QUINTUPLE TREATY.

The following resolution, submitted by Mr. BENTON, was taken up as one of the special orders of the day:

Resolved, That the President be requested to inform the Senate, (if compatible with the public interest,) whether the quintuple treaty, for the suppression of the slave-trade, has been communicated to the Government of the United States in any form whatever; and, if so, by whom; for what purpose; and what answer may have been returned to such communication. Also, to communicate to the Senate all the information which may have been received by the Government of the United States, going to show that the "course which this Government might take in relation to said treaty has excited no small degree of attention and discussion in Europe." Also, to inform the Senate how far the "warm animadversions," and "the great political excitement" which this treaty has caused in Europe, have any application or reference to the United States. Also, to inform the Senate what danger there was that "the laws and the obligations" of the United States in relation to the suppression of the slave-trade would be "executed by others" if we did not "remove the pretext and motive for violating our flag and executing our laws," by entering into the stipulations for the African squadron, and the remonstrating embassies which are contained in the 8th and 9th articles of the late British treaty. Also, that the President be requested to communicate to the Senate all the correspondence with our ministers abroad, relating to the foregoing points of inquiry. Also, that the President be requested to communicate to the Senate all such information upon the negotiation of the African squadron articles as will show the origin of said articles, and the history and progress of their formation.

Mr. B. said the resolution presented two distinct points of inquiry: one in relation to the quintuple treaty for the suppression of the slave-trade; the other in relation to the danger of seeing our laws in relation to the suppression of the slave-trade executed by others, if we did not execute these laws ourselves. Both inquiries arise out of the President's message of August last, in which the quintuple treaty is mentioned in a way to authorise the belief that the conduct of the allied powers has had relation to the United States; and the danger that others would execute our laws for us, if we did not enter into the African alliance: and both points were so presented, as to operate as inducements to the Senate to agree to the treaty. At the same time, the evidences of this were not given; the correspondence shed no light upon it; and there were no protocols, or minutes of conference, to show what passed between the British and American negotiators. Now, these beliefs, thus created, were either founded or not. If founded, and the great powers of Europe have actually taken cognizance of our conduct in relation to the slave trade, we, the people of the United States, ought to know it; it is due to them to know it. If not founded, then it is due to Great Britain, Austria, and Prussia, that they should be absolved from a suspicion which the message creates against them. No one can read the passages in the message without feeling that a belief of interference in our affairs is created against these sovereigns. It is not asserted, but they and their conduct are referred to in a way to excite the belief. If Mr. B. ventured any opinion, it would be, that the imputation was unfounded; and that all this parade of the quintuple allies, and the attention—discussion—animadversion—excitement—which is presented to us, was merely a scenic representation, to help on with the ratification of the treaty. With respect to the other branch of the inquiry—that in relation to executing our laws for us, if we did not execute them ourselves—he believed that there was such a threat; that it came from Great Britain; and that the people had a right to know whether it is true. As it stands, the message as good as affirms it. These were Mr. B.'s. reasons for making the call, and he was taken by surprise to see any objection to it. But objection was made; and now he must vindicate his call; and he would do it on both points of inquiry, and each in their order.

First, as to the quintuple treaty: The Senator from Virginia supposes there is nothing to be communicated, and therefore resists the call. Even if it is so, let the Government say so; let the Government say there is nothing to communicate. They will not say so. They have already said the contrary; and that in a call from the House of Representatives. They admit they have a correspondence in relation to this quintuple treaty, and promise to communicate it at the proper time. Here is the President's answer, in which the call upon him is set out—the correspondence admitted—and its communication postponed to a more suitable time.

Mr. B. then read the answer of the President to Mr. J. Q. ADAMS's call, in the following words:

To the House of Representatives:

A resolution of the House of Representatives of the 13th instant has been communicated to me, requesting, "so far as may be compatible with the public interest, a copy of the quintuple treaty between the five principal powers of Europe, for the suppression of the African slave-trade; and, also, copies of any remonstrance or protest addressed by Lewis Cass, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States at the court of France, to that Government, against the ratification by France of the said treaty; and of all correspondence between the Governments of the United States and of France; and of all communications from the said Lewis Cass to his own Government, and from this Government to him, relating thereto."

In answer to this request, I have to say that the treaty mentioned therein has not been officially communicated to the Government of the United States; and no authentic copy of it, therefore, can be furnished. In regard to the other papers requested, although it is my hope and expectation that it will be proper and convenient, at an early day, to lay them before Congress, together with others connected with the same subjects; yet, in my opinion, a communication of them to the House of Representatives, at this time, would not be compatible with the public interest.

JOHN TYLER.

WASHINGTON, June 20, 1842.

This shows that there is something to be consummated; and certainly this is the proper time for it. The negotiation is over; and there can be no reason for delaying the communication of the correspondence. Mr. B. hoped there would be no further objection to that branch of the inquiry which his resolution presented.

On the second branch of it—that of an execution of our laws and obligations by others, if we did not remove the pretext for this assumption, by entering into the African alliance. On this branch of the inquiry, he believed the reasons for having the information which was called for, were strong and irresistible. The message clearly presents the case of a threat against us on the part of Great Britain; and the question is, Is this true? If true, the country is insulted—the nation dishonored—by cowering under it. If untrue, Great Britain is wronged, by being presented as hectoring over us, when, in fact, she was not. Taken either way—and we want the facts—we want to see on what foundation this part of the message rests. This is the more necessary, because the correspondence is dead silent—silent as the grave—on all that relates to this African squadron. Not a word upon it in the one hundred and twenty pages of correspondence which was communicated to the Senate, to enlighten it upon the formation of the treaty! There is a head for it, but nothing under the head! not one word between the two negotiators! See the document, page 84, and the section headed "SUPPRESSION OF THE AFRICAN SLAVE-TRADE—EXTRADITION;" and all in glaring capitals, as if we were going to see all that passed between the two negotiators on the point of this suppression; when not a word is to be found. The extradition—this is to say, the surrender of fugitive criminals—has one note, of half a page, to say that this article for the delivery of fugitives would not be binding upon Great Britain until ratified by Parliament; and after that, his Lordship vanishes from the chapter. He is seen or heard of no more in the eight pages which follow on the suppression of the slave-trade: the whole is confined to our Secretary and a couple of naval officers—the British minister not even appearing to be cognizant of what they were about! Look at it, and follow the papers as they rise, and see what a figure they present. The first is from Captain Paine, of the United States navy, to Mr. Webster, dated May 2, 1842, and is in answer to inquiries which are not given! Mr. Webster's letter to Captain Paine is not given; and how the Captain came to make this communication is only to be guessed at; for there is no clew to its production. It is, however, a letter of much interest, and gives the history of the little Sierra Leone anti-slave-trade treaty between a British and an American officer, which was so promptly, so patriotically, so nobly rejected by Mr. Van Buren in 1840. A part of the object of the letter seems to have been to complain to the new administration of the manner in which the past administration had rejected and rebuked that little treaty—the seminal principle of the present African alliance. Mr. Paulding, as Secretary of the Navy, and speaking in the name of President Van Buren, says, in relation to the arrangement made at Sierra Leone, to Captain Paine:

"Such a delegation of power is not only unauthorized by your instructions, but contrary to the established and well-known principles and policy of your Government; and is, therefore, not sanctioned by the department."

This was a pretty pointed rebuke to Capt. Paine, who had made the arrangement with Capt. Tucker, of her Britannic Majesty's sloop-of-war the Wolverine. As such, Capt. Paine seems to have felt it; and thus signified his feelings in the concluding sentence of his letter:

"Any expression of my opinion of Mr. Paulding's letter to me would have been improper, and would still be indecorous. I shall be grateful to be informed if you think any explanation or defence necessary. I have never believed so."

The correspondence does not show whether the Secretary thought any defence or explanation on the part of Capt. Paine necessary; but he proceeded immediately to console his feelings by making an arrangement of a still stronger character with Great Britain, and availing himself of all Capt. Paine's information to facilitate its conclusion. On the 30th day of April, 1842, the Secretary addresses eight queries to Captains Bell and Paine on the subject of the African slave-trade, of which the 6th, 7th, and 8th are in these words:

"6. The utility of employing vessels of different nations to cruise together, so that one or the other might have a right to visit and search every vessel which might be met with under suspicious circumstances, either as belonging to the country of the vessel visiting and searching, or to some other country which has, by treaty, conceded such right of visitation and search."

"7. To what places slaves from slave-ships could be most conveniently taken."

"8. Finally, what number of vessels, and of what size, it would be necessary to employ on the western coast of Africa, in order to put an entire end to the traffic in slaves; and for what number of years it would probably be necessary to maintain such force to accomplish that purpose."

The answers to these queries are:

"6. We are of opinion that a squadron should be kept on the coast of Africa, to co-operate with the British, or other nations interested in stopping the slave-trade; and that the most efficient mode would be for vessels to cruise in couples—one of each nation."

"7. If captured under the American flag, send them to Cape Mesurado, Liberia; or, if convenient, to such other of the American settlements as the agent of the United States there may wish."

"8. As our personal knowledge of the slave-trade extends to only that part of it comprised between Cape Verd and Cape Palmas, it is difficult to state the exact force required for this service; not less, however, than the following, we think necessary:

"One first class sloop-of-war.

"One steamer, from two hundred to three hundred tons burden.

"Two (eight or ten gun) brigs or schooners.

"Ten schooners of about one hundred tons, each with four guns.

"One store-ship, two hundred and fifty to three hundred tons.

"All the vessels to have one-tenth less than their complements of men, to be filled up with kroomen, on their arrival on the coast.

"A steamer (to be fitted up, if possible, to burn with either coal or wood, as circumstances may require) will be essentially necessary."

These were the answers to the three questions; and in conformity with these answers, the African articles were drawn up. And these answers from Captains Bell and Paine close the whole head of the correspondence under the title of "Suppression of the African slave-trade!" Not a word appears in it, to or from Lord Ashburton; and from all that we can see, it would seem that he had never heard of these African articles until he signed them in the treaty!

The articles, then, for this squadron, and these remonstrating ambassadors, stand before us as American conceptions! as stipulations originating with the United States, and carried forward by them as their separate work, until the articles leaped full grown into the body of the treaty. This is the way they appear to us: they appear as articles of American growth and origin, when, I undertake to affirm, that they are wholly British! that they came from the British negotiator! and that the American Secretary has done his work in seeking testimony to justify them, and to ripen them into formal sttipulations!

To sustain this belief, I do not refer to the fact (pregnant as it is) that the British have been pushing and pressing this alliance upon us for thirty-six years—from the time Mr. Monroe was in London in 1806. I leave out all that, and come to direct proof. Here it is, (holding up a pamphlet,) in the noble pamphlet of General Cass against the British pretension of search. I laid that pamphlet by for use, when I got a copy of it. I use part of it now, and more hereafter. For the present, I quote from page 24, (Baltimore edition, by J. Young,) and only take what is there quoted from the London Times newspaper—a paper which (no Senator need be reminded) is the organ of the ministry which sent out Lord Ashburton. The article is of the date of January last, when the minister was on the point of setting out to the United States, and tells what he came for. This is the article:

"This dispute (of impressment) now sleeps; though it will have to be revived, at latest, on the next occasion when we find ourselves invested, by a war, with the right, of which it is the consequence; and, indeed, it might be raised upon the contemplated treaty, giving a mutual right of search for the prevention of the slave-trade, unless provided for, as it might, and probably would be, by special articles."

Here the official paper of the present British ministry shows us, at the moment the special minister is setting out, that the question of impressment is to be revived, and may be done on the contemplated treaty, and in that part of the treaty which relates to the suppression of the slave-trade; and that "special articles" would probably be agreed upon in relation to the suppression of this trade. This is the import of the article in the Times; and it is under a nisi—under an "unless"—and under the contingency for providing for this suppression by special articles, that the right of impressment might not be raised upon the treaty! All this is too plain for comment, and too grave for neglect. It comes from the authentic organ of the British ministry; and time and events have verified every word of it. The pretension to impress has been revived—revived in Lord Ashburton's letter of the 9th of August, in answer to Mr. Webster's of the 8th, in which our Secretary gave the minister an opportunity to revive the pretension, by opening a gratuitous correspondence upon this head, after the treaty was concluded! The treaty bears date the 9th of August, and must have been concluded some days before that time. Mr. Webster's letter bears date the 8th of August—Lord Ashburton's the 9th of August; and each letter concludes with a farewell, and a declaration that these letters "closed" their correspondence! Thus the minister had a natural occasion presented to him to revive the pretension of impressment, and was thereby saved from appearing "officious" or "inquisitive" upon the subject, as it is intended that the British governors in the West Indies shall appear when liberating American slaves. This proves that the Times newspaper was right as to impressment: the stipulations for the African squadron show that it was equally right as to the "special articles" in lieu of the right of search! And both together prove that impressment, right of search, and this African squadron, hunting negroes in couples on the coast of Africa, are all part and parcel of the same thing—the degrading right of impressment, against which the United States went to war in 1812.

This is enough to prove the British origin of these African articles, and the fallacy of the form in which they came before us.

Mr. B. said, upon these expositions of facts and reasons, he trusted that no further opposition would be made to the call which he had submitted. He had a right to the information: the whole American people had a right to it. A treaty concerns the public, and the negotiators have no right to make chimney-corner work of it—to convert it into a private affair—give and take what they please; and keep no record—make no report—inform the country nothing about it. This is the first time negotiations have been so conducted in our country: let it be the last! Let the rebuke be now administered which will prevent the repetition of such reprehensible conduct in future. Our negotiator seems to have acted without instructions from the President: the correspondence shows it, and he so declared it at Boston. He seems also to have made no minutes of his proceedings. And now, if he is to make no report to us, (a part of the treaty-making power,) there is an end to accountability and responsibility on the great point of our negotiations with foreign powers.

Mr. EVANS said it was not his purpose to discuss the resolution; but, as it was evident it would take up a considerable portion of time, he hoped it would be postponed. He would suggest to the Senator from Virginia [Mr. ARCHER] the propriety of letting it lie over till to morrow.

Mr. ARCHER assenting, the resolution was postponed till to-morrow.

THE CIVIL AND DIPLOMATIC APPROPRIATION BILL.

On motion of Mr. EVANS, the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill was taken up as in committee of the whole.

Mr. EVANS stated that the committee had not proposed any amendments to this bill, although there was no appropriation in it for the coast survey. It was, however, only for appropriations of the current half year; and when the general appropriation bill for the fiscal year came up, any omissions could be supplied.

Mr. WOODBURY observed that, though the appropriations in this bill were not higher than the estimates, yet there were two classes of appropriations in it, which looked to expenditures that ought to be reduced. The estimates themselves were too high, and would lead to expenses larger than were proper in the present state of the country. They were those connected with our judiciary and the diplomatic relations. But, as this would be corrected in the next bill, (and it was very desirous to have this one pass speedily,) he would make no motion to amend, but merely state this fact in order to foreclose any inference that double the amount of those two classes of appropriations in this bill was not thought too high for the whole year.

There being no proposition to amend the bill, it was reported back to the Senate, ordered to be read a third time, was read a third time, and passed.

ASSUMPTION OF STATE DEBTS.

The PRESIDENT pro tem laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, covering the following communication from the Secretary of State:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, Dec. 23, 1842.

To the President:

The Secretary of State—to whom the President has referred the resolution of the Senate of the 22d instant, in the following words: "That the President of the United States be requested to inform the Senate whether the late special minister from Great Britain to the United States made any proposition, informally or otherwise, to the negotiator on the part of the United States, for the assumption or guaranty of the State debts by the Government of the United States to the holders of said debts"—has the honor to report to the President, that the late special minister from Great Britain to the United States made no proposition, informal or otherwise, to the negotiator on the part of the United States, for the assumption or guaranty of the State debts by the Government of the United States to the holders of said debts.

DANIEL WEBSTER.

On motion of Mr. ARCHER, and by unanimous consent, the communication was ordered to be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. laid before the Senate the following communication from the President of the United States:

To the Senate of the United States:

I have received the resolution of the 22d inst., requesting me to inform the Senate of the nature and extent of the "informal communications" which took place between the American Secretary of State and the British special minister, during the late negotiation in Washington city, on the "subject of the claim of the United States and Great Britain to the territory west of the Rocky Mountains;" and also to inform the Senate what were the reasons which prevented "any agreement on the subject at present," and which made it "inexpedient to include that subject among the subjects of formal negotiation."

In my message to Congress at the commencement of the present session, in adverting to the territory of the United States on the Pacific ocean, north of the 42d deg. of north latitude, a part of which is claimed by Great Britain, I recommended that, "in advance of the claims of individual rights to these lands, sound policy dictates that every effort should be resorted to by the two Governments to settle their respective claims;" and also stated that I should not delay to urge on Great Britain the importance of an early settlement. Measures have been already taken, in pursuance of the purpose thus expressed; and, under these circumstances, I do not deem it consistent with the public interest to make any communication on the subject.

JOHN TYLER.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 23, 1842.

On motion of Mr. ARCHER, and by unanimous consent, the communication was ordered to be printed.

On motion of Mr. BAYARD, (there being no further business before the Senate,) the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and, having spent a short time therein, adjourned till Tuesday next.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, December 23, 1842.

PRIVATE BILL DAY.

This day and to-morrow were, some days since, set apart for the consideration of the business on the private calendar; and it was also agreed to meet two hours earlier than usual on those two days.

The SPEAKER accordingly called the House to order this morning at 10 o'clock; and at the devotional exercises by the Rev. Mr. TUSTON, one of the congressional chaplains, there were not more than 20 members in attendance.

The Clerk commenced the reading of the journal of yesterday; but

Mr. ARNOLD said there was important matter in the journal, which it would be better not to approve without a quorum at least. He therefore suggested a postponement of the reading of the journal.

Mr. J. C. CLARK moved a call of the House, as he wished to see what gentlemen were absent from the House when business required their attendance.

Mr. CUSHING moved an adjournment, (although he should vote against it himself,) and on this he called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered. This motion had the double effect of recording the names of gentlemen present, and of giving time for others to arrive.

The yeas and nays having been taken, (during which the members in attendance increased,) the motion to adjourn was negatived—yeas 5, nays 51.

Mr. COWEN moved that the call of the House be dispensed with.

The motion was negatived.

The question was then taken on seconding the call of the House; on which the vote was—54 in the affirmative, and 40 in the negative; being still less than a quorum.

Mr. BIDLACK said he wished to see the difference between profession and practice; and, therefore, he called upon the Clerk to state what number of gentlemen voted to change the hour of meeting from 12 to 10 o'clock.

Mr. CUSHING said the vote was taken by tellers, and, therefore, the names of the gentlemen who voted in the majority could not be given.

Mr. FILLMORE suggested that the committees be called for reports.

The SPEAKER replied that no business could be entertained until a quorum was in attendance.

After some irregular conversation between several members,

Mr. CHAPMAN moved that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. BOARDMAN and others called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and resulted as follows: Yeas 7, nays 109.

The motion to adjourn was, therefore, negatived.

It being now ascertained that a quorum was in attendance, the journal of yesterday was read, and approved.

The SPEAKER then said the business in order was the bills on the private calendar; and, first, those bills would be taken which were ready for a third reading.

The following bills were then read a third time, and passed:

A bill for the relief of Robert Ramsey.

A bill for the relief of the owners, master, and crew of the schooner Martha, of Eastport, Maine.

A bill for the relief of Ferdinand Leibert.

A bill for the relief of James B. Sullivan.

A bill for the relief of Benj. Treslow.

A bill for the relief of Snow Y. Sears.

A bill for the relief of John Gerard Ford.

The question was then taken on the engrossment of the bill for the relief of the heirs of Robt. Fulton; which was agreed to: but it was not read a third time, objections being made.

The following bills were ordered to be engrossed, and were read a third time, and passed:

A bill granting a pension to Joseph Watson.

A bill for the relief of Solomon Emmerson.

A bill authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to refund to David Watkinson & Co. a part of the duties imposed on a certain quantity of tin and iron imported by them into the port of New York.

A bill to authorize the enrolment or register of the brig New Granada.

On leave given, Mr. WASHINGTON reported a bill from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, for the relief of the heirs of Major General Baron De Kalb; which, on his motion, was referred to the Committee of the Whole House, and made the order of the day for to-morrow.

Mr. GIDDINGS moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the private bills on the calendar which were ready to be committed.

The motion was agreed to; and Mr. CASEY took the chair.

The committee then acted on the following bills, which were severally laid aside to be reported:

The bill for the relief of Charles B. Hall.

The bill for the relief of Aquila Goodwin.

The bill for the relief of John McColgan.

The bill for the relief of Jonathan E. Hustin.

The bill for the relief of John H. Russell and others, owner, master, and crew of the fishing schooner Lucy Ann.

The bill for the relief of Mary Bradstreet and Amos Tappan.

The bill for the relief of Knott Martin and Arnold Mastin the third, owners of the fishing schooner Only Son, and others.

The bill for the relief of Joseph W. Reckless.

The bill for the relief of Barnabas Baker and others, owners of the fishing schooner called the Union, of Dennis, Massachusetts.

The bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Henry Hoffman.

The bill for the relief of Hugh Riddle, of the city of New York.

The bill for the relief of John S. Kerving.

The bill for the relief of Thomas King.

The bill for the relief of Joshua Knowles, jr. and owners and the crew of the fishing schooner Garnett.

The bill for the relief of William Lomax.

The bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Captain Samuel Shannon.

The bill for the relief of Elizabeth Whiteman; and

The bill for the relief of the heirs and legal representatives of Major General the Baron de Kalb.

On motion by Mr. COWEN, the committee rose and reported the bills to the House; when, the following, after having been ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, were severally read a third time, and passed:

The bill for the relief of Charles B. Hall.

The bill for the relief of Aquila Goodwin.

The bill for the relief of John McColgan.

The bill for the relief of the heirs and legal representatives of Major General Alexander Macomb, deceased, and others.

The bill for the relief of John P. Horton.

The bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Francis Pillecer.

The bill for the relief of Philip Renault.

The bill for the relief of Nancy Terry.

The bill for the relief of Daniel Penhallow.

The bill for the relief of Samuel M. Asbury.

The bill for the relief of John P. Skinner, and the legal representatives of Isaac Green.

The bill for the relief of S. Morris Waln.

The bill for the relief of Joseph W. Reckless.

The bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Henry Hoffman.

The bill for the relief of Hugh Riddle, of the city of New York.

The bill for the relief of John S. Kerving.

The bill for the relief of Thomas King.

The bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Captain Samuel Shannon, deceased.

The bill for the relief of the heirs and legal representatives of William Lomax.

The bill for the relief of Elizabeth Whiteman.

The bill for the relief of the heirs and legal representatives of Major General the Baron deKalb.

On motion by Mr. HOLMES, the reconsideration ordered of the bill remitting the duties on the organ imported by the Episcopal church of Charleston, South Carolina, was taken up; and, after some remarks from Mr. H., was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BIDLACK moved a reconsideration of the vote on bill No. 571, for the relief of Samuel M. Asbury, purporting to come from the Committee for the District of Columbia. He thought the House was proceeding with too little caution. According to his recollection, there had been two or three reports against this claim, and none in favor of it. When a committee had reported favorably, he would not interfere. The motion to reconsider was rejected.

Mr. THOMPSON of Mississippi moved that when the House adjourned, it should adjourn over to Tuesday next.

Mr. GIDDINGS called for the yeas and nays on the motion.

Mr. THOMPSON modified his motion by substituting Monday for Tuesday.

Then yeas and nays were then ordered, when

Mr. THOMPSON withdrew his motion.

Mr. ANDREWS of Kentucky renewed the original motion of Mr. T. to adjourn over to Tuesday, and called for the yeas and nays; which, being ordered, resulted in yeas 80, nays 80.

The Speaker voting in the affirmative, the motion was carried.

The bill for the relief of John H. McIntosh was taken up on its third reading.

Mr. TURNEY moved its recommittal to a select committee for investigation.

Mr. LEVY hoped it would not be recommitted.

Mr. W. B. CAMPBELL advocated its recommittal.

Mr. LEVY went into some lengthy statements in defence of the claim, and in opposition to the motion to commit. He was followed by Mr. W. B. CAMPBELL, Mr. TURNEY, Mr. M. A. COOPER, and Mr. COWEN; when the bill was recommitted to a select committee of five members.

Mr. C. J. INGERSOLL submitted a resolution (which had been before repeatedly offered on preceding days) to pay the pages, officers of the House, &c., extra remuneration for the last session.

Mr. BLACK and others objected, and the resolution was not received.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Treasury Department, in answer to a resolution of the House of the 10th March, 1842, transmitting a statement relative to the judicial expenses of the Government, and the laws and usages under which the same are incurred; also, the projet of a bill to fix, ascertain, and regulate the fees allowed to clerks, attorneys, marshals, witnesses, and jurors in the United States courts: referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

On motion of Mr. WARREN, the documents and papers relating to the claim of W. Fuller were referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

SECOND REGIMENT OF DRAGOONS.

Mr. CROSS gave notice of his intention to ask leave to bring in a bill to repeal the provision by which the second regiment of dragoons is to be dismounted on the first of March next.

LAND CLAIMS IN MISSISSIPPI.

Mr. JACOB THOMPSON offered the following resolution, which was adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reporting a bill to this House quieting the titles to certain lands sold at Chocchuuma and Columbus, Mississippi; which, after the definitive establishment of the boundary line between the Chickasaw and Choctaw cessions, are found to be within the former cession.

JESSE HOYT'S ACCOUNTS.

Mr. BOARDMAN offered the following resolution, which was adopted:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to communicate to this House the amount of the defalcation of Jesse Hoyt, late collector of the port of New York; and also what means, if any, have been adopted for the recovery of the same, together with the names of the sureties of said Hoyt.

LIGHT-HOUSES.

Mr. J. C. CLARK offered the following resolution, which (after a brief interval of objection) was adopted:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to inform the House whether any agent or agents (other than the regular and usual inspectors) have been employed during the past year in the examination and inspection of the light-houses; and if so, the names of such agents, the instructions given, the persons employed under them, the whole expenditure of such examination and inspection, the number of light-houses inspected, the time employed in such inspection, the report or reports of such agent or agents, the amount of money paid for the same, and the fund from which payment has been made.

At this stage of the proceedings, a motion to adjourn was made by Mr BOWNE; but was, after some conversational debate, withdrawn.

COLLECTIONS AND EXPENDITURES AT NEW YORK.

On motion of Mr. G. DAVIS, it was Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury report to this House the number, classes, and compensation of persons, respectively, in the employment of the Government in the port of New York on the 1st day of January, 1828, and also on the 1st day of January, 1842; and the amount of revenue collected in that port for the two years immediately preceding these dates.

PRIVATE CLAIM IN KENTUCKY.

Mr. W. O. BUTLER offered the following resolution; which was adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads inquire into the expediency of releasing D. & V. K. Rich, securities of J. F. Moore, deceased, late postmaster at Gaines Cross-Roads, in the State of Kentucky, from the payment of a judgment by the district court of the United States for the district of Kentucky, for the sum of $108 53; and that all the papers on file in the Post Office Department relating to said claim be referred to said committee.

STOCKBRIDGE INDIANS.

Mr. W. A. HARRIS said he would ask the favor of the House to take up a bill reported by him from the Committee on Indian Affairs, for the relief of the Stockbridge tribe of Indians in the Territory of Wisconsin.

The bill was then read.

Mr. BRIGGS objected to its further consideration.

After some conversation,

Mr. FILLMORE hoped he would withdraw the objection.

Mr. HARRIS explained the design of the bill. It was precisely analagous to a bill which had been hitherto passed in relation to another tribe, and which had been found most salutary in its operation. This tribe of Indians was not only civilized, but in a great measure christianized; and their ardent desire was to be made citizens of the republic. There was, moreover, nothing of a speculating character about the present bill.

Mr. BRIGGS still persisting in his objection, the report was read.

Mr. ROOSEVELT said that this bill proposed specially to naturalize the Stockbridge tribe of Indians. Now, he would remind the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRIS] that the Constitution of the United States only gave Congress the power to pass uniform laws of naturalization. (Many voices: "That refers to foreigners.") Then, why pass the bill at all? Is not the Indian a native American? [Laughter.] He wants no act of naturalization. [Laughter.]

Mr. HARRIS said he thought the gentleman from New York [Mr. ROOSEVELT] had conceived, and given to the House the worst kind of a Virginia abstraction he had ever heard. [Laughter]

The question was then taken upon the engrossment of the bill, and carried; and, by general consent, it was read a third time, and passed.

JEU D'ESPRIT.

Mr. SNYDER submitted the following preamble and resolution, the reading of which was received with much manifestation of merriment:

Whereas Nature, in the plenitude of her wisdom, and bountiful bequest to the people of these United States, has decreed, by its stupendous grandeur and beneficial results, some of her great works should remain unaltered, as emblems of her wisdom and design. In her beneficence, she has interspersed every section of our land with great navigable rivers, lakes, and tributary streams, purposely for the enjoyment and comfort of man: instance the matchless valley of the great Mississippi. Would it not be valueless, and perfect waste, without that noble river of its name?—the Western States useless for agricultural purposes, without their navigable lakes? And what would Pennsylvania be, without her foaming Susquehanna? Her iron, coal, timber, and salt, would be a dead waste on her borders; her fertile soil, uncultivated, would now be used, as of yore by the aborigines—for a hunting-ground. May the opinion be here hazarded, that all these large rivers and lakes are the common property of the Government, free for all citizens to navigate, trade upon, or travel, as a common highway; and that no State, for State or company purposes, has the right to obstruct the free passage thereof?—even the occupant of its banks having no more right to the exclusive navigation or the use of the water, than the Louisianian, one thousand miles off; but must remain as nature's grand highway, and the General Government is bound to maintain it as such. Pennsylvania lived prosperously, enjoyed all the blessings of a kind Providence, until about eighteen years since, when the internal improvement of the State was commenced. Since then, by act of Assembly, eight or ten dams have been authorized to be constructed across that great highway of nature, the Susquehanna river, which has destroyed the ascending navigation for boats, and totally prevents the ascension of shad. Shad were caught in the northward country, and sold for from six to ten dollars a hundred; now, not one is to be seen. The loss of all kinds of fish is consequent upon those dams—a very serious injury to the people of that river, which is three hundred miles long. The shad are a loss to the community at large, as countless millions heretofore were hatched in its fresh-water streams. The health of the country is injured, the right of property taken from the citizen without his consent, for internal improvement purposes; and Nature's public highway to market (Philadelphia) by keel-bottom boats in the head of the river, is now destroyed, by reason of dams; and the immense trade of the Valley of the Susquehanna, and a portion from the State of New York, is forced into State and company canals. Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the constitutional right of Pennsylvania to authorize the building of dams across the Susquehanna, to the injury of the natural rights of the great body politic, and report to this House.

Mr. STANLY objected to the reception of the resolution.

A suspension of the rules was moved; but the House refused to suspend.

BREAKWATER AT BLOCK ISLAND.

Mr. TILLINGHAST offered the following resolution, which was adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce inquire into the expediency of providing a shelter for vessels at Block Island, either by constructing a breakwater or opening a harbor, and also as to the best means of effecting the object aforesaid.

On motion of Mr. JAMES COOPER the Committee of the Whole was discharged from the consideration of bill No. 212, and the same was read a third time and passed.

Mr. ADAMS gave notice of his intention to move that, on Wednesday next, the House go into Committee of the Whole on claims relating to French spoliations prior to 1800.

The Committee on Enrolled Bills reported the general appropriation bill as correctly enrolled, and the Speaker signed the same. Immediately after which,

The House adjourned.

Mr. McKEON presented the petition of the insurance companies in the city of New York, praying for an appropriation for the improvement of the Mississippi and Missouri rivers: referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CROSS, under the resolution adopted by the House, referred to the appropriate committees the following cases, to wit: The petition of R. B. Hyde for a pension; the petition of the widow and heirs of Edward Duvall, and the petition of Benjamin Murphy, praying indemnities for losses sustained in consequence of Indian depredations.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, December 27, 1842.

Mr. YOUNG presented a petition from Ralph V. M. Cross, and 344 others, citizens of the town of St. Charles and its vicinity; a petition from citizens of Grand Detour and its vicinity; and a petition from Levi Ballou and 55 others, citizens of Babcock's Grove, Dupage county, Illinois, praying the establishment of a tri-weekly four-horse post-coach mail-route from Chicago, by the Steam Mill settlement on the Des Plains river, Babcock's Grove, in Dupage county, St. Charles, in Kane county, Sycamore, in De Kalb county, Broaddy's Grove, and Jefferson Grove, to Grand Detour, in said State; which, with the accompanying diagram, were referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Also, presented a letter and memorial from Uriah Brown, of Schuyler county, Illinois, praying an investigation by Congress of his right to the discovery of the plan by which ships of war may be blown up, by means of a current of galvanic electricity, to be discharged through submerged magazines of gunpowder; which, on his motion, was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. YOUNG, agreeably to previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce bills of the following titles, to wit:

A bill granting an additional quantity of land to the State of Illinois, to aid in the completion of the Illinois and Michigan canal;

A bill making further appropriations for the continuation of the work on the Cumberland road in the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois;

A bill appropriating the rents of the United States lead mines in the State of Illinois, and Territories of Wiskonsin and Iowa, for the improvement of the navigation at the Rock river and Des Moines rapids, in the Mississippi river; which were severally read twice, and referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

And a bill making a further appropriation for the continuation of the public works, and rebuilding the light-house, at the harbor of Chicago, in the State of Illinois; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. Y. also gave notice that he would, on to-morrow, ask leave to introduce a bill to confirm the sales of the school lands in the State of Illinois.

Mr. CLAYTON presented a memorial from Edward Worrell, M. D, alleging that he was unjustly selected as one of those who were to be disbanded from the service of the United States, under the late law for the disbandment of a portion of the army, and asking an investigation into the matter: referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented a memorial from a number of citizens of Pennsylvania, asking that the fine imposed on General Jackson, by Judge Hall, might be refunded. The memorialists urge that Congress ought, unanimously, as if by acclamation, and without unnecessary delay, to restore to that great man, before he takes his departure from this to a better world, the fine so unjustly imposed on him: referred to the Judiciary Committee.

Also, presented a memorial from a number of citizens of Pennsylvania, complaining that the greatest want of the country was the want of a proper currency, and proposing to the Government of the United States to issue stock or certificates of loan to the States to the amount of 2,000,000,000 of dollars, founded upon the public domain, as affording a proper basis for a sound currency: referred to the Committee on Finance.

Also, presented a memorial from a number of citizens of the city and county of Philadelphia, alleging that they were from the first opposed to the passage of the bankrupt law, because it interfered with pre-existing contracts; but that now, believing that the mischiefs of the law were at an end, and that the law would be very useful in its prospective operations, pray that it may be continued: referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. TALLMADGE presented six memorials, numerously signed, from the city of New York; also from Syracuse, Rochester, and Penn Yan, in the State of New York; and one from Philadelphia; all remonstrating against the repeal of the bankrupt law. Mr. T. said he had no doubt, if time were given, that memorials of a similar character would be poured in upon the Senate from all parts of the Union. He had received letters from many of the States, giving the decided opinion that a great portion of the community everywhere were in favor of the law, and expressing the earnest hope that it would not be repealed. These writers anxiously inquire as to the prospect of a repeal, and the terms of that repeal, if such a bill should succeed.

Mr. T. said that these letters were so numerous, it was impossible for him to answer them individually, even if he possessed the information they desired. He would, therefore, take this occasion to say that he indulged a hope that, on mature reflection, a majority in Congress would be willing to preserve the law, with such modifications and amendments as should be deemed necessary to remove any objectionable features in it. Mr. T. said he considered it a duty enjoined on Congress by the Constitution, to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy; and that to repeal this law without an effort to amend it, would be a dereliction of duty which he would not anticipate. He would not assume that a power yielded by the States to Congress, for the mere purpose of uniformity, was not to be exercised by Congress, because it would not; nor by the States, because they could not exercise it. The principal objections which were originally urged against the bill are now obviated. One was its operation on past contracts: that is now removed; another was, that there was not sufficient judicial force to execute the law. Experience has shown there is no difficulty on that score. But Mr. T. said he did not intend, on this occasion, to go into an argument on the subject. If, however, he should be disappointed in his views of the action of Congress, and the law should be repealed, he could not persuade himself that a single member of this Senate would be willing to cut off any applications pending at the time of the repeal. He hoped the repeal—if it should take place—would be prospective; and that a period some time hence would be fixed upon for it to take effect. If there be any distinction between those who have been already discharged, and those whose applications are now pending, it is in favor of the latter. They have struggled along, and omitted to apply, in the hope that they would be saved the necessity; and now, to cut them off, after others have been discharged, would be cruel in the extreme. He hoped and believed no such injustice would be done.

The memorials were referred to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. BENTON presented a memorial from Philadelphia, on the subject of the bankrupt law. The letter accompanying it says that the memorial was signed by forty firms of that city—the names of twenty of whom he knew himself. Mr. B said this petition was opposed to the repeal of the act, but wished Congress to amend, and make it a bankrupt system. One of the points of objection to the law was, that it was unjust and unconstitutional, because it absolved the debtor from all his obligations entered into long before the enactment of the law was even contemplated. The letter states that two-thirds of the merchants and nineteen-twentieths of the people believe that the banks which issue bills should be included within the provisions of the law: referred to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. BERRIEN presented a memorial from the city of New York, asking that the bankrupt law may not be repealed, but assigning reasons why it should be continued, with certain modifications therein set forth: referred to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. BERRIEN took occasion to say, that so far as his information extended, there was a more strong and decided expression of public opinion in favor of the continuance of the law, under certain modifications, than there was for its repeal. Something more than 50,000 persons had petitioned upon the subject of the law at the last session; of whom, less than 3,000 were in favor of its unconditional repeal; 40,000 asked for its continuance; and the residue of the 50,000 asked for its suspension, modification, and repeal.

Mr. McROBERTS presented a petition from a number of citizens of Illinois, asking Congress to pass a law for the occupation and settlement of the Oregon Territory, and that actual grants of land be made to settlers as an inducement to settlement: laid on the table, to accompany the bill.

On motion of Mr. BATES, it was ordered that the petition and papers of Rufus and Charles Lane, asking for fishing bounty, be taken from the files of the Senate, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. LINN, on leave, introduced a bill for the relief of Reuben E. Gentry, William Monroe, and others; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

On motion of Mr. KING, it was ordered that the petition of the heirs of William Fisher, asking for the confirmation of a certain land claim, founded on a Spanish grant, be taken from the files of the Senate, and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

On motion of Mr. KING, it was ordered that the petition of Samuel Thompson be taken from the files of the Senate, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

On motion of Mr. SEVIER, it was ordered that the petition and documents relating to the claim of F. A. Kerr, for compensation and for supplies furnished indigent Indians, be taken from the files, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs; and also that the petition of George Duval, a Cherokee, for indemnity for losses sustained, be taken from the files, and referred to the same committee.

Mr. SEVIER presented a memorial from Doctor Gunton, President of the Bank of Washington, asking that Congress would pass a law extending the charter of that institution: referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana presented a document from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, on the subject of surveys of lands; which was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. STURGEON presented a memorial from a large number of citizens of Southwestern Pennsylvania, asking for the repeal of the bankrupt law. Mr. S. said the law was peculiarly unpopular in this section of the country, which might be judged of from the reading of an extract from the letter enclosing the petition; which said, that if petitions were circulated there, ninety-nine out of every one hundred would readily sign for the repeal; that they believe it was the worst law ever passed by Congress; and that it had done more to demoralize the country than any act ever passed: referred to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. WRIGHT presented a memorial from certain inhabitants of Brooklyn, remonstrating against the repeal of the bankrupt law, as far as its prospective operations are concerned, and recommending certain modifications: referred to the Judiciary Committee.

Also, presented a memorial from citizens of the northern district of New York, remonstrating against the repeal of the law in any such terms as would operate as a suspension of it before the passage of the repealing act. The memorialists give as a reason, that, by the rules of the court thereon, (many, if not all, of the district courts) all the applicants under the law are compelled to pay fees in advance; and, in a majority of the instances, such fees are obtained only by the greatest sacrifice on the part of the petitioners; and that, therefore, it would be manifestly unjust to destroy these petitions, filed pursuant to the law, and in all respects in conformity thereto: referred to the Judiciary Committee.

Also, presented a petition from Oneida county, New York, asking for the unconditional repeal of the bankrupt law; and a petition from a number of citizens of New York, purporting to be merchants, for a full and unconditional repeal of the bankrupt law; which were referred to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. SIMMONS presented two memorials from citizens of Philadelphia, against the repeal, but in favor of a modification of the bankrupt law; referred to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. SPRAGUE presented a memorial from Providence, Rhode Island, signed by merchants and manufacturers, in favor of the repeal of the bankrupt law: referred to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. MILLER presented a memorial from John Kurtz, praying for an extension of the charter of the Farmers and Mechanics' Bank of Georgetown: referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. WOODBURY presented a memorial from certain messengers and laborers in the office of the Auditor of the Post Office Department, praying for an increase of their compensation: referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BENTON presented a petition, signed by Thomas White, and one hundred and fifty others, of Dorchester county, Maryland, praying for a repeal of the bankrupt act: referred to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. WHITE, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported a bill for the relief of Benjamin Murphy, of Arkansas; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. BAYARD presented a memorial from certain officers who served in the surveying and exploring expedition, representing that they had received a certain amount of pay under the authority of an express order in writing from the Navy Department, and that the accounting officer of the Government, in the adjustment of their accounts, had refused to allow the amount thus paid them, and that their ordinary pay is now withheld until an adjustment of their accounts. They pray Congress to pass a law authorizing the settlement of their accounts on the basis of the agreement of the Secretary of the Navy when they entered the service: referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. BATES presented a petition from William Smith, of Northampton, Massachusetts, praying indemnity for losses sustained by French spoliations prior to 1800. Mr. B. said, to show the injustice and inhumanity of withholding the indemnity, it was only necessary to have the memorial read, (which was done,) showing that the petitioner is now an inmate of the poor-house: referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. BAYARD, on leave, introduced a bill entitled "An act to amend the act entitled 'An act to reorganize the Navy Department of the United States,' passed the 30th August, 1842;" and of instruction in the naval service of the United States;

A bill to provide for the establishment of schools

Which were read twice, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

On motion of Mr. CRITTENDEN, leave was granted to withdraw from the files of the Senate the petition and documents of William Meredith, the heir of William Meredith, for compensation for revolutionary services.

On motion of Mr. MERRICK, leave was granted to withdraw from the files of the Senate the petition of John Burke.

Mr. BERRIEN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back, without amendment, the bill for the relief of persons residing within the reputed limits of the States of Arkansas and Louisiana, and beyond the boundary line between the United States and the Republic of Texas, established by the commissioners appointed to ascertain the same.

Mr. WOODBURY presented a resolution, which was read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce inquire into the state of our tonnage, freights, and commerce with foreign powers; and report whether it is properous under the existing arrangements, by treaties or laws in relation thereto; and, also, whether the regulations by other Governments are equally in conformity to the spirit of these arrangements; and if either be not so, what measures are proper to insure greater prosperity and reciprocity.

Mr. W. said it was a very important inquiry which concerned the whole country, but especially the Northern portion of the country; and, therefore, he hoped it would be passed at once. The question was put, and the resolution was adopted.

Mr. WOODBURY then submitted the following resolution, which lies one day, under the rule, viz:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to furnish the Senate with the following information:

1. The amount of revenue received from customs during the third quarter of the year 1842, on imports made in that quarter.

2. As soon as the returns are obtained, the amount received in the 4th quarter of the same year, from the imports made in that quarter, and the aggregate of those imports.

3. The aggregate of appropriations outstanding and unexpended at the close of the years respectively, of 1840, 1841, and, when this year expires, at the end of 1842; and

4. The quantity of land which was advertised for public sale from 4th March, 1841, to the close of one year from that date; and the quantity advertised during the year previous to that date.

Mr. BERRIEN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back, with amendments, (which were ordered to be printed,) the bill for the relief of Henry Gardner and others, directors of an institution called the New England Mississippi Land Company.

A motion was here made by Mr. HUNTINGTON, to take up the motion of Mr. WRIGHT, to refer to the Committee on Finance the memorial of the chamber of commerce of New York on the subject of the warehousing system.

Mr. WRIGHT explained that he preferred that the subject be passed over until to-morrow morning, before which time Senators will have read the memorial, (now printed,) and be prepared to vote understandingly as to which committee it should be referred—the Committee on Finance, as proposed by him; or the Committee on Commerce, as proposed by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HUNTINGTON.]

The question was put, and the Senate refused to take up the motion.

THE AFRICAN SQUADRON.

The following resolution, submitted by Mr. BENTON some days ago, was taken up for consideration:

Resolved, That the President be requested to inform the Senate, (if compatible with the public interest,) whether the quintuple treaty, for the suppression of the slave-trade, has been communicated to the Government of the United States in any form whatever; and, if so, by whom; for what purpose; and what answer may have been returned to such communication. Also, to communicate to the Senate all the information which may have been received by the Government of the United States, going to show that the "course which this Government might take in relation to said treaty has excited no small degree of attention and discussion in Europe." Also, to inform the Senate how far the "warm animadversions," and "the great political excitement" which this treaty has caused in Europe, have any application or reference to the United States. Also, to inform the Senate what danger there was that "the laws and the obligations" of the United States in relation to the suppression of the slave-trade would be "executed by others" if we did not "remove the pretext and motive for violating our flag and executing our laws," by entering into the stipulations for the African squadron, and the remonstrating embassies which are contained in the 8th and 9th articles of the late British treaty. Also, that the President be requested to communicate to the Senate all the correspondence with our ministers abroad, relating to the foregoing points of inquiry. Also, that the President be requested to communicate to the Senate all such information upon the negotiation of the African squadron articles as will show the origin of said articles, and the history and progress of their formation.

Mr. ARCHER said, when this subject was last under consideration, he had expressed his willingness that the resolution should be adopted by the Senate, with the exception of a certain portion towards the conclusion. He had thought then, and still continued to think, that that portion of the resolution to which he referred ought to be stricken out—he meant that portion which called upon the President for the grounds of the opinion he had expressed in the message which he had communicated to this body in August last. In consequence, however, of the remarks which fell from the honorable Senator from Missouri on Thursday, he (Mr. ARCHER) was now disposed to allow the resolution to pass, without the alteration which he had proposed. Not that he had changed his opinion in relation to its propriety; for he was still of opinion that the Senate ought not, on its own account, to send such a message to the head of any department of the Government; but, inasmuch as he perceived that a refusal to send the resolution with that part stricken out would be attended with circumstances highly unfavorable to the Government, he was disposed to permit it to go without any amendment whatever.

He had been asked why he had desired any change in the first instance. He would answer, that, as the Government had no organ in that body by whom its views could be made known, he had felt it incumbent upon him to act as such organ.

Although he still thought it very desirable that the resolution should be modified in the manner he had suggested, yet there was a sort of debt of justice due to the Executive; and the latter, he thought, was the more imperious of the two considerations. He would, therefore, be governed by it. He would waive his objection to the resolution, and acquiesce in its adoption.

The resolution was then adopted.

BOARD OF EXCHEQUER.

The bill amendatory of the acts establishing the Treasury Department came up as the special order of the day.

Mr. TALLMADGE (on whose motion this bill had been made the order for to-day) said, at the request of several Senators he had been induced to move a further postponement of it. He moved to postpone it till Tuesday next, as the special order for that day; which motion was agreed to.

FINE ON GENERAL JACKSON.

The bill introduced by Mr. LINN some time since, to indemnify General Jackson for the fine imposed upon him by Judge Hall, at New Orleans, while in the discharge of his official duty, came up on its postponement from Thursday last.

Mr. LINN hoped the bill would now be ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, by acclamation, as had been urged in a memorial presented this day from Pennsylvania by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCHANAN.]

Mr. CRITTENDEN understood the question of reference was yet pending.

Some doubt being expressed as to the question now pending, a few conversational remarks were made by several Senators, in explanation, showing that the motion to postpone, on Thursday, superseded the motion to refer.

The CHAIR decided that the motion to postpone had superseded the motion to refer.

Mr. CRITTENDEN then renewed his motion to refer the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. LINN asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

The question of reference to the Committee on the Judiciary was then taken by yeas and nays, and resulted in the affirmative—yeas 23, nays 19, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Clayton, Conrad, Crafts, Crittenden, Evans, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, Merrick, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Porter, Simmons, Smith of Indiana, Sprague, Tallmadge, White, and Woodbridge—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Berrien, Buchanan, Fulton, King, Linn, McRoberts, Mangum, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Wilcox, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, and Young—19.

CORPS OF REPORTERS.

The resolution for the appointment of a corps of reporters came up in order; and was, on motion of Mr. BAYARD, laid on the table.

On motion of Mr. BAYARD, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and, after some time spent therein, adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, December 27, 1842.

Mr. ALFRED MARSHALL presented the petition of John Patterson and eighteen others, ship-masters and merchants of Northport, Maine, asking the erection of such buoys, beacons, and spindles on the Muscles ridges in Penobscot bay as will render the navigation more safe.

Mr. LOWELL presented the petitions of Jacob Longfellow and ten other ship-masters and merchants of Machias, Maine; John A. Simpson and ten other ship-masters and merchants of East Machias, Maine; and Jotham Lippincott and thirty-two other ship-masters and merchants of Columbia and Addison, Maine,—all praying for an appropriation to improve the navigation of Penobscot bay.

Also, letters from George Thacher, esq., collector of the port of Belfast; John Whitcomb, captain of the United States revenue-cutter Alert; and Green Walden, captain of the United States revenue-cutter Morris,—in support of the same object; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. THOMPSON of Mississippi presented the petition of T. W. Haley, H. W. Stegall, and 82 others, praying the establishment of a mail route from Electra, in Monroe county, Mississippi, to Van Buren, in said State: referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. STEENROD presented a petition of citizens of Marshall county, Virginia, for the repeal of the bankrupt law.

Mr. J. R. INGERSOLL desired to present a memorial of inhabitants of the city and county of Philadelphia against the repeal of the bankrupt law, but suggesting various modifications.

Mr. L. W. ANDREWS objected; and he said he should object to all business that was not strictly in order.

The memorial accordingly was not received.

Mr. REYNOLDS moved the reconsideration of the vote by which a bill was passed on Friday for the relief of the heirs of Philip Renault. He explained that his object was to cause the insertion of a proviso, to sustain the purchasers of certain lands.

After a few words from Mr. YOUNG and Mr. CAVE JOHNSON, the motion was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN asked permission to move that a certain bill be taken from the Committee of the Whole. It was a local bill, on which the delegation from Maine was agreed, with one exception.

Objection was made, and the gentleman was, therefore, cut short in his explanation.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON gave notice of a bill to prohibit the allowance of extra compensation to the officers of the Government.

The SPEAKER then announced that reports from standing committees were in order.

Mr. GIDDINGS, from the Committee of Claims, made a report upon a petition of Asahel Lee, Samuel Lee, and Henry Lee, accompanied by a bill for their relief; which was read twice, and committed.

Mr. COWEN, from the same committee, reported the following bills; which were read twice, and committed:

A bill for the relief of John Cove.

A bill for the relief of Samuel B. Treck.

A bill for the relief of Joseph R. Chandler.

He also made an adverse report on the petition of John S. Parkinson.

Mr. TOMLINSON, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of Thomas D. Gibson; which was read twice, and committed.

Mr. HOWARD, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported a bill for the relief of the heirs or assignees of the heirs of Isaac Todd and James McGill; which was read twice, and committed.

Mr. GENTRY, pursuant to notice heretofore given, obtained leave to introduce a bill for the benefit of Fielding Pratt; which was read twice, and committed.

Mr. UNDERWOOD, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported a bill for the relief of the Howard Institution of the City of Washington; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. LINN, from the Committee on Public Expenditures, reported a resolution to authorize that committee to employ a clerk, and to send for persons and papers.

Mr. BOWNE called for the yeas and nays on that motion; and, being ordered, they resulted as follows: yeas 87, nays 99.

Mr. J. C. EDWARDS obtained permission to introduce a bill to allow drawbacks on foreign merchandise exported in original packages to Chihuahua and Santa Fe, in Mexico; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WISE rose to present to the House a resolution of the Legislature of Virginia, instructing the Senators of that State, and requesting its Representatives, to use their best efforts to cause the immediate passage of the bill refunding the fine imposed on General Jackson, by Judge Hall of New Orleans, in 1815.

As this was the resolution of a State—a State which he in part represented—he took the earliest opportunity to present it; and, in doing so, he begged to say for the Legislature of Virginia, and for himself, that no partisan feeling entered into the spirit of that resolution. It was offered in the spirit of patriotism—pure patriotism. It was believed by the Legislature of Virginia, and the Representatives of the people of that State, that the act employed by General Jackson to defend the city of New Orleans was one of imperious necessity—a necessity imposed upon him by the "booty and beauty" of that city, which were threatened by an invading army, and no less by domestic traitors——

Mr. MORGAN interposed, and inquired whether the gentleman from Virginia was in order?

Mr. WISE said he wished to exculpate his State——

Mr. MORGAN objected to the gentleman debating the question.

Mr. WISE. I merely wish to state——

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Speaker, is it in order?

The SPEAKER said the gentleman from Virginia could not enter into debate on the subject.

Mr. WISE. I do not propose to debate it; but, as it was received by unanimous consent of the House, I merely wish to bespeak from the House that respect which I believe ought to be paid to the resolution of the Legislature of a State.

Mr. HOWARD and others called the gentleman to order.

Mr. WISE. I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee of the Whole——

Mr. HOWARD. The gentleman has no right to speak upon it at all.

Mr. WISE. I am making a motion now. I move that it be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, where a bill, I believe, already lies, which was reported at the last session, on this subject.

Mr. TURNEY. And that it be printed.

Mr. WISE Yes, and that it be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GATES offered the following resolution; which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the President be requested to transmit to the House of Representatives the laws passed by the Governor and Legislative Council of the Territory of Florida, at the last session.

Mr. TALIAFERRO, from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, reported a bill to amend and explain an act of the 4th July, 1836, and an act of the 7th July, 1838, allowing pensions to certain widows. It was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr.. FORNANCE, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of Jonathan Britton; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MORRIS, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported a bill for the relief of Daniel Dunham; which was read twice, and committed.

Also, an adverse report on the petition of Sarah Hildreth.

Mr. BURNELL offered a resolution, directing the Clerk of this House to distribute amongst the members of the House, for circulation, certain charts of George's shoals, now in the Clerk's office. The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CAMPBELL of South Carolina gave notice that he would on to-morrow ask leave to introduce a bill to suspend, for a limited time, the operation of the second section of the act entitled "An act for the apportionment of Representatives among the several States, according to the sixth census."

Mr. JAMES IRVIN offered the following resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be directed to communicate to the House of Representatives the report of the engineer in chief of the Navy Department, in reference to an invention of Cadwallader Evans, of Pennsylvania, for the prevention of explosions in steam-boilers.

On the motion of Mr. WISE, it was ordered that the Committee on Naval Affairs be discharged from the consideration of the petition of Octavius A. Holden and James C. Patton.

THE BANKRUPT LAW.

The SPEAKER announced the regular order of business to be the bill to repeal the bankrupt act.

The Clerk stated the question as it now stood. The original bill was introduced by Mr. EVERETT, as already published. This Mr. BARNARD had moved to amend, so as to repeal only so much of the bankrupt law as permits voluntary bankruptcy; providing, however, that this act should not affect any case or proceeding in bankruptcy already commenced, or which should be commenced before the 4th day of March next. Mr. CUSHING had moved to amend the amendment, so as to provide that this act should not affect any case or proceeding in bankruptcy commenced before the passage of this act, and, consequently, not to extend it to cases commenced before the 4th of March next. Mr. BRIGGS had moved to commit the bill and all its amendments to the Committee on the Judiciary, with instructions to report a bill to repeal that part of the existing law which authorizes the voluntary application of debtors, and to include corporations which issue paper to circulate as money, within the operation of the bankrupt law. And Mr. CAVE JOHNSON had moved to amend Mr. BRIGGS's amendment, by striking out all the instructions, and inserting instructions to the Judiciary Committee to report, at 12 o'clock to-morrow, the following bill: "That the act passed on the 19th day of August, 1841, entitled 'An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States,' be, and the same hereby is, repealed.

Mr. SALTONSTALL, who had the floor, observed, that it was neither his intention nor his wish to enter into an elaborate argument on this bill; being satisfied, from appearances when it was last before the House, that it would be brought to a close before the close of this day. The question now, as read by the Clerk, opened the whole subject for consideration. It was, on the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee to commit the subject to the Committee on the Judiciary, with instructions to bring in a bill to repeal the bankrupt act forthwith. He looked upon this as the most important question that could occupy the attention of Congress, and should be acted on with great caution and deliberation. It would operate throughout the United States, and upon all classes of the community, upon contracts of every description in which the citizens of the United States have entered. If ever, therefore, a question deserved to be considered calmly, deliberately, and impartially, it was this; and, indeed, it should be acted on with as much caution as if it was now the question on the passage of an original bankrupt law. Other classes of the community, as well as the mercantile classes, were deeply interested in this question. Mr. S., after taking a brief view of the history of the passage of the bankrupt act, and of the constitutional powers and obligations of Congress to pass it, entered into a consideration of the reasons urged for its repeal. It had been said that public opinion demanded its repeal; and the gentleman who introduced the bill was supported by the resolutions of a sovereign State demanding it. He denied, however, that there was any evidence showing that the people demanded the repeal of this law. Where was it shown? There had been no petitions presented calling for it. The Legislatures of the States (with but one exception) had made no move in relation to it; and, if he judged from what he had seen of the public press, there was no evidence there of a desire for the repeal of the act. They had every evidence that public opinion was loudly in favor of this law at the time of its passage. It was called for by numerous petitions, coming from every quarter of the country, signed by men of all classes of the community. It was advocated in the public papers, and strongly recommended to the favorable consideration of Congress in the message of the President of the United States. Mr. S. deprecated the repeal of this law before sufficient time had elapsed to give it a fair trial and examination. He contended that it was now operating most favorably, and that the principal cause for objection to it had nearly passed away. This was the retrospective feature of the bill; but as all (or nearly all) the cases of that class had been acted on, there was now no longer any objection to the bill. In a country like ours, he held that some uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcy should exist. Such laws were just as necessary now, as when the constitutional provision authorizing Congress to pass such laws was adopted; and the very reasons which operated upon the convention for the insertion of this provision, operated now in favor of retaining the present law in force.

The framers of the Constitution foresaw the great increase in the extent and commerce of this country. They saw that new States would spring up, with various interests and with different laws; and that, without some uniform law passed by the common Government, the insolvent laws of these States would come in conflict. The grant of this power was, therefore, inserted for the same reason that the grant of power for the regulation of commerce between the States was inserted; and these same powerful reasons operated now, as well as then. Mr. S. denied that the law was complicated, and difficult to be carried out. On the contrary, it was perfectly simple, and easy to be understood and executed. In Massachusetts, for example, it had gone into operation without any difficulty whatever, and without any complaint of frauds. The retrospective feature, it was true, was first complained of; but as this ceased to have any effect, the act had become popular, and was found to be exceedingly useful and beneficent in its effects. Mr. S. continued speaking up to the expiration of his hour, showing various reasons why the law should not be repealed.

Mr. DAWSON rose, and addressed the House in opposition to the repeal of the law. He said: I do not intend to make a speech on this occasion, but simply to offer a few brief remarks in my own justification, here and at home. I am aware that, if I could speak with the voice and wisdom of an angel of light, I could not arrest the fate of this bill. It is virtually res judicata—soon to be "as a thing that was not." Politicians have already taken sides for and against it; and the appeals of reason and of justice are now alike unavailing.

I have not heard a solitary complaint from one of my constituents for my vote in favor of this bill. On the contrary, I have received many warm and grateful acknowledgments in approbation of my course. I have in my drawer a long list of the most respectable names in Louisiana, urging me to oppose the repeal of the bankrupt law. No man in this House would rejoice more than I would to see this bill amended; but I will hold on to it as it is, sooner than see it repealed. I am opposed to the oppression of the debtor, in every shape, form, and manner. Debt is a misfortune; and bitter is the cup of life (Heaven knows) to the unfortunate debtor, at best, without being treated as a criminal. I am willing to see the debtor forced to make an honest, full, and unqualified surrender of all he has: and then I would palsy the arm of the Shylock who would attempt to take his pound of flesh. This is the poor man's law; and it stands "solitary and alone," as the poor man's law, in the history of the world. I am the open and avowed advocate of a bankrupt law to benefit debtors, and not a law to benefit creditors exclusively. I would not make a retrospective law, to favor or shield the debtor; but I would place him henceforth beyond the reach of personal cruelty and degradation. His property might be seized and sold; the roof that shelters his wife and children from the pelings of the pitiless storm might be taken from him, and they might be turned over to penury and want. But his person, at least, should be sacred. The creditor should not touch a hair of his head after he had made a fair and honest surrender of everything he was worth on the face of the earth.

"Man's inhumanity to man Makes countless millions mourn;"

and wise legislation will always defend and protect the weak, the helpless, the unfortunate, and oppressed. The fate of the bankrupt law is already foretold. I entertain no doubts of its being repealed in a few days. It is the first law that ever was passed—and, I greatly fear, it will be the last—to favor the poor and the unfortunate. It is idle to resist the power of money; to its secret, subtle, and pervading influences, imagination can devise, and strength can accomplish no bar. It will buy the prayers of the church, the fidelity of man, and the love of woman. It is the alpha and omega of all human desires. Reason and justice are impotent when opposed to the magic power of gold.

"Plate sin with gold,
And the strong lance of Justice hurtless breaks;
Clothe it in rags, a pigmy's straw doth pierce it."

One overgrown capitalist, or rich creditor, has more influence over the National Legislature of this country than five thousand unfortunate and persecuted debtors.

Repeal this law, and how inconsistent and reprehensible the majority of this House must appear in the "sober second thought" and dispassionate consideration of a free and intelligent community! They have forced a good law, in a bad shape, upon the nation; and now that the hour of amendment is almost at hand—I mean the meeting of the 28th Congress—they are about to blast forever the last hope of the broken-hearted and desponding debtors throughout our vast domain. They are now eager and impatient to destroy, with a ruthless hand, the most salutary and effective checks upon that reckless credit system which has cast a gloom of desolation over the land.

I voted for this bill, not because I considered it perfect, but with a hope that it would soon be amended and made perfect. I do not believe that any man or party can make a bankrupt law that will at first be invulnerable in all its parts. I am, consequently, disposed to make the most of this. I am for salutary, judicious, and necessary amendments; and I am opposed to the repeal. I have always been in favor of a judicious national bankrupt law; and I earnestly contend that this is a most propitious hour for the most happy legislation upon the subject. I sincerely regret being compelled, by the deep and rooted convictions of my mind, and the best impulses of my heart, to differ, in this single instance, with my Democratic friends. If any man ever was truly proud of his party, I am the man. I may be wrong; but if I am, it is an error both of the head and of the heart. I cannot favor the few to oppress the many. If I do err, I feel that it is an error on the side of mercy.

Mr. CUSHING rose in opposition to the repeal of the bankrupt law. He thought that, instead of immediately repealing this measure, and thus exhibiting to the country the spectacle of a vacillating body—undoing to-day what it had done yesterday; it should be allowed to remain in force, and be further tested by public judgment. Instead of a hasty and precipitate action, he thought the public interests would be better promoted by modifying the law so as to exclude voluntary applicants for its benefit, and to include corporations issuing paper for circulation. Let it be modified to suit the views of gentlemen, but not wantonly demolished.

If, however, the law must be repealed, he hoped the House would not put upon the record an untruth, saying that it had been repealed on the 5th of December, as was implied by the provision of the bill as introduced by the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. EVERETT.] In addition to this untruth, which would be implied, the provision was, he thought, unjust, and would involve the whole commerce of the country in difficulty. He argued that it was in the highest degree unjust in Congress to refuse to make provision in regard to pending process in the courts, and earnestly remonstrated against a retrospective repeal of the law. The act of repeal should, he thought, take effect from its passage, and not from any date in the past time.

Mr. C. said he would take this occasion to present a memorial from Philadelphia against the repeal of the law, which he would have read as a portion of his remarks.

Mr. ADAMS availed himself of the opportunity to present a petition for the same purpose.

Mr. FERRIS presented two petitions from the city of New York against a repeal.

Mr. EVERETT objected to the presentation of any further memorials, as irregular.

Mr. CUSHING resumed, and proceeded in answer to some of the remarks submitted a few days since by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. ARNOLD.] He agreed with that gentleman in part of what he had said. It was true that there were objections to the act in the first place; yet these had been either extenuated, or had lost their force. The main objection to the passage of the law was, that it would operate on contracts made, and would thus affect vested rights. Now, this objection applied with equal force to the repeal of the measure as proposed in the present bill, since many enterprises had been entered into by men acting in reference to its continuance.

He would say to the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. ARNOLD,] that he would not have ventured to use language of condemnation so strong as that used by him when addressing the House on the repeal of this law. That gentleman had proceeded to make personal references to high functionaries of the Government, and to introduce them here as if their destiny, or their remaining in office, was material to the repeal of the bankrupt law. If the remarks of the gentleman were at all relevant to the question, equally so would be a reply. In considering the exciting debates which often took place in that body, he thought they were bound to observe the fact, that the House of Representatives was the great voice of the nation—the safety-valve of the democratic impulses of the people. From the nature of our Government, discussions must frequently be carried on with earnestness, with excessive zeal, and sometimes with indecorum; yet he felt himself at liberty to declare, contrary to the opinion of the press elsewhere, that this was the most decorous of all deliberative national assemblies in the world. He knew it was more orderly than either the House of Commons in England, or the Chamber of Deputies in France.

He next proceeded to notice the remarks of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ARNOLD] in relation to the Secretary of State, and the speech made by that officer at Boston, wherein he was charged with acting, not from a desire to promote the public welfare, but solely from a lust of office. When such a strain of vehement denunciation as had been applied to the Secretary of State was used by a member on that floor, he felt it to be his duty to say something in reply. And, in relation to the charge of love of office, he would ask, how was a man capable of doing good service to his country, unless he held office and was in power? Was there an individual, without a public trust, who could carry out his purposes of good to the country? All experience showed that it was impossible to accomplish beneficial ends without the possession of power. Indeed, the gentleman, after thus impugning the motives of the Secretary of State, would have been equally justified in imputing the same selfish views to every man in the United States who had ever held office, from George Washington down to the present time. He, (Mr. C.) therefore, denied that any man holding office could be properly accused of a personal and interested motive in so doing.

He could not join issue with the gentleman [Mr. ARNOLD] upon the terms of general obloquy used with regard to the functionaries of the Administration; but he would deal with specific facts and measures, and also with intentions as clearly and plainly developed, whenever they came up for discussion. He would say this, as well for others and for parties, as for the gentleman from Tennessee. It was now the beginning of a short session—the last of the present Congress. A mass of business was before that body—business of deep interest to themselves, to their constituents, and to the country. Under this state of facts, the first reflection with him was, whether it was for the interest of the country, let whatever party that might have the ascendency, to throw aside all legislation, and shut their eyes to all its wants, in order to pass off into an episodical discussion regarding the character of the officers of the Government? If he had argued strictly, the questions of the bankrupt law and the treaty with England, were not at all affected by the character of the men now in power. In proportion, therefore, as gentlemen should enter into a discussion of these personal relations, would they depart from that line of conduct which was best calculated to promote the public business.

It was now nearly two years since, in accordance with a vote of the people, a change took place in the administration of the Government. Since that time, an internecine war had arisen in the dominant party. The war had now been pursued for about one year and a half; but, in the midst of it, the Federal Government, with its fixed Constitution, had stood, like the god Terminus, defying the progress of those who were rushing against it. The country had seen one party throw itself against the immovable rock of the Constitution. What had been the consequence? The party thus hurling itself against the constitutional rock was dashed to atoms.

He thought that enough of recrimination had been heard in the House, and throughout the country, during the period to which he had referred; and he would ask, what interests were to be promoted by its further continuance? Was any personal object to be promoted by a perseverance in these attacks on the part of the Whig party? It was remarkable enough that one party should have broken itself down against the Federal Government; but what was the series of events on which we were about to enter? It was an old maxim that experientia docet. He was almost inclined to think that, in the present case, this maxim would have to be reversed, and made to read experientia non docet. [Mr. C. J. INGERSOLL: "Nocet."] Then it might be that experience would hurt, rather than teach. The other party had, during this warfare, so long carried on, been occupying an enviable position. They had been folding their arms, looking on and laughing; whilst their opponents, like Kilkenny cats, were eating each other up from head to tail. [Laughter.] This agreeable situation was now about to end; and it appeared, from givings out in various quarters, that this party was also about to hurl itself against the same immovable rock on which the other had split. [Laughter, lasting some time.] A gentleman near him said he was mistaken. He might be; yet he was under the impression that, however individual leaders might think and wish, that consequence would follow. [Laughter.]

He had said the Federal Government was on a fixed basis at Washington. That was the foundation of his argument. Now he would suppose a man called to be President of the United States. It mattered not whether he was elected, or whether the office devolved upon him by contingencies contemplated in the Constitution. He was President. What, then, was his first duty? To consider how to discharge his functions. He (Mr. C.) thought the President was bound to look around at the facts, and see by what circumstances he was supported. Gentlemen might talk of treason; much had been said on that subject; but the question for the individual who might happen to be President to consider was, How is the Government to be carried on? By whose aid? He (Mr. CUSHING) would say to that party now having the majority, (and whom, on account of that circumstance, it was more important he should address,) that if they gave him no aid, it was his duty to seek aid from their adversaries. [Laughter.] If the Whigs continue to blockade the wheels of the Government, he trusted that the Democrats would be patriotic enough to carry it on. [Laughter.]

He had thus presented the party relations of the question. Behind them there was one of deeper import, and which might be vital in its effect. There was in the United States a great career of ambition, and beyond it a culminating point—the highest position which it was in the power of man to attain—the Presidency. For this place, on looking around him, he saw more aspirants than he could count upon his fingers. [Many voices: "Name them."] He could not name them. ["Name them"—"let's hear who they are."] Their name was legion. He knew not what splits would take place, nor how far their personal relations would tend to produce divisions; but he saw in the general race no individual, at the present hour, who possessed a pre-eminent, overwhelming, and irresistible power before the people. [A voice: "Except one—Clay."] Nor did he know whether, during the next two years, any individual would acquire that strength. It was true that the Whig party would hold a presidential convention some time during that period, [A voice: "No need of it;"] and also that the Democratic party would convene a similar assembly. He did not know whether this convention would be able or not to settle the rival pretensions of different candidates; but he saw budding such blossoms of discord as to leave great doubt about the issue of any convention that might be held. He did, however, know that the next year and a half would be signalized by great commotion upon this all-absorbing subject; and, whether there might be one candidate only on each side or not—whether that candidate be cordially supported or not—he would say that it would not be forwarding the political interest of any one of the parties in the country to carry on a fierce warfare against the present Administration. [Laughter.] He deemed it material that he should be frank upon this point just now. [Cries of "Very frank."] There were men connected with the present Administration who meant soon to have a word to say upon this subject. He knew that the political cauldron was boiling with various elements, wholly discordant and different; and he knew, also, what the constitutional power of the Federal Government could accomplish. [Several voices: "By patronage"—"by lust of office."] No, not by mere patronage: he would show gentlemen that he would cut deeper than the mere surface of patronage. He referred them to the extra session, where one measure was proposed by the President, and another reported by a committee of the House, and pushed through to its passage, until it met with a Presidential veto. The action of the President, as affecting the legislation of Congress on that occasion, showed the power of the Federal Government, through events, over masses of men, to be a hundred-fold greater than all its patronage. Whilst the events to which he referred were passing, the patronage of the Government was in the hands of the retiring Secretaries; thus showing that there was not even a concurrence between the action of the patronage and the vetoes. Therefore, what he meant by the power of the Federal Government was, an element soaring above all patronage—the relation of the President to the action of Congress.

He trusted we should never be agitated by such another series of collisions between the majority in Congress and the President as had occurred during the past year and a half; but should such a state of things arise, by the fatuity of parties, it was easy to foresee just such another result as that now brought about. [A voice: "The veto of the sub-treasury predicted."] He hoped and desired that the House would be able to apply itself with uniform care to its legislative duties—trampling under foot party questions, that so much tended to impede the transaction of the public business.

Mr. THOMPSON of Indiana then obtained the floor, and yielded it for a motion to adjourn. Previous to which, and by general consent,

Mr. McKENNAN offered the following resolution; which was considered and adopted:

Resolved That the use of the hall of the House be granted to Professor Walter R. Johnson, for the delivery of a lecture on the subject of coal, and its various applications.

Mr. JAMES COOPER, by general consent, offered the following resolution; which was considered and adopted:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be required to communicate to this House a detailed statement of all the expenditures made from the Chickasaw fund, between the 2d day of March, 1833, and the 1st day of January, 1843; the said statement to embrace the names of the persons to whom payments have been made, the amount paid to each, and on what account.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Treasury Department, containing a statement showing the expenditures under the contingent fund for the last year: laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a communication from the Secretary of State, enclosing a report showing the modifications of their tariff laws by certain foreign countries: referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a communication from the same, on the subject of our intercourse with foreign nations: laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a communication from the Legislature of the Wisconsin Territory: laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

On motion of Mr. McKENNAN,

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, December 28, 1842.

Mr. YOUNG of Illinois presented the petition Alexander M. Jenkins, Richard J. Hamilton, and Samuel Lee, of the State of Illinois, securities of William Linn, late receiver of public moneys at Vandalia, in said State, praying that a law may be passed discharging them from their joint liability, upon the payment by each of a fair distributive proportion of the judgments obtained against them on account of the defalcation of the said Linn; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, a petition from William Elliot, jr., of Fulton county, Illinois, praying that a law may be passed to enable him to enter a certain quarter section of land; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Also, a petition of a number of citizens of Boone and McHenry counties, for a post-road from Hartland, in McHenry county, by way of "Cold Spring Prairie," to Amazon post office, in Boone county, in said State; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. laid before the Senate the report of the Secretary of the Senate, accounting for the disbursements out of the contingent fund of the Senate; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Mr. TALLMADGE presented three memorials from the State of New York, remonstrating against the repeal of the bankrupt law: referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CRITTENDEN presented a memorial from F. H. Pettis, counsellor at law in the city of New York, and others, remonstrating against the passage of the bill to repeal the bankrupt law; which was referred to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. C. also presented a memorial from the same individual, on the subject of a system of waterproof cloths, an invention of which he claims to be the author. He says that the discovery is one of great value and importance for purposes of naval use: referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Messrs. WOODBRIDGE, PORTER, and BERRIEN, severally presented memorials against the repeal of the bankrupt law; which were referred to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. ARCHER presented a memorial from the city and county of Philadelphia, praying that the bankrupt law may be modified, but not repealed; which was referred to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. McROBERTS presented a memorial from citizens of Illinois, urging upon Congress the passage of the bill to repeal the bankrupt law; which was referred to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. LINN presented a memorial from citizens of Illinois, praying Congress to pass a law for the occupation and settlement of the Oregon Territory, and to grant donations of land as an inducement to settlement; which was laid on the table, to accompany the action on the bill on that subject.

Mr. WOODBURY presented a petition from James Dodds and Eli Davis, watchmen in the Post Office building, asking for an increase of compensation; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. LINN, on leave, introduced a bill for the relief of certain companies of Missouri volunteers, commanded by Captains Pollard, Sconce, Harrison, Atchison, and Crawford; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CRITTENDEN, on leave, introduced a bill for the relief of James Taylor, and, for other purposes; which was read twice, and, with the documents relating thereto, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CONRAD, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported back, without amendment, the bill for the relief of William Debuys, postmaster at New Orleans.

On motion of Mr. WILLIAMS, it was ordered that the petition of John A. Dickerson, for extra compensation as sailing-master in the United States service, be taken from the files of the Senate, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SEVIER, from the Committee on Pensions, reported a bill for the relief of Wareham Kingsly; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

On motion of Mr. SEVIER, the Committee on Pensions was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of John Bosworth; and it was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. McROBERTS, on leave, introduced a bill declaratory of the assent of Congress to the State of Illinois imposing a tax on all lands hereafter sold by the United States in said State, from and after the time they are sold; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. KING, on leave, introduced a bill for the relief of certain citizens of Alabama, who were deprived of their improvements by the treaties with the Creek Indians; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. McROBERTS presented the credentials of SIDNEY BREESE, elected by the Legislature of the State of Illinois a Senator from that State for six years from and after the 4th day of March next; which were read, and ordered to be placed on the files of the Senate.

Numerous House bills were then taken up, read the first and second time, and appropriately referred.

The CHAIR laid before the Senate a subpœna issued from the circuit court of the United States for the District of Columbia, which had been served upon the Secretary of the Senate, with a view to compel his attendance into court with a certain anti-bank memorial, signed by citizens of Georgetown, now on the files of the Senate, to be used in the case of Addison vs. White, now being tried in said court. The Chair remarked that the Secretary was in doubt what to do in the case, he having no authority to take from the files any portion of the public archives, and had desired him to present the subpœna to the Senate.

A debate of a conversational character took place between Messrs. PHELPS, McROBERTS, BERRIEN, WOODBURY, HUNTINGTON, KING, and CRITTENDEN, as to whether a transcript of the record would not do to carry into court, and as to whether the Secretary, (though he was on duty,) being but a ministerial officer of the Senate, was entitled to the privileges which attach to Senators, and exempted them from the processes of the courts.

Mr. TAPPAN contended that the time to regard the supœna had not arrived, but that it should be disregarded until an attachment was issued against the Secretary; when the issue would be made up, and could be tried as to whether the privileges o

Senators did not, in some measure, extend to their officers, and exempt them from legal process while in the performance of their official duties.

The debate having ceased, and the Senators having concluded that it was not worth while to bring the Senate and court into collision,

Mr. BERRIEN submitted the following resolution, touching the matter; which was read and agreed to, viz:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate have leave to take from the files of the Senate the anti-bank memorial specified in the subpœna duces tecum issued from the circuit court of the United States for the District of Columbia, in the case of Henry Addison vs Robert White, this day served upon him, for the purpose of being exhibited as evidence in the said case.

Mr. HENDERSON, on leave, introduced a bill to extend the time of payment of the judgments against the Planters' Bank of Mississippi and the Agricultural Bank of Mississippi, and for other purposes; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Also, on leave, introduced a bill for the relief of the West Feliciana Railroad Company and the Grand Gulf Railroad and Banking Company; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. EVANS presented certain documents in relation to the claim of William Allen; which were referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, who have charge of the bill for his relief.

The following resolution, introduced by Mr. WOODBURY, was taken up and adopted, viz:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to furnish the Senate with the following information:

1. The amount of revenue received from customs during the third quarter of the year 1842, on imports made in that quarter.

2. As soon as the returns are obtained, the amount received in the 4th quarter of the same year, from the imports made in that quarter, and the aggregate of those imports.

3. The aggregate of appropriations outstanding and unexpended at the close of the years, respectively, of 1840, 1841, and, when this year expires, at the end of 1842; and

4. The quantity of land which was advertised for public sale from 4th March, 1841, to the close of one year from that date, and the quantity advertised during the year previous to that date.

The following bills were then taken up, as in committee of the whole, considered, and, there being no proposition to amend, were reported to the Senate, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, viz:

The bill for the relief of sundry citizens of Arkansas, who lost their improvements in consequence of the treaty between the United States and the Choctaw Indians.

The bill allowing drawback upon foreign merchandise exported in the original packages to Chihuahua and Santa Fe, in Mexico. [Mr. HUNTINGTON, chairman of the Committee on Commerce, explained this bill, and defended it on the ground that it would increase the export trade to those countries, and bring a return of specie and furs; and that it would be beneficial to commerce generally.]

The bill to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to make an arrangement or compromise with any of the sureties on the bond given to the United States by Samuel Swartwout, late collector of the customs for the port of New York;

The bill for the relief of Stalker and Hill;

The bill for the relief of Ephraim B. Dixon; and

The bill for the relief of J. R. Vienne, of Louisiana.

The bill to authorize the settlement of the accounts of Joseph Nourse was taken up, as in committee of the whole; and, after a few remarks in its favor by Mr. WALKER, was, on motion of Mr. PHELPS, laid on the table for the present.

The bill for the relief of Thomas Fillebrown was also laid on the table, on the motion of Mr. PHELPS.

The Oregon bill came up in order; but was informally passed over till to-morrow.

The joint resolution from the House, for the distribution of the Catalogues of the Library of Congress, was taken up, as in committee of the whole. Mr. WOODBRIDGE and Mr. TAPPAN explained the resolution, and, advocated its passage; and Mr. KING opposed it, and moved that it be indefinitely postponed; and on a division of the Senate on the question, it appeared that no quorum had voted. Then,

On motion of Mr. PHELPS,

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 28, 1842.

Mr. BRONSON desired to present a petition for the repeal of the bankrupt law.

Mr. ARNOLD said he had another on the other side of the question, praying that the bankrupt law might not be repealed.

Mr. L. W. ANDREWS objected to their presentation in this way.

Mr. HOUSTON presented the memorial of Jesse W. Garth, of Morgan county, Alabama, praying Congress to pass a law directing the Commissioner of the General Land Office to grant him a patent to certain land therein designated.

EXTRA COMPENSATION TO OFFICERS.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON asked leave to introduce the bill, of which he yesterday gave notice, to prohibit the allowance of extra compensation to the officers of the Government.

The bill was received and read a first and second time.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON then moved its engrossment.

Mr. ARNOLD objected. He said he had a bill before the House on the subject of retrenchment, and the House owed it to itself to take up that bill.

The SPEAKER said it was not in order to debate the question.

Mr. ARNOLD then moved that the bill of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. C. JOHNSON] be committed to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; so that this bill and his own, to reduce the pay of members of Congress, might be amalgamated. What was good in the bill of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. C. JOHNSON] he would accept; but he would not take it piecemeal.

Mr. C. JOHNSON inquired if it was not in order to move the engrossment of his bill?

The SPEAKER replied that it was not, if objection were made.

Mr. C. JOHNSON then asked the House to print his bill, and let it lie on the table. He said a practice prevailed in this Government, of employing officers of the army as commissioners, and giving them their usual pay as officers, and also several thousand dollars as commissioners; and he desired this bill to apply to the officers of the army as well as to the other officers of the Government.

After a few words from Mr. J. R. INGERSOLL, the question was taken on Mr. ARNOLD'S motion to commit the bill to the Committee of the Whole; and it was decided in the affirmative by a majority of 70 to 56. The motion to print was also agreed to.

FOREIGN TARIFF LAWS.

Mr. FILLMORE said there were some communications yesterday received from the State Department, one of which showed the modifications of their tariff laws by certain foreign countries. Of this document, he now moved the printing of five thousand extra copies.

Mr. L. W. ANDREWS inquired if that motion was in order.

The SPEAKER said it was not, if objection were made.

Mr. ANDREWS. Then I object.

Mr. FILLMORE said the document related to our commerce with Canada, and was of great importance; and, therefore, he would move a suspension of the rule for the reception of his resolution.

The motion to suspend, and the motion to print 5,000 extra copies, were both agreed to.

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT AT WHEELING.

Mr. STEENROD gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill to amend the act, passed at the last session of Congress, establishing a district court of the United States at Wheeling, Virginia.

WATER-ROTTED HEMP.

Mr. J. C. EDWARDS presented the petition of Henry S. Smith and others, inhabitants of the State of Missouri, praying the appointment of a permanent agent for the purchase of water-rotted hemp in Platte county, Missouri.

He also moved its reference to a select committee of five members; which was agreed to.

NEW YORK CUSTOMS AND CASH DUTIES.

Mr. ROOSEVELT offered the following resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to inform this House what portion of the revenue, received from customs since the 30th day of June last, accrued from bonds given for the payment of duties on importations made previous to that period, and what portion consisted of cash duties on imports entered since that period; and whether any bonds, taken before the commencement of the cash system, on the 1st of July last, still remain outstanding; and, if so, what is the amount thereof; and how much of said amount may reasonably be expected to be collected within the said twelve months.

Mr. TOLAND desired to present a memorial.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON inquired if memorials could not be presented without interrupting the business of the House, under a rule of the last session?

The SPEAKER said they could be presented, but not printed, without an order of the House.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON objected to the motion to print; and the subject was dropped.

NATIONAL WAR AND COMMERCIAL STEAM VESSELS.

Mr. T. B. KING offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That a select committee of five be appointed to take into consideration the expediency of aiding individuals or companies in the establishment of lines of steam vessels, for the purpose of transporting the mail between some of our principal Northern and Southern ports, to foreign ports, on the lakes, and the Mississippi river—said vessels to be constructed under the direction of the Navy Department, as war steamers, and at all times subject to its control, under such stipulations as may be provided by law. Also, to inquire into the expediency of employing steamers in the revenue service, and uniting it to the navy; and using iron in the construction of said vessels: and report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. HOPKINS suggested that a part of this subject was already under the consideration of a committee.

Mr. KING did not conceive that any harm could arise from the consideration of this subject.

Mr. ADAMS reminded the House that the subject of establishing a line of steamers between this country and France, (jointly with that nation,) was brought before the House at the last session, by a message from the Executive; that message was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and they reported a resolution favorable to the project, by calling upon the Department of State to report at this session the probable expense of such a plan; he hoped, therefore, this resolution would be postponed until that resolution had been replied to.

Mr. KING of Georgia was aware of the direction which the resolution alluded to by the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts had taken, at the last session; and, so far as regarded the communication across the Atlantic, he should agree with him, that that portion of the resolution he had the honor to submit might be stricken out. There were, however, other ports with which it might be important to establish communications, by the means of steam vessels. It was true that the French Government were engaged in establishing fourteen steamers for a line across the Atlantic; and his insertion of foreign ports in his resolution was with no view of coming in conflict with them. He conceived that it might be of the utmost importance to the country to establish a line of steamboat communication between New York and Chagres, or some other point on the Pacific; and, in inserting foreign ports in his resolution, he had that route in view solely, and not France. There were also various important points on the lakes, as well as on the Mississippi, at which steamboat lines might very advantageously be established. How desirable it might be in time of peace, so to administer the affairs of the Navy and Post Office Departments, by aiding in the establishment of steamboat lines, the vessels of which might be converted into armed steamers in time of war, would be the proper subject of inquiry for the committee.

Mr. K., in conclusion, said that he would, at the suggestion of the gentleman, strike out the words "foreign ports," though he did not see the necessity for doing so; for information would desirable, come from whatever quarter it might.

Mr. KENNEDY, of Maryland, entirely concurred with the gentleman from Georgia as to the propriety and expediency of such an inquiry as he had suggested. He had now in his possession a petition from a gentleman residing on the Pacific, pointing out the importance of a mail communication between this country and the Pacific, through the Isthmus of Panama. He should present that petition at the first opportunity allowed him to do so.

Mr. KING of Georgia begged leave to add, that he too had received various communications, which he should take the earliest opportunity of presenting. It was not unknown to the House, that at the last session this subject was under consideration, and referred for the action of a committee. He hoped there would be no objection to the appointment of a committee.

The question was then put, and the resolution was adopted.

On motion by Mr. KENNEDY of Maryland, the petition to which he had just referred was committed to the Select Committee ordered by the abovementioned resolution.

Mr. FESSENDEN moved to discharge the Committee of the Whole from the further consideration of the bill (No. 199) to change the place of holding the circuit and district courts for the district of Maine.

Mr. B. RANDALL objected.

Mr. FESSENDEN moved the suspension of the rules, which motion was carried; and the previous motion of Mr. F., to discharge the Committee of the Whole from the bill, was agreed to; and,

After a short discussion between Messrs. FESSENDEN and RANDALL, the bill was amended, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. FESSENDEN then moved that the bill be put upon its passage; but

Mr. B. RANDALL objecting, it was laid over till to-morrow.

Mr. EVERETT moved that the House proceed to the orders of the day.

INDEMNITY FOR FRENCH SPOLIATIONS.

Mr. ADAMS observed that he gave notice the other day that he should this day move to go into Committee of the Whole, for the purpose of acting on the bill providing indemnity for French spoliations prior to 1800. That bill (Mr. A. said) stood first on the calendar, and he now moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of taking it up.

Mr. PICKENS inquired whether this proposition took precedence over the bankrupt law.

The SPEAKER replied that the motion was in order.

Mr. MEDILL called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered; and, on taking the question, resulted in yeas 88, nays 99, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Allen, Sherlock J. Andrews, Aycrigg, Babcock, Baker, Barnard, Boardman, Borden, Briggs, Brockway, Bronson, Jeremiah Brown, Burnell, Childs, Chittenden, John C. Clark, Staley N. Clarke, James Cooper, Cowen, Cranston, Cravens, Cushing, Ferris, Fessenden, Fillmore, Gates, Gerry, Giddings, Patrick G. Goode, Granger, Gustine, Hall, Henry, Holmes, Hudson, Hunt, Charles J. Ingersoll, Joseph R. Ingersoll, James Irvin, W. W. Irwin, Isaac D. Jones, Keim, John P. Kennedy, King, Linn, Mathiot, Maxwell, Maynard, Morgan, Morris, Morrow, Osborne, Parmenter, Plumer, Ramsey, Benjamin Randall, A. Randall, Randolph, Ridgway, Roosevelt, James M. Russell, Saltonstall, Sanford, Slade, Truman Smith, Snyder, Stanly, Stokely, Stratton, Sumter, Sweney, Taliaferro, Tillinghast, Tomlinson, Trumbull, Warren, Washington, Joseph L. White, Thomas W. So the House refused to go into Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CAMPBELL of South Carolina, in accordance with the notice he had given, asked leave to introduce the bill in relation to the congressional districts.

Objection was made.

THE BANKRUPT LAW.

On motion of Mr. EVERETT, the House took up the bill for the repeal of the bankrupt law.

Mr. THOMPSON of Indiana, who was entitled to the floor, addressed the House at length in reply to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. CUSHING.] He had supposed that the present session was to be devoted entirely to business, and the progress made thus far had confirmed his expectations. No evidence of a disposition to make the hall of the House an arena for party conflicts had appeared until yesterday, when the remarkable spectacle was exhibited of a special friend of the present Administration coming here to throw firebrands into the House, and to charge the majority with neglecting the public business. This charge of neglect of the public business by the Whig party was the war-cry at the commencement of the last session, throughout its progress, at its close, and during the recess. It seemed that the same war-cry was now to be resumed.

At the close of the extra session, the country was told that the President would propose measures of relief to a suffering country. A measure was presented at the next session, and referred to a committee of the peculiar friends of the President, who had ample opportunities to digest it. This committee, after mutilating—that was the word—the plan of the President, made a report, which was allowed to sleep upon the table, without any attempt to have it taken up, until near the end of the long session.

Mr. CUSHING here rose, and remarked that the gentleman was in error as to this statement.

Mr. THOMPSON resumed. The country had been constantly told that the Whig party was responsible for the want of proper legislation by Congress; that they were derelict from their duty. He had supposed that this warfare would have ceased, and that all prejudices would be surrendered up upon the common altar of patriotism; but it seemed that the gentleman from Massachusetts had taken a special occasion to evince a contrary course of conduct. The gentleman seemed to have assumed the character of auctioneer for this bankrupt Administration, and he took it that the gentleman would be entitled to a good part of its effects. This was the first time in the history of any civilized country that a Government had, through the person of its acknowledged leader—a man doing most of its speaking, and much of its thinking—stalked into a representative assembly, and openly put up the Administration in the common market to the highest bidder! The gentleman too, spoke by authority, and not on mere idle rumor. His positions were not thoughtlessly taken, for they tallied with the declarations in his Newburyport speech, wherein he affirmed that the President had wished to declare that he would not be a candidate for a second term. From whom did he receive this information? Of course, he must have received it from the President or the Secretary of State, because they alone could have furnished it.

He referred to the fact, that it was formerly charged that a large number of applications for office were on file from Whigs, and to the action of the House on this charge. The House had called on the President for the names of these applicants; but the President said they were made to him in confidence, and he could not communicate them to the House. How did the fact of these applications having been made get out, unless from the President himself? No sooner was the President called on for the names, than he threw himself upon the reserved ground of confidence.

He next referred to the charge that negotiations were entered into on the part of Whig members of Congress to produce a continuation of the late Cabinet in office. So far as he was concerned, he hurled the charge from him with indignation. He believed the charge wholly unfounded, and called on the authors of it to name the men who had made any such proposition to the Executive.

The gentleman from Massachusetts had said that the Whig party—of which he was once so able a defender, and so distinguished a member—was now prostrate, with its banner trailed in the dust, by the power of the Executive. The gentleman said they were dashed against a constitutional fact. What was that fact? The veto power. He observed, it was the duty of the President to look around him, and gain support where he could; referring particularly to the minority on this floor. The gentleman also told the minority that they would be dashed to pieces, like their predecessors, unless they came into the measures of the President; but it yet remained to be seen whether he would get a bid. Judging from the expression of opinion by the leading organ of the Democratic party, he (Mr. T.) was inclined to think that no bid would be offered by a portion of that party. He thought, from givings-out in various quarters, that the President would ultimately have to resort to this "constitutional fact," to defend himself against a large portion even of that party. Indeed, it was doubtful whether there would be bidders from either side.

But the gentleman, in speaking of the various candidates for the Presidency, had declared that there were persons connected with the Administration, who would yet be heard upon that subject. The friends of this Administration had already been heard from the Northern to the Southern portion of this Union. They were constantly declaring that a storm was brewing. Now, he thought the word bankrupt was the only word applicable to this Administration;—an Administration which, under the voluntary provision of the bankrupt law, by its acknowledged chief, had put itself up in market to the highest bidder.

He recollected well—though he was very young at the time, and not prepared to take part in the political discussions of the day—that, during the Administration of the distinguished and venerable gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS,] there arose in this country a party, who, upon the bare supposition, (which was dispelled on an examination of the facts)—upon the bare suspicion that there was what was called a bargain, intrigue, and management between the then head of the Administration, and another distinguished citizen who was a member of his Cabinet, made it a subject of the most bitter and vindictive denunciation. Yet, notwithstanding that this part of our history was still fresh in the recollection of the gentleman from Massachusetts—when we see, in this age of Republican liberty, a gentleman descended from a line of illustrious Revolutionary ancestry—coming, too, almost from the very Cradle of Liberty, and acting as the organ of the Administration on this floor—boldly, shamelessly, and unblushingly offering the spoils of office as a consideration for party support, we may well have cause for alarm. How many clerkships were there in Philadelphia to be disposed of in this manner? From the collector down to the lowest tide-waiter, the power of appointment was to be directed for the purpose of operating on the coming Presidential contest. Who, now, would charge the Whig party with shaping their measures with a view to the elevation of a particular individual, after hearing the bold and open avowal from the gentleman that the present Administration would shape their measures for the purpose of operating on the coming contest? But (said Mr. T.) there was something exceedingly ridiculous in the idea of the Administration party—and such a party, too!—coming into the Representative hall, and telling its members that it had the power to dispose of the various candidates for the Presidency at its pleasure, and controlling the votes of nearly three millions of freemen by means of its veto power, and the power of appointment and removal. He could not but be struck, on reading the remarks of the gentleman this morning, with the similarity between them and a remark made by one of the officers of his own native State,

This man (a constable) in serving a process on an individual, (a sturdy farmer,) found somewhat more of resistance than was to be expected in that land of steady habits. He was rudely shaken by the party arrested; upon which, with an assumption of great dignity and importance, he said: "I would have you to understand that, in shaking me, you are shaking the commonwealth." So it was with the gentleman from Massachusetts, who assumed so much power and importance for his party. We are, said he, "the fixed fact" around this Government at Washington; and this fixed fact will knock your brains out if you don't come into our support. We bide our time; we see your disagreements, and out of these disagreements we hope the President will have some control over future events; while the distinguished men around him will, when they see proper, "have a word to say."

This idea of the gentleman, that the Administration party will be able to decide between the two great parties which divided the country, reminded him of an anecdote he had read in one of his school-books. A large rooster strutted into a stable, where there were several horses, and, fluttering his wings with great importance, said: 'Let us take care, my friends, that we tread not on each other's toes." The gentleman, with equal airs of importance, assumed that the veto power, and all the appointments and removals, were so to be directed as to be brought to bear on the coming elections of 1844. All, then, that the gentleman had hitherto said about the President's conscience, and the moral and religious obligation that was on him to exercise this veto power in the case of the bank bills, was vain declamation; since he now avowed that this power was to be exercised for party and political purposes. In all the contests between General Jackson and the party in opposition to him, it was never pretended by any one that he used the veto power for the purpose of operating on the elections. It was charged against him, that, in the use of the power, he set his own will up in opposition to that of the people, as expressed through their representatives in Congress, and in carrying out the Constitution as he, and not they, understood it; but no one ever charged him with using it for party and political purposes. The gentleman from Massachusetts complained that the President of the United States had been badly treated; and that he himself had been badly treated by the Whig party. The gentleman said yesterday that he and his friend from Virginia, who sat near him, [Mr. WISE,] had been grossly abused—had been called traitors.

Mr. CUSHING begged leave to correct the gentleman. He made no complaint; but said that his friend from Virginia and himself had had more than their share of the obloquy which fell on all public men.

Mr. THOMPSON continued. If the gentleman did not complain yesterday, he would go back to former times, when he did complain. He would refer to his speech to his constituents, and to his speech at the last session, when he complained that a caucus dictation had arisen which directed the most bitter and violent denunciations against him, and the Administration with which he acted. Yet, notwithstanding this charge against the Whig party, the gentleman complained of being badly treated.

The gentleman commenced this war himself. When the members of the Whig party felt themselves bound to declare that they absolved themselves from all connexion with the President, and that they would be no longer responsible for his measures, the gentleman, in a speech on that floor, said that they had been compelled to take that course by caucus dictation. The manifesto-Whigs of the extra session proclaimed to the world that they owed no further obligation to support the administration of President Tyler; that he had soiled the pure ermine which had been thrown around him; that he brought rebuke and degradation on the office he filled; and that they could no longer be responsibfe for his administration. We were not ashamed (said Mr. T.) to go before the country and tell the people that we were disappointed in the man whom we had elevated to power; and, in all the subsequent developments of his policy, our predictions were fully verified. Referring to Mr. Spencer's letter, Mr. T. said that, supposing the President did make a proposition to his Cabinet that he would decline being a candidate for re-election, did it follow, as a matter of course, that the other facts stated by the Secretary of War were authorized to be inferred by him? All that took place on that occasion would have been considered, by any man of common intelligence, as perfectly incongruous with the matter then before the Cabinet. If the President was a co-ordinate branch of the Government, (as said by the gentleman from Massachusetts,) how supremely ridiculous was it for him to declare that he would not be considered a candidate for re-election, just because his opinions were at variance with those held by another co-ordinate branch of the Government.

In relation to the bank bills, Mr. T. said that the Secretary of State, [Mr. Webster,] in a letter written by him nearly at the close of that session, was the first who intimated a desire for the postponement of that question: he said it was the President's desire that the bank bills should be postponed to the next session of Congress. The same thing was communicated by the gentleman from Massachusetts himself to his constituents; and yet, with these facts staring him in the face, the Secretary of War said that the proposition came from the Whig party to postpone the further consideration of the bank bill, on the condition that the President would retain the members of his Cabinet in office.

But it seemed to him (Mr. T. said) most singular that the doctrines held by the gentleman in 1834, on the subject of the veto power, could have been uttered by a gentleman who now regarded it as the mere instrument of party, to be used to operate on the elections to be held. Mr. T. here read copious extracts from a speech delivered by Mr. C., in 1834, at Faneuil Hall, in which the exercise of the veto power by General Jackson was commented on with much severity. After some further remarks, Mr. T. said he had one inquiry to make of the gentleman from Massachusetts. It remained now for the country to know who it was on that floor that was prepared to receive this proffer on the part of the Administration for executive support. The gentleman had not made this proposition to the Whig party, for he told them that they had butted their brains out against the bucklers of executive authority; but he understood him as addressing himself to the minority. It remained, therefore, for them to tell the country whether they were prepared to consummate the alliance thus proffered. In propositions of this nature, silence was sometimes considered as giving consent; and it became them, therefore, to speak out, lest their silence might be taken as an acceptance of the proposals. The leading organ of the Democratic party told them this morning that that branch of it would have nothing to do with this alliance; but he wished to hear what was said on that floor on the subject. He did hear one gentleman say that he had a great mind to make a bid, but he was afraid that the people would not sanction the bargain. The gentleman from Massachusetts came out boldly and openly with his proposition. He put the Administration up to the highest bidder, and played the auctioneer with considerable skill and ability. "Going, going," said the gentleman; "can't I get a higher bid?" [Laughter, and cries of "A postponed sale."]

The gentleman exulted in the fate of the Whig party, and told them with much satisfaction that their party was destroyed. Now, let him ask the gentleman, in the utmost sincerity of his heart, whether he did not feel some little mortification and regret when he saw the banner under which he had so often rallied trailing in the dust, and trampled under the feet of those against whom he had fought for so many years?

After a few more remarks, not distinctly heard by the reporter, Mr. T. took his seat.

Mr. EVERETT obtained the floor, and, with a few preliminary remarks, moved the previous question. Before taking the question on this motion, however, Mr. E. asked that there might be a call of the House.

Mr. KENNEDY of Indiana appealed to the gentleman from Vermont to withdraw the call for the previous question until he, or some gentleman on his side of the House, could be heard on the subject.

Mr. EVERETT refused to comply.

Mr. KENNEDY said, if he could make no better arrangement, he would undertake to renew the motion, if the gentleman would withdraw it.

Mr. EVERETT insisted on his motion.

The question was then taken on the motion for a call of the House, and it was negatived.

Mr. BRIGGS called for tellers on seconding the demand for the previous question. Tellers, however, were not appointed; and the motion of the gentleman from Vermont was negatived.

Mr. KENNEDY then proceeded to address the House. The question of repealing the bankrupt law, he said, had created considerable sensation in that House. He originally voted against the passage of that law, but not because he was opposed to a well-regulated bankrupt system; and he should vote for the repeal bill, because he conceived a large majority of the American people had decided against the bill as it was. But he was free to say that he believed the bankrupt law of the extra session had done its worst; or, in the language of the gentleman from Vermont, who was its advocate, it had answered the purpose of its passage; or rather, he (Mr. K.) might say, the purpose of those who passed it. It had given the advantage to many, who were not entitled to it, to get rid of their honest debts; and now, when the time had arrived at which many honest men would take advantage of its provisions, it was to be repealed. He responded, then, fully to the observation of the gentleman from Vermont—that it had accomplished its object; and he (Mr. K.) would now vote against its repeal, if on this bill they could engraft a good one—one that would be prospective in its operation, and that should include corporations within its provisions. But, as he had said, he should now vote for the repeal bill, because the American people had said it must be repealed. He must, however, be permitted to say that the manner and the mode of the passage of that law were objectionable to him, and the House must excuse him if he spoke plainly on that subject. What, then, were the circumstances under which that bill became the law of the land? He understood one purpose to be, that it might be the means of passing other laws—that was the understanding he had at the time of its passage; but he had since heard it avowed by members on that floor—not in their capacity as members, certainly—that it was passed to carry the elections in the States of New York and Maine.

He now understood that it was feared by Whig gentlemen on that floor, that, unless they passed the bankrupt law, the Whig party would lose the States of New York and Maine; and in consideration of the Whigs carrying those States, the bankrupt law was enacted. He had heard some gentlemen say since, that, though they had paid the consideration, they had not received the equivalent, [laughter,] and he supposed their defeat operated on some of those gentlemen, and prompted them to this summary execution. [Renewed laughter.] Yes, because the Whigs, instead of carrying those States as they bargained, were routed "horse, foot, and dragoons," they would take back the bill. [Laughter.] Now, if that bill was passed with any such object, it was an unholy and dishonorable combination to betray the best interests of the country.

But he repeated, the mode and manner of the passage of that bill rendered it as obnoxious to him as the principles it contained. He objected to it, first, because of what it did contain; and, secondly, because of what it did not. That bill ought never to have been made to operate retrospectively, or on debts already contracted; for that was, in effect, to repudiate those contracts, and it was a wiping of them out with a congressional sponge. On that account, then, it became odious to the American people. But, further: it ought to have contained a provision to embrace corporations issuing paper as money; and it became odious to the American people also on account of that omission. And hence the people demanded its repeal, and repealed it must be. So much for the bill itself.

That debate was opened with a long lamentable story of the great defeat that was caused to the universal Whig party; and he (Mr. KENNEDY) absolutely felt a good deal of sympathy for those gentlemen, [laughter;] his heart was warm and tender, and, though he could war with the Whig party—yea, to the knife, and from the knife to the hilt—yet, when the gentleman from New York [Mr. BARNARD] spoke of their labors so dolorously—when he spoke of their labors as like those of some poor creature (whose name he had forgotten) who, through a long summer day, rolled a barrel full of stones up a hill, [roars of laughter] was then met by somebody who knocked them down again:—yes, when he heard this lamentable story, and this afflictive comparison, he almost shed tears over the fall of the "universal" Whig party. [Roars of laughter.] Truly, the Whig party had been rolling stones up the hill of public opinion; yea, even in the very teeth of the American people, and in despite of those principles whose declaration had been made. For the last quarter of a century they had been rolling them up with immense labor, and now, verily, they were knocked back again. [Laughter.]

He would now enter into that part of the debate which had been called the "desultory" part. [Laughter.] The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CUSHING] had said the Whig party had broken themselves to atoms against the buckler of Executive power, or against "a constitutional fact." [Laughter.] Now, he could tell the gentleman from Massachusetts that he was mistaken, and he [Mr. K] would correct him; for he intended, as he went along, to strike both at the right and at the left. The gentleman was wrong, then, in supposing that the Whig party had broken themselves into atoms against either Executive power, Executive vetoes, or "a constitutional fact." No, they had broken themselves to atoms by attempting to roll stones up the hill of public opinion. The truth was, the bankrupt act, together with divers other acts, were concocted and carried through the House of Representatives, and sent to the Senate as one grand whole; and they were to be forced through together. He (Mr. K.) admitted that a great effort was made; and he would admit, if gentlemen believed those measures were intended for the public good, that they did themselves great credit in forcing them through; for he believed, if his constituents meant him to do a thing, he would do it with all his might. But, with those gentlemen, it was a mistake that the American people had ever decided in favor of those measures. The truth was, that in the last campaign they played a game of "hide and go seek;" they put candidates on their ticket of unknown politics—men who could be said to be one thing in one part of the country, and another thing in another part; and thus they rallied that portion of the community that was with neither party, and thus they were enabled to break down the solid phalanx of Democracy. But soon occurred that which every man of foresight would have anticipated—playing, fighting, and quarreling with each other; and now they had heard threatenings of the total destruction of the "universal" Whig party. But the party to which he (Mr. KENNEDY) belonged was also threatened with the danger of being dashed to pieces on Executive authority. He did not speak by authority; but he spoke as one of the 52,000 or 53,000 Democrats of the Hoosier State—and he was the only one that had the right to speak there, [laughter]—and he would say, that if he must bid at all, he should be cautious to ascertain whether the bids were to be called out verbally or in writing; for, in the first case, he should be afraid of a want of authority to make the offer; and, in the next place, he should fear a forgery. So far, however, as the Democracy that he represented on that floor was concerned, he could say that they had no political alliances to form with any men—they had no threats to fear from any quarter—for they had but one set of uniform, straight-forward principles; and so far as the Executive was concerned, or anybody with the Executive,—so far as that Executive would carry out the principles of their party, so far would they stand by him, and not an inch further. But, for himself and his constituents, he must say that they were above the acceptance of office. If one of his Democratic friends should ask him (Mr. K.) to use his influence to get that friend an office, he would reply, No, sir. And why? Because he thought it was not right that they should hold office under this Administration. Nor did he think it right that they should hold office under the late Administration, when the deceased Executive was in the presidential chair; and for reasons which he had avowed, both there and elsewhere, to the world. He held that John Tyler was right in putting only such men into office as would give a fair, and candid, and liberal support to his Administration—if such could be found. [Roars of laughter] He (Mr. KENNEDY) cared not who the Executive might be. No one would hear him denounce the Executive for putting such persons in office, and removing those of an opposite description. It was right that it should be so; for the Executive was placed at the head of the Administration, and he ought to carry out, as he had the responsibility of, his own measures. Should he be told that there should be enemies in the camp, to undermine the measures which the Executive designed for the good of the country? No; it would be suicidal. He, therefore, said to his Democratic friends that, so far as he was concerned, he believed it to be right that John Tyler's friends should have the offices if they were qualified to discharge the duties and to give faithful services to the country. But to return to another question. He knew not whether the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CUSHING] intended to horrify them with the threat of vetoes to be exercised hereafter, when the Democratic party should have the majority on that floor; but, as he understood him, the gentleman from Massachusetts spoke to the effect that the Whigs had been in power a year and a half, and they had passed a United States Bank bill, and other adverse measures, which the President had vetoed; and those vetoes had destroyed that party. The Democrats were coming into power; for they would have a majority in the next Congress: and, if they persisted in adhering to their old false notions in favor of a sub-treasury, instead of taking the exchequer, (which was the next thing to a sub treasury; and, if they would leave it with him for a few minutes, he would make it a good one,) they would be vetoed too. He knew not whether this version was the correct one; but he would tell that gentleman what his (Mr. KENNEDY'S) own views were on that subject. He did not expect to be in the next Congress at all; he was told that his constituents had some objection, [laughter:] if, however, it should be his good or bad fortune to be a member of the next Congress, he should vote for just such measures as coincided with his judgment, right or wrong. If right, and the Executive approved them, well and good; but if the Executive vetoed them, he would tell the House what he would not do;—he would not turn round and commence a denunciation of the Executive; he would not, because the President had crossed his purposes, by a frank discharge of what he honestly conceived to be his duty, take advantage of that circumstance, to tear in pieces the Constitution which governed his country. He would tell gentlemen that he looked upon the Constitution as the great palladium of his country's safety. He would also say, that if he were consulted in the future operations of Congress, he would not give him occasion to use the veto power against them.

He had noticed what effect the course which had been pursued had had on the Western people; and if there was one characteristic which the American people admired more than another, and which they would rally round and sustain more than any other, it was a bold and fearless discharge of duty, regardless of all consequences. He had never seen the time yet (and he hoped he never should see the time) when the veto power was exercised contrary to the wish of the majority of the people. It never had been exercised, that the American people had not rallied round and sustained it. They rallied by instinct around the man who had the courage to take the responsibility of his duties. General Jackson avowed himself ready to "take the responsibility;" and what armed that man's arm, and strengthened it like iron? It was that fearless characteristic which gave evidence of honesty of purpose.

The people believed him to be honest when he had the nerve to do what he believed to be his duty, regardless of all consequences; and thus it was that General Jackson became the idol of his country. He (Mr. KENNEDY) had no disposition to make John Tyler a greater man than God Almighty made him; and, therefore, he never should, so far as he was concerned, give him the opportunity to strike the Democratic party with the vetoes. All hoped they would get a man that would approve their measures. He repeated, he had no desire to make John Tyler a greater man than he was intended to be by God and nature; but he must do him justice. He believed John Tyler was an honest kind of an old soul; [roars of laughter;] he believed John Tyler was as honest as any man they ever had or wished to have, [laughter;] he did not think that John Tyler was as great a man as General Jackson by a considerable spell, [roars of laughter.] But he was as honest a man as they had occasion for, [renewed laughter;] and he believed a majority of the people thought so too; though he was also of opinion that, notwithstanding all the storms that might be raised in the country, he would never again be put into the presidential chair. No, but he would be permitted to retire with a good honest name. [Laughter.] It was true, some individuals would bespatter him with abuse, and attack his character: he had already been denounced as a traitor—but to what? To his country? No; no man ever dared say that John Tyler was a traitor to his country. Well, then, he had been called a traitor to his party; and the very men who made that denunciation were the men who denounced General Jackson, because he would do what his party wished him to do. Now he (Mr. KENNEDY) was a party man; he was radical to the root; he was the most ultra man they ever saw; and if even John Tyler could get the nomination of the national convention which they were to have soon, he would go for him. His colleague [Mr. THOMPSON] had expressed the hope that he might get a chance to attack one of the southern pillars of Democracy, and, if that wish should be gratified by the nomination of that distinguished man, he [Mr KENNEDY] should say Amen; and for that chieftain he would do battle with as much pleasure as for any gentleman in these broad States. And further, if his colleague supposed that that gentleman would be the most weak adversary he could find in the Democratic ranks, if he became their standard bearer, he was very much mistaken. He would tell the gentleman further, that they were going to have a great national convention, to nominate a candidate for the Presidency; and not for the purpose of obtaining the spoils, or of getting over that "fact"—[laughter]—for, however, pleasant that might be, it was a secondary question with the Democracy—but for the maintenance of certain great principles and great measures of these United States. [Cries of "Name them."] Well, he would give them some of them.] Cries of "No, no; go on."] Well, he supposed they were pretty well known; and if there were any gentlemen there who were not acquainted with Democratic principles, he would refer them back to their horn-books, for they were as plain as the simple elements of the language in which they were written. He repeated, then, that they were going to have a convention; and, whenever they met, if they did not promulgate what their principles were, in black and white, so that every man in the country could be informed, he (Mr. K.) would not vote with them.

But when they were published, they would be found to be no rabble medley of politics. They would not avow a United States Bank here, and anti-bank principles there; a tariff here, and anti-tariff sentiments there; a bankrupt law here, and an opposition to a bankrupt law there; distribution here, and opposition to distribution there. He fought in no such ranks. His party's creed would be known to the world. They would say what they would, and what they would not do; and if John Tyler could answer the catechism, and get the nomination of that convention, he (Mr. K.) supposed he would be good enough for him, [laughter,] notwithstanding all the corruption with which John Tyler had been surrounded; [renewed laughter;] and it was surprising how men might be corrupted by bad example. [Roars of laughter.] But the vetoes, and some of the acts of John Tyler, he approved; and he was not disposed to shut the door against any man who was of the right stamp.

Let the House only think for a moment of an administration with Daniel Webster and John C. Spencer as its high priests, endeavoring to recommend itself to the Democracy. [Laughter.] He thought it would be as easy to graft a crab apple upon an orange tree, as to make Daniel Webster a Democrat. [Laughter.] But he believed Mr. Webster had declared somewhere in Virginia that he was a Democrat—a Jeffersonian Democrat. [A voice: "At Patchogue."] He, for one, confessed that he was prejudiced against him, and ever had been. It was not until lately, when he was abused and denounced by the Whigs, that he had begun to inquire minutely into his real character. He confessed that the abuse of the Whigs had led him to believe there might possibly be some virtue in Daniel Webster, after all that had been said against him, and notwithstanding he had ever thought him a political leper from head to foot. But since those men who had gone and drunk Mr. Webster's wine on the right of the passage of the bankrupt law—those men who had been once so gracious with him—had begun to abuse him, he (Mr. K.) had looked a little more into his history. If, upon a close examination of his life and character, he could find one green spot to rest his eye upon, he would even consent to admit him into the Democratic party; but only as a private, doing battle in the ranks. [Laughter.] As to bargains, he would tell his colleague [Mr. THOMPSON] on behalf of the Democrats of the Hoosier State, that they would make none whatever.

He did not understand the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CUSHING] as having set up the Administration to the highest bidder, although he must confess the remarks of the gentleman had a powerful squinting that way. [Laughter.] What he understood the gentleman to state, was, that the dominant party in the House had become, by its course with regard to the President, no more than a faction; that they were disposed to trample under foot all regard for the Constitution, and the interests of the country, in order to put down Mr. Tyler; and that they manifested a spleen, unbecoming the character of American Representatives. He did not certainly understand the gentleman as meaning any more than that John Tyler, thus situated, and thus opposed by the majority in Congress, should carry on the Government by the best means in his power. John Tyler was President of the United States, and bound to perform his duties as such. It was immaterial to the people who was President, but very important to them that the Government should not be stopped. If John Tyler found the Whig party ever blocking him up, and opposing all efforts on his part to administer the Government, he (Mr. K.) held that it was not only his right, but his duty, as President, to look beyond that party, and to every part of the continent, for aid.

He hoped the Democratic party would not take the responsibility of the acts of the present Administration. Yet he would never vote against any measure whatever, merely on account of its being recommended by John Tyler. He should vote for whatever he thought right, let who might recommend it. Nor would he join with those whose object was to break down John Tyler.

After the general rout which the Whig party had sustained since the adjournment of the last session of Congress, he had supposed they would have been taught wisdom, and have changed their tone. Whipping was beneficial in its effect upon children generally, and so he thought it would be upon the Whigs. Never did a party so much need taking down. None was ever so haughty, so presuming, so self-conceited. Well did he remember the declaration of the imperious tenant of Ashland, that the Democratic party was like a criminal under the gallows, waiting only for the signal of execution, on account of its manifold crimes! Yes! the Democratic party was insulted and upbraided by a likening to the doomed convict with the halter about the neck! and such were the expressions uttered in relation to that party by the sage of Ashland, and repeated by his white Charlies all over the country! Indeed, it appeared to him that the whole Whig party were acting as a band of tyrants during the extra, and even at the last session of Congress. At these sessions, all freedom of discussion was effectually set aside, the gag introduced, and the legislation of this hall made to play second fiddle to proceedings in caucus. But he must in a measure exculpate his Whig friends for what they had done so badly. He did not accuse them of having perpetrated all the mischief of which they were the authors on purpose, but only on account of their ignorance of the business of legislation. They knew not how to manage. They had been too long out of power. They had been on the grass until they became lank and lean. The consequence was, that their conduct at every step was marked by excesses; and such a set of legislators he hoped never again to see. They introduced the hour rule, the gag, the dictation of caucuses; and manifested a high degree of hauteur in all their proceedings. Supposing that they had been effectually checked by the late election, he had written to his friends in Indiana, that they were chopfallen and in low spirits—dashed to atoms, as the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CUSHING] remarked. He hoped that the fact that congressional President-making had broken down one party, would be an effectual warning to others to let the people alone make Presidents hereafter.

He next proceeded to speak of the manner in which this personal and party debate had begun, and traced the origin of it to the remarks of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. ARNOLD,] who poured out bile, like a sluice, against the present Administration, and what he termed the "subterranean Democrats." The commencement of the debate lay with the opposite side of the House; and he (Mr. K.) had never known the time of the House to be consumed by a party debate, which did not originate with the Whigs. Heretofore, during the present session, smarting under their recent lashing, they had forborne to enter into a personal and party debate. Of late, however, they had forgotten their whipping by the people, and launched out into their former violent course. Was it, then, to be expected that the special friends of Mr. Tyler would sit there and quietly hear themselves denounced in every manner, and on all occasions, without attempting to reply? The Whig party showed, throughout their whole conduct, that they were looking too much to the perpetuation of the power which had fallen upon them by accident. He could assure them that, unless they changed their course, such an accident would never happen to them again. [Laughter.]

In speaking for the Democracy of the Hoosier State, he could assure the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. CUSHING,] as well as his colleague, [Mr. THOMPSON,] that there was no danger of any bargain being consummated with John Tyler. From present appearances, he believed there was as much prospect of the ultras of the Whig party, the Clay men—the white Charlies—coming into the Democratic ranks, as there was of the Tyler men. He had no apprehension of any bargain being entered into. The Democrats would support any measure which they believed to be right, and calculated to advance the best interests of the country, without infringing upon the Constitution—and none other. As to the exchequer, he would say that, although it had his decided preference over a national bank, yet he would never take it in preference to the sub-treasury. He cared not for names, and should, therefore, have no objection to vote for the sub-treasury under the name of the exchequer. Give him a pen, and in five minutes he could make the exchequer similar to the sub-treasury, and perfectly acceptable to himself. By striking out all after the enacting clause, and inserting the body of the old sub-treasury bill, the exchequer might at once acquire a large number of friends.

He next proceeded to notice the ground taken by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CUSHING] against the veto power, when used by General Jackson. Why did that gentleman then war against that power? This warfare against the constitutional power of the President had been usual in the country, whenever exercised to defeat any action of Congress. For his own part, he never wished to encounter this power in the face of his own measures; still, never would any warfare that might be carried on against such a conservative power induce him to consent to its being stricken out from the Constitution. If Mr. Tyler was wrong in using this power, let his enemies abuse his act. Let them contend that the particular occasion of its use was improper and uncalled-for; but not attempt to tear up the whole power from the Constitution. Let them not mutilate that sacred instrument, merely because it has been, in a few instances, the means of impeding their measures.

He hoped that he should be exonerated from the charge, either express or implied, of bargain with the present Administration. His colleague [Mr. THOMPSON] remarked that if the Democrats sat silent, inasmuch as silence gave consent, they would be taken as having consented to the arrangement proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts. Now, as he knew that whatever his colleague said here would be published and read in Indiana, he would assure him that, in early life, he saw the effects of political bargains, and was convinced of their entire impolicy and impropriety. It was the supposed, if not real, political bargain entered into some years since, that effectually caused the sun of Ashland to set forever. He (Mr. K.) had, therefore, resolved never to consent to any political bargain whatever, nor to suffer his name to be tainted with such a suspicion. As yet, he was at the beginning of his political life. He did not now know where the waves of politics and of party might carry him hereafter; but he was convinced that neither he, nor any party to which he might be attached, could be ever advanced by bargains and coalitions.

His colleague had very artfully contrived to say something about certain leaders in the Democratic party at the South and at the North, and to hint at a coming division between their respective friends. Now, he could assure his colleague, that if he expected to succeed that way, he would find himself, in the result, sadly mistaken. His colleague knew nothing of the bands which bound the Democratic party together. The affections of that party towards their public men were not, in the least degree, dependent upon their geographical location. Democracy knows no distinctions of geography. Let the candidate for the Presidency come from where he will, there will be no differences among them. Let the nomination fall upon whom it may, the party, whatever their individual preferences, will rally around him. The Democratic party says to the Whigs, We want none of your interference; mind how you interfere with our concerns; if you continue to intermeddle with us, we will unite upon any man that is true; our prejudices will yield, and your interference but bind us closer together.

But his colleague expected that the Whig party would, in its turn, be benefited by the "constitutional fact," when the Democrats should have a majority, at the next Congress. Let him indulge this expectation, if he wished: he (Mr. K.) thought he would be mistaken. When the Democratic convention should have met, and settled the claims of rival candidates, the party would be found united as a band of brothers. His colleague would then find himself mistaken in his hopes of Democratic divisions, and, through them, of a Whig triumph—or he was no prophet.

Mr. WISE next obtained the floor, and moved an adjournment; but withdrew the motion, at the request of Mr. TRIPLETT, who wished to have entered a motion to reconsider the vote of the House on yesterday, refusing to employ a clerk to the Committee on Public Expenditures.

The motion for an adjournment was then renewed, and carried.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, December 29, 1842.

Mr. TALLMADGE presented three memorials from the city of New York, remonstrating against the repeal of the bankrupt act.

Also a memorial of a like character from Rochester, New York.

Mr. T. said the letter, accompanying the latter memorial, remarked that the memorial was signed without distinction of party; and that there was great unanimity against the repeal of the law, but in favor of its modification: referred to the Judiciary Committee.

On motion by Mr. CRAFTS, it was ordered that the petition of Ashael Spalding, asking compensation for disbursing money as pension agent, be taken from the files of the Senate, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WILLIAMS presented a petition from Seth Sweetser, a native citizen of the United States, praying Congress to establish a regular line of packets to Chagres, and an overland mail to Panama; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented a memorial from a number of citizens of Adams county, Pennsylvania, praying for the repeal of the bankrupt law; which was referred to the Judiciary Committee.

Messrs. PORTER, BERRIEN, WHITE, and WOODBRIDGE, severally presented memorials from the city of New York, remonstrating against the repeal of the bankrupt act; which were referred to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. PHELPS presented a memorial from certain inhabitants of the Territory of Wisconsin, asking an appropriation for the construction of a harbor at Milwaukie, for the protection of the commerce on the lakes; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Also, presented a memorial from the same quarter, urging upon Congress the propriety of making no appropriations to pay the expenses of the Legislative Assembly of Wisconsin of this year; but asking that the amount which would be necessarily appropriated for that object, for the past and present year, may be appropriated and applied to the purposes of building one or more harbors on the lakes: referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. SMITH, from the Committee on Public Lands, remarked that a petition from James Trimbull, asking the privilege of relocating a military bounty land warrant, and for a pension, was referred to that committee. In reference to the first branch of the petition, he remarked that there was a general law in existence, which provided for the matter; and as the second branch fell within the duties of the Pension Committee, he moved that the Committee on Public Lands be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Pensions: agreed to.

Mr. S. also reported back, from the same committee, without amendment, and with a recommendation that it do pass, the bill for the relief of Elizabeth Monroe.

Mr. PHELPS presented a memorial from Dr. Andrew Welch, asking compensation for services rendered certain companies of Florida volunteers in the year 1837; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

DISTRIBUTION OF THE SURPLUS COPIES OF THE CATALOGUE OF THE LIBRARY OF CONGRESS.

The joint resolution from the House, to authorize the distribution of part of the surplus copies of the Catalogue of the Library of Congress to members of the present Congress, came up for consideration as in committee of the whole; the pending question from yesterday being on Mr. KING's motion to postpone the resolution indefinitely.

Mr. TAPPAN observed that he had but a few words to say on the subject, as he conceived the proposition to be very plain. He was as much opposed to the printing or purchasing of books for distribution as any one. But here was a different case; the books, in this instance, were on hand, occupying, most inconveniently, room wanted for other purposes. They were, in fact, an incumbrance to the library, and it was very desirable to get rid of them in some way; and the committee considered the mode pointed out in the resolution the most satisfactory and useful. There are 700 surplus copies on hand. The resolution proposes to give to each member of the present Congress one copy. This will dispose of only about 300; leaving 400 in the library, which every one must allow will be enough for the use of those who may have occasion for them hereafter. If some better mode of disposing of those books were pointed out, the committee would take it into consideration. But it did appear to them that, by giving each member of Congress a copy of this catalogue, a useful purpose would be subserved, not only in relation to the facility afforded to gentlemen in making references to the books in the library, necessary to consult in the way of business; but, in regard to the circulation of the catalogue throughout the country. Mr. T. here referred to lists of various other surplus copies of books which greatly encumbered the apartments of the library, and which the committee desired might be disposed of in some useful way. He again remarked that he was opposed to the printing or purchasing of books for distribution to members; but as these surplus copies of the catalogue were on hand, and it was very inconvenient to keep them any longer, he hoped the resolution would be adopted.

Mr. KING remarked that the honorable Senator from Ohio was so much more conversant with matters relating to the arrangement of the library, that he should not dispute his conclusion that it was necessary to dispose of a portion of those surplus copies of the catalogue. He was, however, of opinion that many of the books referred to in the Senator's list were found no incumbrance.

With regard to the catalogue, he would say that he was willing to vote for a proper distribution to the literary and scientific institutions of the country; but he was utterly opposed to the principle of members of Congress voting to distribute to themselves anything of the kind, even of the smallest value. They had no right to distribute to themselves books, or anything else, paid for by the public money. This matter might appear inconsiderable, but still it involved the principle; and if it is allowed now, there is no knowing where the practice may stop, or to what amount it may be indulged in. Already, shameful abuses in this way had disgraced the legislation of Congress. It was time to put a stop to them. There ought to be some stopping point; and he thought the present was a suitable occasion to arrest the practice. If this surplus cannot be longer kept, let the distribution be made to literary and scientific institutions, and the libraries of State Legislatures; or—what would be much better—let them be sold for whatever they will bring, to reimburse so much of their original cost. They will sell for something; and, however little it may be, it will be a better disposition of them than that proposed.

Mr. SEVIER inquired of the chairman of the Committee on the Library what those catalogues were worth?

Mr. WOODBRIDGE replied that he had no means of ascertaining, and could not satisfactorily answer the question. While up, he would say that, personally, it was indifferent to him whether the resolution passed in its present form or not. But, as chairman of the committee, he conceived it proper that he should reiterate the views of the committee, unanimously concurred in, and expressed by the Senator from Ohio. The object of the distribution to members of Congress is to afford them facilities for performing their duties. This, therefore, was not the first step, or a new thing; for facilities of this kind had always been accorded to Representatives in Congress. It differed in no respect, in this instance, from the facilities for transacting business afforded by the printed documents, reports, and pamphlets, daily laid on the desks of the members of both Houses. The principle was the same, whether the printed matter was in sheets like this, (taking up a Senate document,) or a catalogue of books, necessary to be occasionally consulted in the library of Congress. The committee, therefore, in recommending the resolution, did not enforce any principle different from that upon which, from the beginning of the Government, facilities for business had been furnished to members of Congress. These catalogues were books which were only valuable for present use. In a few years they would be worthless, and would be superseded by a new catalogue. It was considered by the committee that they could not be of so much use to any one else as to the present members of Congress. If it was desirable to give some of them to the literary institutions of the country, enough would be left, after supplying each member of Congress, to distribute to such institutions. The simple question was, whether each member should have a copy of the catalogue, exceedingly useful and valuable to him in the performance of his duty; or the books should remain an incumbrance, if not otherwise given away, to no purpose.

The debate was further continued by Messrs. SEVIER and TAPPAN in favor of the resolution, and by Messrs. KING and LINN against the principle of distribution to members of Congress.

Mr. WOODBURY suggested a modification, if the Senator from Alabama would withdraw his motion to postpone. The modification was, in effect, to insert "literary institutions and universities."

Mr. KING consented to withdraw his motion of postponement, for the purpose indicated by the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. LINN suggested the propriety of excepting literary institutions and universities which had already received copies.

Mr. WOODBURY then submitted his amendment.

Mr. TAPPAN moved a modification of that portion of the resolution which proposed the distribution to "members of Congress," by leaving out those words, and inserting "to each person entitled to the use of the library of Congress."

Mr. WALKER thought the resolution ought to be recommitted to the Committee on the Library. He made a motion to that effect, but it did not prevail.

The question was then taken on Mr. TAPPAN's amendment, and it was adopted—ayes 18, noes 11.

Mr. KING moved an amendment, "excepting members of Congress."

This was decided in the negative—ayes 12, noes 18.

Mr. WOODBURY explained that he could not vote for his amendment as amended.

Mr. EVANS believed many of the colleges had already received copies of the catalogue, and, therefore, he thought it would be well to adopt the suggestion of the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. LINN,] and except such as had.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE said he had that moment been informed by the Librarian that such was the fact.

The amendment was accordingly modified, so as to except institutions already supplied with copies of the catalogue.

The resolution, as amended, was reported back to the Senate; and, on the question, "Shall the amendments be ordered to be engrossed, and the joint resolution read a third time?"

Mr. KING called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered; and resulted—yeas 20, nays 13, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bates, Berrien, Clayton, Conrad, Crafts Evans, Fulton, Merrick, Morehead, Phelps, Porter, Sevier, Simmons, Smith of Indiana, Sturgeon, Tallmadge, Tappan, White, Wilcox, and Woodbridge—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Archer, Benton, Buchanan, Henderson, King, Linn, McRoberts, Mangum, Smith of Connecticut, Walker, Williams, and Woodbury—13.

So the amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the joint resolution to be read a third time.

QUINTUPLE TREATY.

Mr. BENTON submitted the following resolution, which, under the rules, lies one day on the table, viz:

Resolved, That, in addition to copies of all the correspondence with and from all our ministers abroad in relation to the quintuple treaty, the President be requested to communicate to the Senate (so far as it may be compatible with the public interest) all such correspondence in relation to the treaty with Great Britain.

The following bills, which had been ordered to be engrossed heretofore, were taken up, read the third time, and passed, viz:

The bill for the relief of J. R. Vienne, of Louisiana;

The bill for the relief of sundry citizens of Arkansas, who lost their improvements in consequence of the treaty between the United States and the Choctaw Indians;

The bill allowing drawback upon foreign merchandise exported in the original packages to Chihuhua and Santa Fe, in Mexico;

The bill to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to make an arrangement or compromise with any of the sureties on the bonds given to the United States by Samuel Swartwout, late collector of the customs for the port of New York;

The bill for the relief of Stalker and Hill; and

The bill for the relief of Ephraim B. Dixon.

Mr. CONRAD submitted the following resolution; which, there being no objection, was then considered and adopted:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury make report to the Senate what proportion of the public lands in the State of Louisiana have been returned as not worth the cost of survey; and also, if practicable, to cause to be prepared and transmitted to the Senate a plan or diagram of such lands, showing the situation and character thereof.

The bill allowing compensation to pension agents came up as in committee of the whole.

Mr. BATES explained that the bill allowed pension agents 2 per cent. upon all disbursements, subject to the discretion of the Secretary of War; but in no case were such agents to be allowed more than $1,000 per annum, whatsoever the amount of money disbursed by them.

Mr. BENTON was opposed to the system of allowing percentages on disbursements, and remarked that it had been abandoned heretofore by Congress, in consequence of the great abuses which grew up under it. It was wrong in principle, because it caused a conflict of interests between the agent and the United States. It made it the interest of the agent to increase the disbursements, while it was the interest of the United States that they should be diminished.

Messrs. BATES, KING, PHELPS, and SEVIER maintained that it was indispensably necessary, and just and proper, that some compensation should be made those agents for the duties they performed for the Government; and, unless it was done, it would be impossible to get persons to take all the responsibility of disbursing large sums of money at their own risk. They pointed out the danger of the old mode of compensating agents; that was, by allowing them to make use of the money (which was deposited in their hands some months in advance of the time of payment to the pensioners) in speculating purposes, before its disbursement; and showed that the alternatives were either to continue this mode, with its dangers; to give a percentage on the sum disbursed, or a fixed salary; or to be left without agents at all. Agents were indispensably necessary; and they preferred to allow a percentage on disbursements, under the guards in the bill, because it was the most economical and just mode—the agent being compensated only in proportion no his disbursements, which compensation could in no case exceed $1,000.

After a few remarks by Mr. BENTON in reply, and there being no proposition to amend the bill, it was reported to the Senate, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill to continue the office of Commissioner of Pensions was then taken up, as in committee of the whole.

Mr. ARCHER moved to amend the bill, by reinstating the salary of the Commissioner to what it was two years ago, ($3,000;) stating, at the same time, that it was done without any solicitation on the part of the Commissioner, whom he had never conversed with; though he had been informed that he was a valuable officer.

Mr. BATES remarked that it was nothing more than just that the salary of the Commissioner should be reinstated to what it was formerly. Though no application had been made by that officer to the Committee on Pensions to have that object effected, he would be pleased to see it done.

Mr. SEVIER would acquiesce in the amendment, if the Senate thought proper to adopt it; but he thought, as the duties of that officer were diminishing yearly, and as the present was the time to economize, it might not be proper to hazard the passage of the bill by such an amendment.

The question was put on the amendment, and it was disagreed to.

The bill was then reported to the Senate, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill for the relief of the Steamboat Company of Nantucket was then considered as in committee of the whole; and, there being no motion to amend, it was reported to the Senate, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

On motion of Mr. LINN,

The Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, December 29, 1842.

Mr. KENNEDY of Maryland observed that a select committee was appointed yesterday, to inquire into the propriety of carrying the mail round the coast by steamers; and he begged leave to offer an additional resolution, to inquire into the expediency of employing the same vessels for the inspection of the light-houses on the coast.

Mr. K. then submitted the following; which was considered and adopted:

Resolved, That the select committee appointed to inquire into the expediency of contracting with private companies or others for the transportation of the mail in steamers along the coast, and for other purposes, be also instructed to inquire and report as to the expediency of employing such steamers, under the direction of the proper department, in visiting and inspecting light-houses upon the several coasts of the United States, and of performing such duties in reference thereto as may be found conducive to the preservation and effective use of the same.

ASSUMPTION OF STATE DEBTS.

Mr. JAMES COOPER asked leave to present the petition of a large number of citizens of Adams county, Pennsylvania, praying Congress to adopt some measure which will give the States such a portion of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, in the shape of stocks of the Federal Government, as will enable them to pay their debts, &c. He was not going (Mr. C. said) to trouble the House with any remarks on the subject of this petition, further than to say that he was in favor of its objects. He would prefer the sending it to a select committee; and if the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. WM. COST JOHNSON,] who had heretofore presented petitions with the same object in view, and had also given notice of his intention to introduce a bill on the subject, would now move for the appointment of such a committee, he would not move a reference to one of the standing committees. He would be glad to see this question brought fully before the people; for he was sure that it would sooner or later commend itself to their attention, as the best measure of relief from the embarrassments brought on them by an inflated currency, as well as by a mal-administration of the General Government.

Mr. WM. COST JOHNSON said that he would avail himself of the occasion to make a motion that would save a great deal of the time of the House. He had heretofore given notice of his intention to introduce a bill on this subject; and if the House would now agree to the appointment of a select committee to take charge of that bill, and the petition now presented, together with all similar petitions, it would obviate the necessity of his making several speeches and several motions, which he should otherwise be obliged to do. Mr. J. then moved for the appointment of a select committee.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON moved to lay the motion and petition on the table.

Before taking the question,

Mr. WM. C. JOHNSON presented a petition on the same subject, signed by a number of the citizens of the State of Maryland, together with a letter from one of its signers, explaining its objects and bespeaking his favorable consideration; which were read.

The question was then taken on Mr. CAVE JOHNSON's motion to lay the whole subject on the table; which motion was lost.

The question recurring on Mr WM. COST JOHNSON's motion for the appointment of a select committee,

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON called for the yeas and nays, but they were not ordered; and

On taking the question, it was carried—ayes 76 noes 69.

So the select committee was ordered.

Mr. STEENROD, in pursuance of notice given yesterday, on leave, introduced a bill to amend the act establishing the district court of the United States at Wheeling, Va.; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

On motion of Mr. CUSHING,

The report of the commissioners appointed for the exploration and survey of the Northeastern boundary was ordered to be printed.

GENERAL JACKSON'S FINE.

Mr. PICKENS presented certain resolutions of the Legislature of South Carolina, instructing their Senators, and requesting their members, to aid the passage of a law to refund to General Jackson the fine imposed upon him by Judge Hall, of New Orleans, in 1815; and he moved that it might be printed, and have the same direction as the resolutions presented by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE.]

The motion was agreed to, and the resolutions were committed to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, having in charge a bill on that subject.

Mr. P. also presented a resolution of the Legislature of South Carolina, asking Congress to refund the fine imposed on Dr. Cooper, for libel against the United States, under the alien and sedition law; and, on his motion, the resolution was referred to the Judiciary Committee, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. EVERETT presented certain resolutions of the Legislature of Vermont, asking the repeal of the bankrupt law.

The resolutions were ordered to be printed, and laid on the table.

Mr. EVERETT also presented resolutions of the Legislature of Vermont, in relation to the continuance of pensions to certain widows.

The resolutions were ordered to be laid on the table.

THE DISTRICT SYSTEM OF ELECTION.

Mr. EVERETT presented a memorial, signed by 57 members of the Legislature of New Hampshire, praying Congress to divide that State into four districts for the election of members of Congress; and, in doing so, he would state that the Legislature of New Hampshire had refused to lay it off into districts. He concluded by moving that it be referred to the Committee of Elections, and that it be printed.

Mr. ATHERTON inquired if it was in order to say a word or two on that subject?

The SPEAKER said it would not be in order if objections were made.

Mr. STANLY objected.

Mr. ATHERTON said he merely wished to make one or two remarks in relation to that petition; and he observed that the gentleman from Vermont had made some remarks on its introduction.

Mr. EVERETT said, if the gentleman from New Hampshire wished to debate the petition, it must go over.

Mr. ATHERTON said he merely wished to say a very few words; and he should offer no objection to the gentleman from Vermont making just such disposition of the memorial as he should choose. [Cries of "Go on."] The memorial purports to be signed by fifty-seven members of the Legislature of New Hampshire, and requests Congress to district that State for the choice of members of Congress. It seemed to him to carry within itself its own answer. It bears on its face the strongest argument (aside from any constitutional objections) why its prayer should not be granted. He supposed the object of the presentation of petitions and memorials was to indicate to Congress the will of the people. Now, this memorial states expressly that the opinion of those representing a majority of the people of New Hampshire is adverse to districting the State, at present, for the choice of members of Congress. It is signed by fifty-seven members of the Legislature. The House of Representatives of New Hampshire is composed of about two hundred and forty members, and the Senate of twelve members. Here, then, are one-fourth of the members of the Legislature of N. Hampshire—and thus, it is fair to infer, representing one-fourth (or, at best, only a very small minority) of the people of New Hampshire—coming here, and, by this memorial, requesting the Federal Government to interfere and put down the will of a large and overwhelming majority of the people of the State.

Mr. EVERETT moved that the memorial be read. That having been done, he moved that it be referred to the Committee of Elections, and that it be printed.

Mr. J. CAMPBELL moved that it be laid on the table.

That motion was negatived; and on the motion of Mr. EVERETT, the memorial was referred to the Committee of Elections, and it was ordered to be printed.

Mr. HOPKINS called for the orders of the day.

Mr. KENNEDY of Maryland obtained permission to present a memorial from certain insurance companies of the city of Baltimore, praying Congress to remove the obstructions of the Ohio and Mississippi rivers; which was referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

The SPEAKER then called for reports from committees.

Mr. FERRIS, from the Committee on Commerce, made a report, accompanied by a bill, to test the practicability of establishing a system of electro-magnetic telegraphs in the United States. The bill was read twice, and referred to the Committee of the Whole.

On the motion of Mr. KENNEDY of Maryland, five thousand extra copies of the accompanying report were ordered to be printed.

Leave was given to withdraw various papers and petitions.

Mr. TRUMBULL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, made a report in the case of David Allspach, accompanied by a bill for his relief. The bill was read twice, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House.

JOINT RESOLUTION.

Mr. MOORE, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported the following joint resolution; which was adopted:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Senate and Clerk of the House be, and they are hereby, instructed to furnish to the Commissioner of the General Land Office the original reports from the several land offices in the State of Louisiana, made under the provisions of an act entitled "An act for the final adjustment of claims to land in the State of Louisiana," approved February 6, 1835, also, the title-papers and evidence relating to claims in said reports, confirmed by an act entitled "An act confirming certain land claims in Louisiana," approved July 6, 1842; Provided, That claimants shall be entitled to withdraw the original title-papers, after fair copies shall have been taken by the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

Mr GIDDINGS, from the Committee of Claims, reported the following bills:

A bill for the relief of James E. Hunt and others; and which were read twice, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House.

A bill for the relief of Conrad House;

Mr. PENDLETON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill for the relief of Boyd Reilly: read twice, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House.

UNITED STATES COURTS IN MAINE.

The engrossed bill "to change the time of holding the circuit and district courts for the district of Maine," came up on its third reading.

Mr. B. RANDALL, after a few remarks in opposition to the bill, moved to recommit it to the Committee on the Judiciary, with instructions to inquire into the expediency of striking out the first section. He stated that he would be willing to abide by the decision of the committee.

Mr. FESSENDEN opposed the motion, and explained the objects of the bill. He complained of the danger in which the bill would be placed by the proposed delay of action upon it.

Mr. RANDALL briefly rejoined.

The House refused to recommit the bill.

It was then read a third time, and passed.

BILLS FROM THE SENATE.

The following bills from the Senate were read a first and second time, and referred:

An act authorizing the relinquishment of the sixteenth sections, granted for the use of schools, and the entry of other lands in lieu thereof: referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

An act in relation to donations of land to certain persons in the State of Arkansas: referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

An act to repeal certain parts of the act of Congress, approved August 31, 1842, entitled "An act to establish certain post-roads:" referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

A resolution to establish an additional joint rule in relation to the presentation of claims or petitions: referred to the Committee of Claims.

LATE CONSUL AT TANGIER.

Mr. McKEON offered the following resolution; which was adopted:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to this House (if, in his opinion, it be not incompatible with the public interest) copies of correspondence between the late Consul General of the United States at Tangier, and the Government of Morocco.

SECOND REGIMENT OF DRAGOONS.

Mr. CROSS (in accordance with notice given a few days since) introduced a bill to repeal so much of the act of the 23d August, 1842, as requires the 2d regiment of dragoons to be converted into a regiment of riflemen after the 4th of March next.

The bill was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

MEMORIAL OF COLONEL BROOKS.

Mr. C. J. INGERSOLL rose to present a memorial from Colonel Brooks, of the District of Columbia, complaining of injustice done him in a report of the Committee on Indian Affairs at the last session. Mr. I stated that the author of the memorial was unknown to him, and it was immaterial to himself what reference was given it. After some further remarks,

Mr. STANLY moved that the memorial be laid on the table.

Mr. JAMES COOPER rose, and entered into an explanation of the transaction complained of in the memorial. He was proceeding to make strictures upon it, when

Mr. BOWNE asked if the debate was in order.

The SPEAKER said, only by general consent.

Mr. WISE objected.

Mr. READ called for the orders of the day.

The question was then taken, and the memorial was laid on the table.

Mr. WISE observed that he attempted the day before yesterday to get the floor, before the gentleman from Indiana, with the view not to enter at all into this debate, but to move the previous question. The position of the question, as it was now presented, with the various amendments to the bill for the repeal of the bankrupt law, was such, that the issue would come up before the House precisely as he desired it to come upon the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts; being that the repeal should take effect at the time of the passage of the act, and not to affect proceedings that have been commenced, and are not yet concluded.

He could not see that the question now at issue had any connexion with the repeal of the bankrupt law. He could not see that anything that had been said by his friend from Massachusetts required any particular reply; and, especially, he could not have expected to hear such reply from the quarter that it came from. He was ready to vote at once for the repeal of the bankrupt law; but the moment that he heard the remarks of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. THOMPSON,] he was compelled to fall into this debate, and to follow its letter and spirit; and all that he regretted now was, that he had not two hours instead of one, to say all that he had to say, and to endeavor to express what he felt (and he felt more than he could express) on the topics presented by that gentleman.

Calmly and coolly discussing this question, his first object would be to place his friend and colleague of the corporal's guard right, and in his true position; and to remove the gross injustice that had been done him by the gentleman from Indiana. What did the gentleman say of his friend from Massachusetts? He would repeat it; and he would now remark, that he doubted not but that the gentleman, after having slept a night on his remarks, was regretting what he had said before this hour of the day. From various places throughout the report of the gentleman's remarks, which was exceedingly correct, he selected two passages as a sample of the injustice that had been done his friend from Massachusetts. Mr. W. then read the following extracts:

"Mr. T. recollected that, during the Administration of the distinguished and venerable gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS,] there arose in this country a party who, on a bare suspicion"— and he might have added (Mr. W. said) a damning suspicion, that remains to this day, and will remain, whether it be false or true, upon that Administration, and all connected with it, forever. Mr. W. continued reading:

"a suspicion which exploded on the examination of the facts, that there was what was called bargain, intrigue, and corruption between that distinguished and venerable gentleman and another high functionary of the Government—that there arose a party who, for numbers, intellect, and moral and political power, had been unequalled in the history of the country."

The gentleman might have added, (said Mr. W.,) that the very elements of that party, which have been scattered since the Administration of General Jackson, remain, and entered into the composition of both the parties now existing in the country. He would not (Mr. W. said) comment on the results that followed from the overlooking of that fact. He would read further:

"All this opposition to that Administration was the result of a bare suspicion of corruption, bargain, or sale; and yet, notwithstanding that event was fresh in the memory of the country, and of every man in public life who was not a mere tyro in politics, they here saw the time come, in this era of boasted republican liberty, when an American Representative, representing an old Revolutionary State, one of the original thirteen—descending himself from a line of illustrious Revolutionary ancestry—was found coming into this hall, as a representative of the Administration"—

And he would say that this was the first time he ever heard of a man's coming there as the representative of the Administration—a new character of a representative, he must acknowledge.

"and boldly, openly, shamelessly offering the spoils of office to the highest bidder."

And then the gentleman (he would not say he ought to have been an auctioneer, for he showed that he could imitate one very well.) went through all the scenes of a sale, and asked [reading:]

"Who bids? I can't dwell. Here is a self-evident fact in the Constitution. Who bids? Going, going, going. Can't I get a bid? Will nobody bid? Gentlemen, the article must be sold. Start it, start it, for God's sake, for something:"

The gentleman might have added, these "hard times;" and the reporter interlarded "shouts of laughter."

Well, sir, what said another gentleman?—he meant the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. EVERETT.] That gentleman said that he "could not see the slightest necessity for such a speech in reply to the gentleman from Tennessee. On the contrary, it had appeared to Mr. E. to be a prepared speech—a studied speech, got in readiness beforehand, all ready to be brought out upon the first occasion that should present itself. Nor should he, indeed, subject himself to any great charge of uncharitableness, if he should suggest that it was a Cabinet speech, prepared upon advice, and uttered by authority."

This was the report of the reporter; his report was that "it was a semi-official and Cabinet speech."

Sir, (said Mr. W.,) you and I, and all the gentlemen here present yesterday—and he presumed all who were present the day before yesterday—heard what was said by the gentleman from Massachusetts. There were more than two hundred witnesses of all parties who heard the remarks of his friend made on that occasion.

Now, what did he say? Some things he had written down, and were precisely in substance all that any man could make of them, and all that the acutest ingenuity could infer from all he said on that occasion. First, in reply to a speech of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ARNOLD] one week ago—a speech that had the start of his friend from Massachusetts—not twenty-four hours, but seven days; his friend deprecated party excitement, such as had been exhibited by the gentleman from Tennessee; and this was called by the gentleman from Indiana throwing a firebrand into the House. He asked the gentleman from Tennessee, in the language of imprecation, or of deprecation, why these criminations and recriminations between the Whig party and the Administration should be continued. "Have you, gentlemen," he asked, "gained anything by this war upon John Tyler?—anything by this game of heading Captain Tyler or dying? Have you gained anything in warring against the veto—this fixed fact in the Constitution? Have you gained anything by attempting to tear the Constitution in tatters? Have the elections not satisfied you, in the name of sense, and in the name of interest, that this war of crimination and recrimination has not helped your party—that the people are not satisfied with it?" This language of his friend from Massachusetts, appealing to common sense, to patriotism, and to good feeling, had been denounced by the gentleman from Indiana as the throwing of a firebrand into the House. The gentleman said that there was no tempest, no war of offence or defence at this session of Congress, until the gentleman from Massachusetts began it. He (Mr. W.) would say that he never did begin it, even in reply; he deprecated crimination and recrimination, and the assault that was made on him, was made by one of the friends of the gentleman from Indiana. Sir, (said Mr. W.,) we were not disposed to enter into such conflicts. In one respect, the gentleman was right. He would admit to him that his friend from Massachusetts would have been in the wrong, if he had commenced this war on the Whig party; and that it would have been a cruel war, an inhuman war, and a most wanton and unnecessary attack. What! attack the Whig party now? He would as soon think of striking a woman, or kicking a dead body. The people themselves (said Mr. W.) have made the attack; the elections have decided the matter; and all that we were doing with those of them who are alive at this time, and able to rise on this floor and make assaults on the President of the United States and his friends, was to ask permission to hold back, and say to them "hands off!" This was all they wanted to do, for really they must be permitted the privilege of self-defence; and, if attacked with deadly weapons, to defend themselves with the most effective means in their power. Now, the protest of his friend from Massachusetts, so far from being intended to irritate and mortify his opponents, was, with the memory of his old connexions with the Whig party, most calmly and affectionately addressed to them, protesting against this useless and unprovoked war they were continually making upon the Administration. What did he do next? He told them that they had made a fatal war upon the Constitution, and upon the real interests and prosperity of the country; and that upon this fixed power in the Constitution their angry emotions were dashed into spray, as if from some mighty rock that was washed by the surges of the ocean. It was not the President that his friend alluded to—not his power; but the moral power of the people of the country; and the gentleman, in derision of the "fixed fact," argued that there was no moral power nor spirit of resistance in the people against attacks on our Constitution. He would say to them, in the language of Curran, speaking of the British constitution, that our Constitution would survive more than flames, more than conflagration; and that its spirit, throughout all these conflicts of party, walked safely abroad, fixed in the bosoms of the people, enlivening them, moving them, actuating them, and guarding them, as it was guarded by them.

Defeat upon defeat, he had told gentlemen, had been only followed by malevolence towards the President, and opposition to the Constitution as it is; and he had begged gentlemen to allow reason to resume its throne, to cease the strife of faction, and to take the best thing they could get for their country and for their constituents. In the third place, his friend [Mr. CUSHING] went farther—recurring, doubtless, to the violent war carried on in another quarter, out of the House, against the Administration, by the metropolitan organ of ultra Democracy—and he hoped he should be able to exempt ninety-nine out of every hundred of the Democratic party; but a few leaders of that party were determined that John Tyler should not have the credit of Republicanism and Democracy with their people and their followers; if they could help it—men who themselves were looking, not to principles, but to men. His friend [Mr. CUSHING] warned the moderate Democrats, who go for principles and not for men, to beware of the example of ultraism set by the Whigs before them. The Whigs could not get a Bank of the United States, and they preferred a war to the next best measure; and that war had broken them to pieces on the bosses of the Executive vetoes. His friend warned the Democrats, too, on their part, to prefer the next best measure to their extreme measure of a subtreasury, and not to rush their majority in the coming Congress on that same rock. The exhortation was to all parties to avoid extremes, and at this time to attend to the real interests and honor—he might say, of moderation and of reason. In the fourth place, he [Mr. CUSHING] warned—or threatened, if they pleased—the ultras of both sides, who were disposed to make war on the administration of the public affairs—who were disposed to make war on the Constitution—to take the best measures which they could obtain now, and for years to come, for the public good; that if they persisted in an internecine war on the Administration and the friends of the Administration, they might rue the result; that the Administration was based on an honest attempt, without a party, to serve the country—to do the best in its power for the people; that opposition to such an Administration, by either or any party, would not offend the President, would not offend patronage; but it might and would bring them in collision with the Constitution, and might and would offend the people, and the moderate masses of all parties; that the adherence which the Administration had obtained of the moderate and considerate portion of our Republican people, went on defeating faction and serving the country, and might defeat the ultras of all parties, and place power in the hands of the representatives of moderate principles and measures. But, fifthly, he went further. He warned the gentlemen of all parties, that if the President of the United States, in following a straight-forward line of duty—in pursuing a strict line of rectitude, from which he could not depart—could not be supported by one party in that course,—he would ask any party to come to the help—not his help, but the help of the country and its best interests. And permit him to say, (and he could call upon the Speaker to prove the truth of what he said: he could also call upon every man present whom, eighteen months ago, he could call a "brother Whig," to prove its truth,) that it was proclaimed by the Whig party, that whenever they placed their President in the Executive chair, he should be the President of the nation, and not the President merely of a party. What did they hear during the whole time of General Jackson's and Mr. Van Buren's administrations, vociferated by the Whigs, in every form of emphasis, in every variety of accent, in every tone of derision and denunciation? They heard the party (and the party was always italicised) spoken of with contempt and horror, as doing so and so; that the party in power did not profess to be the representatives of the people, but of the party. Now, that was all the sentiment avowed by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. CUSHING,] that when the Administration submitted any question, not to a party, but to the Representatives of the people in the Congress of the United States assembled—the Representatives of the people of the whole nation—that they should pass the best measure, and the people would care not if it were passed by one party or by another. Away with their parties. Party had its uses, and party had its abuses. The only good use of a party was to subserve the will of the majority—to subserve the will of the people. The abuse of party was to defeat the will of the people; and when party undertook to control the will of the people, it was then that a President of the United States did the most patriotic act that a public functionary could do, by arraying the power of the Constitution against the power of party. And for basing the President on these solid principles—for putting the Whigs on their own professions and their own sentiments—sentiments to which he (Mr. W.) adhered—that the President of the United States was not to be a party President—that he was not to look to the Whigs alone, or to the Democrats alone, but to the Representatives of the people, in their representative capacity, and not in their party relations;—it was on sentiments like these, remonstrances like these, warnings like these, that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. THOMPSON] had based the declaration that an honorable Representative from one of the most honorable States in this Union had set up the Executive power and the spoils of office to the highest bidder. He would say to that gentleman—and that gentleman knew the respect which he (Mr. WISE) bore him—that it pained him to hear such a monstrous perversion of facts from a gentleman so respectable; it grieved him to hear such a monstrous perversion of the sayings and doings of an adversary. It could neither do good to the cause which that gentleman advocated, nor credit to himself. And to the gentleman from Vermont—who had an equal title to his respect with the gentleman from Indiana—he would say, that the people of the United States could now judge well of Whig testimony, and of Whig facts, and of Whig proofs and inferences, when a gentleman rose on that floor, and asserted, without proof or knowledge on the subject, and in the face of a contradiction, that a speech delivered in that House the day before yesterday was well prepared, and was semi-official. In behalf of his friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. CUSHING,] he would declare, before the House, that, so far as one gentleman could judge of the mind and preparation of another, he did believe—as the gentleman assured him was the fact—that the speech was impromptu, without consultation, and without any pretence of preparation. And yet, in the face of these facts, gentlemen could boldly rise up, and say, on the one side, that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CUSHING] was speaking from authority; and, on the other, that it was an elaborate speech and semi-official. Now, there was a moral in this, and it was this: Those gentlemen, without other facts than those that were unknown, and disputed facts which occurred out of that House, had been giving to the country their statements, interpretations, and constructions. And now let him reason from the known to the unknown, and what would their testimony be worth before a jury of their country? If a gentleman from Indiana could rise, and, in the face of two hundred witnesses who heard what was said, and saw what was done, so monstrously misrepresent what was said and done, as to say that there had been a hawking, a shameless hawking of the Executive power and the spoils of office; if he could thus pervert the facts, in the face of two hundred witnesses—what were his convictions worth about facts which were disputed or unknown? That was the spirit of party. He did not attribute deliberate falsehood to the gentlemen—far be it from him to attribute any such thing to them. No; but so malign was the spirit of party, that, when it seized on the mind of a man, it embittered his heart, it blinded his vision, and it extinguished all charity in the human bosom. Yes, it would set an editor in the chair editorial to torment his ingenuity to pervert the meaning of an opposing party. But were they editors? Were they scavengers in that hall, to heap up filth against each other? Were they to rack their ingenuity to see how they could torture truth, and pervert it for the malign purposes of party? Or had they seats there as representatives of the people, to deal fairly with each other—to meet each other's facts and arguments, and, in the collision of debate, to elicit truth? Were they lawyers, that were trying to "make the worse appear the better cause?" Or were they gentlemen of sincerity and truth, who believed the cause they advocated was the best cause, and that it needed neither perversion nor misrepresentation to aid it? He appealed to every gentleman who had heard that debate, whether justice had been done to the gentleman from Massachusetts; and whether he had been guilty of an open, bold, shameless hawking of the spoils of Government.

He found that his time was nearly out, while what he had said was but the mere beginning—the mere clearing up of what had been said by his friend from Massachusetts. He wanted, if the rules of the House would give him the time, to prove the wisdom of the remonstrances, and the warnings, and the imprecations of his friend from Massachusetts; and he would recur to the history of the past, even up to the present moment, to show to the ultras of both parties the wisdom of his declarations—the morality of his declarations—and the truth of his declarations. And in the discussion of that history, he would touch on some facts about which he had not spoken as yet, and some facts which had been touched upon by the gentleman from Indiana; but he would not go into those facts at the present time. He had been waiting, and he would continue to wait, for the time for vindication;—and that occasion was when that honest impeachment should be brought up. But he did not see his colleague [Mr. BOTTS] in his seat, who had openly and privately proclaimed that he would impeach the President. He (Mr. WISE) was afraid, before that day came, his colleague would not have it in his power to vote on that question. But to return. There were facts behind the curtain undeveloped; but when the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BOTTS] should bring the President of the United States before the Senate, he (Mr. WISE) should be ready to speak of some facts which were within his own knowledge; at present, however, in anticipation of the day of impeachment, he should content himself with saying that, whatever others might say of him, he felt, and was proud to feel, that he had within him as good instinct as other men of what was honorable, and just, and true. He would say further, that there was no man in this country who had had better opportunity to know the secret movements of the Whig party, and of the Executive, and of the caucuses and councils of the Whig party there, than he had. And he believed he might justly go further; for he stood in a position to know both sides—and his constituents knew enough of him to believe him if he were doubted there—yes, there was a people who knew and would believe him, when he made to them the declaration that, notwithstanding all that had been uttered, notwithstanding all that had been published, not half was known, not half was published; and when all was known, when all was published, he believed the world, in its judgment, would sustain him in the opinion he now declared—that no man on earth ever acted with purer motive—no man on earth ever acted with purer design—that no man's intentions were ever farther from crime, or guilt, or perfidy, than John Tyler's.

He would go further than this—and he hoped that gentlemen of the Whig party would not take his remarks as reproachful to them, as he spoke for no one in particular here—he would say, when the truth became known, that the authors of the calumnies against the President's character and reputation, where he should be found guilty of treason and of perfidy, would be found guilty of a triple treason and a triple perfidy. He believed this, from the full knowledge which he had acquired of the designs and movements of both parties. He might say that he had been intimate with the motives and movements of the Whig party; and he would now proclaim a fact which hitherto had not been before the public gaze. In all the discussions on the subject, the disease—the cancer, which had eaten up its very vitals—of the Whig party, had been assigned an origin no farther back than the called session of Congress in 1841. The fact was, the disease of the Whig party dated further back; and gentlemen on that floor knew it as well as himself. It dated from the first organization of the Cabinet of Gen. Harrison. Had Harrison lived, the party would have been divided even more than at the present time. He should speak plainly, in order that both sides might understand him. The real difficulties in the Whig party originated with the jealousies of two great leaders of that party—Daniel Webster and Henry Clay. Daniel Webster was placed by Henry Clay in a post in the line of unsafe precedents, (the reporter might mark it—he did not say safe precedents.) It was as notorious as the sunlight of midday, that Daniel Webster was the favorite of the then President, Harrison. Although Gen. Harrison felt no enmity to Henry Clay, yet he never would have given him his good will. Henry Clay took his position in the Senate, and Daniel Webster in the Cabinet, at the head of the State Department. But it was a mistake to put Mr. Webster in the Department of State. True, he had the power of patronage—the giving of office, the distribution of the stars and garters of the Administration; but what had Clay with which to checkmate him? He answered, the power of confirmation or rejection of all appointments, in the Senate.

The House had witnessed a great outbreak and clamor against the veto power of the Executive. He would ask, is not power at the beginning of laws greater than the power of the veto? Give him the initiation of laws, and he would cheerfully give to the President the power of the veto. Heretofore, the President had not only the veto power, but also the initiation of legislation.

Turning to the Speaker, he disclaimed making any implication, either directly or indirectly, around or about, having reference to the conduct of that officer. Yet, he must say that the leader of a party—possessing, in fact, the Speaker's chair—controlling the appointment of committees, the organization of the House, the forms of business—deciding what should be entertained in the committees, and what in the House—prescribing the manner in which all propositions should be introduced, and eventually giving shape and substance to every measure—did indeed possess a great degree of power. Gentlemen might talk of the one-man power of the President; but he knew not of a greater one-man power than that actually exercised in the initiation of legislation. The great leader had taken especial care to hold the entire control over the initiation of business, by employing all the machinery of the organization of the House to accomplish his purposes. He had everything that could aid him at command, and all that was left was the power of the Constitution in the hands of the President.

Thus, therefore, whilst one of these great rival leaders had possession of the patronage of the Government, the other held a seat in the Senate, and was omnipotent in the House of Representatives. Was it not notorious that the candidate of one for the collectorship of the port of New York was Edward Curtis, and the candidate of the other Mr. Wetmore? Was it not universally known here, when the Cabinet was first organized, that the appointment of collector to the port of New York was a test of the strength of the two rivals with General Harrison? There were other facts connected with this subject in his knowledge, which he had not spoken of, and which he should hold sacred. But he now proclaimed it, that, had Harrison lived until this time, the ultra Clay clique would have been united with the Democratic party, and warring in common with them, not for any particular candidate, but against Daniel Webster. The seeds of disunion were sown in the Cabinet of General Harrison, and sprouted death to the Whig party. He (Mr. W.) had, on many occasions, heard men on that floor commence speeches in the most lugubrious and dolorous strain, lamenting over the death of Harrison, and then following up their preface with an attack upon the character and administration of John Tyler, attributing all the evils of the times to the fact of his being President. These lamentations, too, proceeded from men who were once prepared to hurl their vindictive thunderbolts against Harrison, because they feared that Mr. Webster would be his successor! Yes; it was the death of General Harrison that dispersed and broke up the plots and counterplots which were forming around him.

In making these remarks, he had no design to cast reproach upon any one. That reproach, if implied, fell upon Mr. Webster as well as Mr. Clay. But the battle lines had been drawn; and he (Mr. W.) spoke of facts.

To proceed with his narrative. The called session came, and John Tyler proclaimed, as distinctly as it could be proclaimed—as clearly as it could be made to appear on paper—that he would not sign a bank bill; that he considered the idea of a United States Bank as defunct, and as condemned by the general will of the country. The President went farther than this: he not only said that a bank had been condemned by the people, and by considerations of expediency, but also that the Constitution interposed an insurmountable objection to its establishment. Yet, in the face of these plain declarations, his friends—yes, his friends, for they called themselves the President's friends—framed the bank bill, and passed it. The veto came. In the interim, a thousand things transpired, of which he could not now speak

He had now arrived at that part of his remarks where he wished he could dwell longer than the rules of the House would permit him. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. THOMPSON] had commented on the fact, that a communication was made to the President by the Whig party, or a portion of that party in the House of Representatives, saying to him, that, if it could be understood that the Cabinet were to retain their places, the bank bill would not be sent to the President until the next session of Congress. The gentleman denied this, and positively assured the House that the charge was untrue. Now, he would ask the gentleman, how could he testify?

Mr. THOMPSON of Indiana said he would repeat the expression of his belief that the charge was untrue, and that no gentleman had been authorized to call upon the President and make such a proposition. So far as he knew the opinions and wishes of the Whig party in that House, he felt assured that no individual or committee ever had been, or ever would have been, authorized to submit any such proposition to the President.

Mr. WISE said he was sure that such would be the amount of the gentleman's answer to his question. What did it amount to? That one member out of 242 had no knowledge of the fact of any such proposition having been made to the President! He would inform the gentleman from Indiana that a thousand things happened, about the time to which he referred, which that gentleman did not dream of in his philosophy.

Mr. THOMPSON said he challenged proof of the charge. He called for the name or names of the men who had made this proposition to the President. Let them be announced, that the country might know who they are.

Mr. WISE said he had got gentlemen in the place where he wished them. They should not be gratified, except in his own way. He could, however, tell them that he might lay his hand upon more than one member of that House who could testify—[Many voices: "Let's hear their names"—"who are they?"—"we dare you to say."] Oh! gentlemen were brave, very brave, at this particular time; but let them bring forward their impeachment, and then he would show who was implicated.

The hour having expired,

Mr. FESSENDEN obtained the floor; but

Mr. WISE manifested a strong disposition to proceed; and, at the request of gentlemen in all directions, who showed an impatience to hear the speaker, he moved that the rules be suspended, in order to enable him to continue speaking for one hour more, or until he should have concluded his speech. [Many voices: "Let him proceed by general consent."]

Mr. FESSENDEN insisted on his right to the floor.

The SPEAKER was about to put the question upon allowing Mr. WISE to proceed; when

Mr. T. F. MARSHALL rose, and inquired whether the proposed exception to the one-hour rule was only intended for the benefit of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE,] and no other member?

The SPEAKER replied in the affirmative.

Mr. WARREN said he must insist upon having the yeas and nays.

They were taken, and resulted—yeas 100, nays 80, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Arrington, Atherton, Beeson, Bidlack, Black, Bowne, Boyd, Brewster, Aaron V. Brown, Wm. Butler, William O. Butler, Green W. Caldwell, Patrick C. So, two-thirds not voting in the affirmative, the rules were not suspended.

Mr. FESSENDEN regretted that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] had made the motion which the House had just rejected, for twenty minutes had been consumed by it, which, by that space of time, would have diminished that portion which his remarks would occupy. He should, however, make his remarks as short as possible. He should not argue the question of the repeal of the bankrupt law, for it was unnecessary; and all he designed to do now was to make what the gentleman from Indiana, yesterday, called "desultory" remarks. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. KENNEDY] said yesterday, that he had been told the bankrupt law was passed to secure the vote of Maine, and that defeat in that and other sections had induced them to retrace their steps. Now, without speaking for others, for himself he would say that he was unwilling to retrace the steps he had taken.

He then recapitulated the arguments with which he supported the bankrupt law at the extra session, and denied that public opinion called for its repeal. Where was the evidence of such public opinion? He had seen none; but if they had evidence of a change of opinion of his constituents, he would hesitate until he saw whether that opinion had been produced by looking upon the whole merits of the question. It was a question that belonged to the whole country; for the whole country was interested in it, and therefore it ought not to be determined by the opinions of any man's constituents. If his constituents should undertake to instruct him, he should say to them that he was sorry to differ from them; but, so differing, he must beg to act on his own judgment.

One thing more he must be allowed to say, and then he would have done with all he had to say on the subject of the bankrupt law. It was designed for the benefit of creditors, to enable them to secure themselves against the frauds of their debtors by a compulsory process. All this was urged at the time the law was passed, and the argument existed with as much force now as then. He would, in conclusion, ask, why not let the bill stand until its effects could be seen? He would say, leave the Whig party to bear the odium of it, and to see if some benefits could not be derived from it. There were some defects in the law, he admitted; but these defects could be remedied, and he hoped that that would be done rather than destroy the law.

Mr. F. then proceeded to notice the reply of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. THOMPSON] to the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CUSHING.] It was possible, he said, that he might have misapprehended the remarks of the latter gentleman; that his ears might have deceived him in listening to them; and that his eyes might have deceived him in reading them over as reported in the papers. He confessed, however, that to his judgment the remarks of the gentleman from Indiana did not deserve the imputation cast on them by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE,] of having grossly misrepresented the gentleman from Massachusetts. He confessed that the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts, as he understood them, struck him with surprise, coming from the quarter of the country he did, where such ideas did not originate. The gentleman from Virginia, in his opinion, though he made a labored apology for his friend from Massachusetts, made it all in vain, and, as he understood it, he thought it a most lame and impotent apology. The gentleman from Indiana remarked that the gentleman from Massachusetts commenced this war; to which the gentleman from Virginia replied, by saying that it was commenced by the gentleman from Tennessee; and that all that the gentleman from Massachusetts said, was in reply to him. True, the speech of the gentleman from Tennessee was made first; but how much of the speech of the gentleman from Massachusetts was in reply to it? He would venture to say, not one-fourth. The gentleman from Massachusetts deprecated crimination and recrimination, and expressed his objections to party debates. But the gentleman, after exhorting his opponents not to indulge in the spirit of party, did so himself. This, too, was not the first time the gentleman talked about party and party spirit. If he mistook not, the gentleman commenced this kind of warfare at the extra session, and attempted to convince the people that the members here were influenced altogether by party views for party objects, and not by a desire to carry on the public business. The gentleman endeavored to convince the country that the Whigs were doing nothing for the good of the country; and he made the same charge against the Democrats too, while he claimed that the Administration party alone showed any evidence of a desire to legislate for the public good. After some further remarks from Mr. F. (in which he commented pretty severely on the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts, that he belonged to no party,) and reading an extract from Dean Swift's works, in which a no-party man is pictured in a very odious light, he proceeded to notice that part of Mr. C.'s remarks which had been characterized as threatening to bring the power and patronage of the President to bear upon the coming elections. No man of common intelligence, he contended, could put any other construction upon this part of the gentleman's remarks, than that the President would bring the power of his office to bear on the elections. The gentleman said that, in time, the two great political parties of this country would settle down upon two candidates for the Presidency; and that, when that time came round, those immediately around the President would have a word to say; and he warned the friends of political aspirants, that it was not their interest to run counter to this Administration. This, to him, was a most alarming and ominous threat on the part of the Administration. Are we (said Mr. F.) to be told that, because the Administration will have a word to say in the Presidential election, we are to keep silence here? or that we are to support the exchequer bill? He hoped that the day would never arrive when that House would be influenced by arguments like these.

After some further remarks from Mr. F.—

Mr. MARSHALL of Kentucky obtained the floor, and yielded it to

Mr. BRONSON, on whose motion

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, December 30, 1842.

Mr. CHOATE presented a petition from Asa Andrews, of Ipswich, Massachusetts, praying the passage of a law authorizing the payment to him of the amount of a certain judgment obtained against the United States in the district court: referred to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. TALLMADGE presented a memorial from the State, and three from the city of New York, remonstrating against the repeal of the bankrupt law; which were referred to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. T. also presented a memorial from a number of insurance companies of the city of New York, praying an appropriation for improving the Mississippi and adjoining rivers, to give facility to commerce: referred to the Committee on Commerce.

On motion by Mr. HUNTINGTON, the Committee on Commerce was discharged from the consideration of several bills, and they were referred more appropriately.

Mr. HUNTINGTON, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back to the Senate the bill for the relief of Snow Y. Sears, without amendment, and with a recommendation that it do pass.

Also, reported back, with an amendment, the bill for the relief of Joshua Drew.

Mr. BENTON presented a petition from New York city, signed by numerous mercantile firms, praying for the immediate and unconditional repeal of the bankrupt law: referred to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. McROBERTS submitted the following resolution; which was read, and agreed to, viz:

Resolved, That the Commissioner of the General Land Office be directed to lay before the Senate a statement showing at what offices public sales of lands have been held since the 4th of September, 1841, being the date of the act to appropriate the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, and to grant pre-emption rights; and the total amount of money received at each public sale; and particularly that he state what amount, if any, was paid for lands over the minimum price of $1 25 per acre.

The following resolution, submitted by Mr. BENTON on yesterday, was taken up and adopted, viz:

Resolved, That, in addition to copies of all the correspondence with and from all our ministers abroad in relation to the quintuple treaty, the President be requested to communicate to the Senate (so far as it may be compatible with the public interest) all such correspondence in relation to the treaty with Great Britain.

THE OREGON TERRITORY.

Mr. LINN's bill "to authorize the adoption of measures for the occupation and settlement of the Territory of Oregon; for extending certain portions of the laws of the United States over the same, and for other purposes," came up, as in committee of the whole, for consideration; and some amendments recommended by the select committee were adopted. [The bill was inserted at length in yesterday's Globe.]

Mr. LINN remarked that this measure had been so often submitted to the Senate heretofore, and so fully discussed, that he conceived it unnecessary to dwell, at this stage of the bill, upon its importance and urgency. On these points there could remain no doubt—the subject, indeed, had been exhausted.

Mr. TAPPAN moved to strike out the preamble, in the words following:

"Whereas the title of the United States to the Territory of Oregon is certain, and will not be abandoned; therefore."

Mr. T. remarked that he was in favor of the bill, but did not consider this preamble either necessary or in good taste.

Mr. LINN said it was a point which he intended to discuss when the bill should arrive at the usual stage for debate; and he would be pleased if the Senator from Ohio would defer his motion till then. The select committee had thought proper to prefix this preamble, in consideration of the fact that great doubt and uncertainty prevailed in the public mind as to the intentions of this Government in relation to the Oregon Territory. It was thought all-important to remove these doubts, and this uncertainty, by the declaratory preamble of this bill. Great Britain had fully and amply recognised our right to the Oregon Territory, and only disputed about the Northern boundary. A general declaration of our right to the Territory, therefore, could not involve anything prejudicial to pending negotiations. We merely, by this preamble, hold out to our own people the reassurance that we will not abandon our claim, and that we will maintain the right of our citizens emigrating to the territory. Mr. L. here took a rapid and well-digested review of the history of our title, and the various negotiations with Great Britain on the subject, showing, as he accumulated the evidences in our favor, that our claim to the whole region from the 42d degree of north latitude to at least the 49th degree; and, in width, from the Pacific Ocean to our territories east of the Rocky Mountains, is indisputable, and only requires the assertion of our right in a proper manner, to be placed beyond cavil.

Mr. McROBERTS followed in support of Mr. LINN's views, and in opposition to Mr. TAPPAN's amendment. He went minutely into the history of the Spanish discoveries on the northwest coast, during the 16th, 17th, and 18th centuries; and showed that the only claim laid by Great Britain to any part of the coast within our asserted boundary, was based on the treaty with Spain in 1790; which he proved was no claim at all against us. He also proved, from the second volume of Vancouver's Voyages, that Captain Gray's priority of discovery as to the Columbia river was recognised by that negotiator so fully and unequivocally, that it was quite a matter of surprise that Great Britain, in the face of evidence so strongly furnished by her own accredited officer, should ever think of preferring any claim to the territory drained by that river.

He showed that Great Britain never had a just claim that she did not enforce; and never put forward an unjust one that she did not endeavor to strengthen by postponement and diplomatic procrastination. If she had the same ground to stand upon in this instance that we have, she would not hesitate a moment to assert it, and to enforce it, if necessary. Why, then, should we weaken our own right, and strengthen her pretensions, by voluntarily deferring the assertion of our claim? Our right was indisputable from the 42d to the 49th degree of north latitude, and from the Pacific ocean to our territory east of the Rocky mountains. This comprised a fertile region 700 miles wide at one extremity, and 500 at the other—running through 7 degrees of latitude, and embracing nearly two hundred millions of acres of land—enough to form four or five new States. It was of vital interest to us to have the control of those Indian tribes which infest our Western borders. The provisions of this bill would enable us to keep them in complete check. Hitherto, it might have been thought that we had territory enough; and that, for some generations, we would not have use for more. But the late census, as well as that preceding, shows that we may calculate on our population being doubled every twenty-three or twenty-four years. By this ratio, we may expect to have a population of fifty-two millions in 1880; and, at the close of the present century, at least ninety-two millions. We have to act for those who are to succeed us; and our neglect of their interests, at the critical moment that it is our duty to place them on a permanent foundation, will be wholly inexcusable. That duty is now to assert our right—to encourage the occupation of our own territory by our own citizens—to give them temporary protection in their emigration; and, in less than ten years, our hardy citizens from the Mississippi valley, transplanted to this new section of our Union, will be able to defend and protect themselves. They will claim no other protection.

If we delay longer to assert our right, Great Britain will assume a new argument in support of her pretensions, grounded on our neglect of our own claims. He wished not only to retain the preamble of the bill, but to avoid any question of its propriety. He wanted to see this bill passed in both Houses by a unanimous vote. Let this be done, and England would at once abandon her pretensions. She would see that we are not only in earnest, and determined to maintain our rights; but that, in support of them, we forget all party differences, and act with an irresistible unanimity. If this were done, we should never again hear a word of the right of Great Britain to the Territory of Oregon.

The foregoing is but a brief and rapid sketch of the excellent speech made by Mr. McROBERTS on this occasion. It will hereafter appear in full.

Mr. TAPPAN repeated that he was in favor of the bill, but considered the introduction superfluous, and not in good taste. He thought some other modifications should be made—some provision for purchasing the lands from the Indians, and surveying the territory, before grants were made. As, however, his motion did not meet the approbation of the friends of the bill, he withdrew it.

Mr. LINN quoted a British act of Parliament, to show that the Government of Great Britain had set the example of extending territorial laws, in the same manner as laid down in this bill for extending the laws of the Territory of Iowa to the Territory of Oregon.

Mr. ARCHER, not doubting the propriety of the principles of the bill, was opposed to the preamble, on the same grounds asserted by the Senator from Ohio; and also was impressed with the propriety of deferring action on the measure till sufficient time were afforded to examine its details, and duly consider provisions so important. He appealed to his friend from Missouri [Mr. LINN] to consent to the motion to strike out the preamble, and hoped at no distant day to be able to give the bill his support. He therefore renewed the motion of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. LINN reiterated his conviction that it was absolutely necessary to quiet the public distrust of the course which this Government should take, by the pledge involved in the preamble. If, however, the Senator from Virginia wished for time to consider the provisions of the bill, he would have no objection that it should be passed over informally till next week.

This proposition appearing to meet the general concurrence of the Senate, the subject was passed over informally, and, of course, resumes its place on the calendar as the first bill in order next week.

On motion by Mr. WHITE of Indiana, the Committee on Indian Affairs was discharged from the consideration of the petition and documents of George C. Johnson; and leave was granted to withdraw them from the files, for the purpose of being used before a committee of the House of Representatives.

Mr. ARCHER, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, reported back to the Senate, without amendment, the bill for the relief of the claimants to indemnity received from the British Government, for loss of slaves from on board of the Comet and Encomium, at Nassau.

On motion by Mr. BERRIEN, it was ordered that the communication of the Secretary of the Treasury, on the subject of insolvent debtors, be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, with instructions to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. CRITTENDEN presented a memorial from numerous respectable merchants of the city of New York, praying for the repeal of the bankrupt law; which was referred to the Judiciary Committee.

Engrossed bill entitled "An act to continue the office of Commissioner of Pensions," came up on its third reading; when

On motion by Mr. BATES, and by unanimous consent, it was so amended, that all such duties in relation to laws granting military bounty land, shall be performed by the Commissioner of Pensions, with the sanction of the President, as may be assigned to him by the Secretary of War.

The bill was then read the third time as amended, and passed.

The following engrossed bills and joint resolutions were then read the third time and passed, viz:

The joint resolution for the distribution of the catalogues of the library of Congress.

The bill for the relief of the Steamboat Company of Nantucket; and

The bill making compensation to pension agents.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, covering a statement from the Bureau of Equipment and Construction in the Navy Department, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 14th instant, showing the number of vessels and guns which will be employed in the African squadron, under the late British treaty; which, on motion of Mr. ARCHER, was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. also laid before the Senate a communication from the War Department, made in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 30th of August last, covering a report of the Topographical Engineers, as to the nature of the obstructions in the Bayou Manchac, on the Mississippi, by whom made, and on what authority, and the probable cost of their removal; which,

On motion of Mr. CRITTENDEN, was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

On motion by Mr. LINN, it was ordered that when the Senate adjourn, it adjourn till Tuesday next.

On motion by Mr. MOREHEAD, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and, after a short time spent therein, adjourned in accordance with their previous order.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, December 30, 1842.

The journal of yesterday having been read,

Mr. EVERETT rose to a correction of the journal. The journal had omitted to state that the memorial of a portion of the members of the New Hampshire Legislature, in relation to the division of that State into congressional districts, was laid upon the table, on the motion of the gentleman from South Carolina.

The correction was made.

Mr. EVERETT also rose to a correction of the report of his remarks on the 28th of December, in the Intelligencer of yesterday. He stated that he was made to say that he intended to vote for the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BRIGGS] to the resolution to recommit the bill to repeal the bankrupt law to the committee, with instructions; when he, in fact, did not so commit himself. He had not said a word in relation to the amendment, and did not wish to appear committed when he had not made up his mind how he should vote.

Mr. DODGE of Iowa presented, under the rule, a petition, very numerously signed by citizens and residents of the mineral region of Iowa, approving of the bill (reported by Mr. WHITE, from the Committee on the Public Lands, at the last session) for disposing of the mineral lands in Iowa, Wisconsin, and Illinois; and praying that it, or a bill of similar provisions, may be enacted into a law: referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. STEENROD presented the petition of the members of the bar of the city of Wheeling, to amend the law establishing a district court of the United States at Wheeling.

Mr. DODGE of Wisconsin presented the petition of 638 inhabitants of the town and county of Milwaukie, Territory of Wisconsin, asking Congress for an appropriation for a harbor at Milwaukie.

Also, petition from the inhabitants of the town of Southport, in the Territory of Wisconsin, asking Congress to appropriate seventy thousand acres of the public lands for building a harbor at that place.

Also, petition of the inhabitants of the town of Racine, in the Territory of Wisconsin, asking Congress to appropriate forty thousand acres of the public lands for the building a harbor at that place.

Also, petition of the inhabitants of the town of Racine, in the Territory of Wisconsin, asking of Congress an appropriation for a harbor at that place.

Also, petition of the inhabitants of Mount Pleasant, in the Territory of Wisconsin, asking Congress for an appropriation for a harbor at the town of Racine, in said Territory.

Also, petition of the inhabitants of the town of Rochester, in the Territory of Wisconsin, asking Congress for an appropriation for a harbor at the town of Racine, in said Territory.

Also, petition from the inhabitants of Dane county, in the Territory of Wisconsin, asking Congress for the establishment of a mail route from Racine du Lac, to intersect the Milwaukie mail-route at Cottage Grove.

THE FIFTH AUDITOR.

Mr. SPRIGG said he rose to a question of privilege. A letter had been addressed to the Speaker, and published among the documents of the House, dated "Fifth Auditor's Office, December 14, 1842," which letter contained reflections upon him, personally. He presumed the letter had been read by some of the members, but he would ask the Clerk to read it for the information of the House:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Fifth Auditor's Office, December 14, 1842.

SIR: In a report of a debate in the House of Representatives on Monday last, contained in the National Intelligencer of yesterday, it is stated that Mr. Sprigg, among other things, observed: "He remembered, too, that the House, at his instance, had made a call upon the department (Treasury) for full and detailed information as to the whole system of managing the light-houses of the United States, the contracts for buildings, for supplying oil, paying inspectors, &c., but no answer had ever been obtained, notwithstanding the new clerks which the House had voted them, and notwithstanding numerous and repeated promises made to him personally."

It was with extreme surprise I read this statement, as I had a perfect recollection that it was wholly erroneous; and as it is calculated, uncorrected, to injure the Treasury Department unjustly, in the public estimation, I hope you and the House will excuse me for setting the member right.

It is sufficient to state that the whole of the information called for by the House, in relation to light-houses, on Mr. Sprigg's motion, was transmitted, as required by the resolution, partly to the Committee on Commerce on the 8th of March last, and is contained in their printed report, No. 811; and partly to the House of Representatives direct, by the Secretary of the Treasury, on the 11th of March last, and by the House ordered to be printed, and will be found in document No. 140 of the last session. These two documents contain all the information which was called for by the House.

Mr. Sprigg, individually, called for the cessions of jurisdiction by the States over all the light-house sites, from the adoption of the Constitution; and although so much labor and time as it required might have been declined on his individual call; yet, as I was desirous of furnishing all the information in my power to every person who sought it, the information was prepared and furnished, as far as it was to be found in the office.

This list was sent to Mr. Sprigg on the 24th of May, and had occupied one clerk about six weeks in the preparation of it; and yet he alleges no answer had ever been returned to his calls for information.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

S. PLEASONTON.

Hon. JOHN WHITE,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

In relation to this letter, he would say that he was forcibly impressed with the opinion that, if we allowed public officers to intrude their letters before the House, because of reflections made upon their conduct by members, and then place their letters among the public documents, the power of the House was indeed materially weakened. It was a gross insult to the House; and even if he did commit an error in relation to a public officer, had the officer a right to come before the House in this insidious manner, to attack the statement of a member? He said in this insidious manner; because the letter was presented to the House by the Speaker, without a knowledge of its contents by that officer, who could not be presumed able to look into every public document laid upon his table. Had the Speaker been acquainted with the contents of the letter, he had no doubt that he would not have presented it.

Mr. S. then went into an explanation of the purport of his remarks at the last session, and gave a statement of the action he had taken in order to obtain information from the Treasury Department on the subject of the light-house system of the country. He read several letters which he had received from the Fifth Auditor, and pronounced their statements hypocritical and false. Having finished his narrative of his connexion with the subject, he said he would not protract his remarks any longer. His only wish was to ascertain whether it was the will of the House that public officers should, in this insidious way, make injurious reflections on its members. He would make a solemn appeal to the House whether voluntary and ex parte statements of this kind should constitute a part of its documents; and whether their documentary records should be swelled up, at an enormous expense, by printing matter such as this? The injustice, too, to the House, and to individual members, by permitting letters of this kind to be printed and inserted in the documents, was most manifest; for members could not get up and reply to them, and make their replies a part of the documentary history of the House, alongside of the attacks made on them; but such replies could only have existence in the newspapers of the day, which would pass off and soon be forgotten. The fact was, that some of the officers of the Government about Washington were getting to be too important, any how; and if (said Mr. S.) we do nothing else but tear away the abuses that exist among them, we shall do well. From the Executive down to the subordinate departments, they had heard nothing but abuse of that House; and here was an officer, whose office ought not to exist in the organization of the Treasury Department, (in fact, he was but a fifth wheel, any how,) undertaking to make injurious reflections on a member of the House, and in the most insidious manner to make them a part of its records.

Mr. HOPKINS said that he had not noticed the paper alluded to, until the attention of the House had been called to it by the gentleman from Kentucky. It struck him that it was a paper which ought not to have been filed or placed on the journals, or printed as a part of their documents. It was not, in fact, a public document; and if its writer had any exception to make to the remarks of the gentleman from Kentucky, the public press—the very channel through which they were made public—was open to him. Now, the remarks of the gentleman from Kentucky this morning, in reply to this letter, would not find place among the documents of the House; and in this way injustice was done him, as it would be done to other members if similar proceedings should be permitted. He did not know, however, how the object he had in view was to be reached; but he would submit to the House that, without any formal question being taken, the Clerk should, by general consent, be directed to strike the letter from the journals, (which, he believed, were not yet printed,) and to return the original paper—which was certainly printed without any knowledge of its contents by the members of the House—to its author.

Mr. J. C. CLARK could not believe that the Fifth Auditor intended any disrespect to the gentleman from Kentucky, or that it was his intention to do him any injustice. His only object appeared to have been to correct a misapprehension, into which he believed the gentleman had fallen. In the remarks of the gentleman from Kentucky, as published in the public papers, the Fifth Auditor found charges affecting his official character; and he took what he supposed to be the best means of defending himself, without intending offence to anybody. Now the question was, if a member of Congress, or a committee of the House, or anybody else, made allegations affecting the character of a public officer, which, in point of fact, should be found to be incorrect, whether he should not have the right to defend himself, and place his defence before the public in the best way in his power? Mr. C. would refer to the cases of Colonel Totten and Mr. Winslow Lewis, who, conceiving themselves implicated by reports of different committees of the House at the last session, sent written communications to the House, defending themselves; which were printed, and, respectively, appended to the reports to which they related. No injustice had, in his opinion, been done to the gentleman from Kentucky; and he hoped that no further action would be taken on the subject.

Mr. MERIWETHER could not agree with the gentleman from New York. The cases cited by him were not in point; for the communications written to the House by the parties implicated were in answer to reports of two of the committees; and thus, both the charge and defence were printed together, as part of the documents of the House. In the present case, on the contrary, the charge and defence would not go together; one of them only being printed among the documents of the House. The remarks of the gentleman from Kentucky, to which exception was taken by the Fifth Auditor, did not appear in the documents of the House, but were only published in the ephemeral productions of the day—the newspaper press; and thus passed off, and were soon forgotten.

The usual course was for a person aggrieved to come as a memorialist, remonstrating against the action of the House; but, in this case, the individual came as an officer of the Treasury Department, and he relied on the report of a member's speech in one of the common journals of the day. Now, he (Mr. MERIWETHER) thought the House should vindicate its honor, by dashing from it such communications as these, and by instructing the Clerk to withhold the document, and not allow it to be bound up with the printed documents.

Mr. PROFFIT said his name had been alluded to in this debate; and it was said that the Committee on Commerce had thought fit (without any complaint from him) to attack him at the last session of Congress, and a speech he had made on this floor. Now, the reason why he made no complaint was, because he had never seen nor heard of the report until it was spread on the record and circulated to the country. He made a speech on the light house system, himself believing honestly in its mal-administration; and no gentleman answered him—not even a single member of the Committee on Commerce, that he recollected; yet a few weeks afterwards, he found that the Committee on Commerce had allowed Mr. Pleasanton to pervert his language, and to present it before the country.

Mr. SPRIGG. And further, sir, they sent your speech to him, and invited remark.

Mr. J. C. CLARK was understood to say that it was not done with his knowledge.

Mr. SPRIGG. Why, he states so himself.

Mr. PROFFIT. Yes, and not even a letter from any Auditor, but Mr. Winslow Lewis, of Boston, was allowed to write a letter, in which there was a perversion of his (Mr. P.'s) speech; and he had no means of knowing it until he found it spread before the country, and until this moment he had never had the opportunity to show the injustice that had been done to him. Now, what ought the Committee on Commerce to have done? Why, at least, when they received those letters from Mr. Winslow Lewis and Mr. Pleasanton, they should have asked him if he chose to reply to those letters. If he had not been confined to his bed by sickness when the appropriation bill was before the House, he would have made such statements on the light-house system as would have startled both the House and the country. At present, he had not strength to say much more; but he had no hesitation in saying that, if he had known of these letters, and had had the opportunity to speak to the House on the subject, independent of all party feeling, nine-tenths of the House would have joined him in stopping the printing of that report, even coming, as it did, from the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. J. C. CLARK said it had not been intended to do injustice to the gentleman. But Mr. Winslow Lewis, who had been mixed up with the discussions on the light-house system, feeling himself aggrieved, presented a respectful letter to one of his (Mr. C.'s) colleagues, and that letter was appended to the committee's report without comment. They simply gave Mr. Lewis's statement with their report, which had not been adopted by the House; and the gentleman from Indiana would have the opportunity, when the next appropriation bill was before the House, to take up the matter, and give his own explanations; and if Mr. Lewis (a gentleman of great distinction, who had built many light houses) had been guilty of bad management, or peculation, the gentleman from Indiana could show it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD, in the course of some remarks, disapproved of this course of allowing individuals to reply to the speeches of members on that floor. If a committee of the House was about to act on the character of an individual, it would be proper to hear that individual; and when General Gratiot was about to be proceeded against as a defaulter, that course was followed; for he had himself presented a statement containing General Gratiot's own version of thetransaction. But when a member rose and made a speech, in which, by way of argument, he stated a fact, to allow any officer to come in with a contradiction, would involve them in interminable confusion.

The SPEAKER explained that the letter came to him as a communication from the Treasury Department, and, as such, he had presented it to the House without perusal; if, however, he had known the purport of the communication, it should not have been presented.

Mr. MERIWETHER then submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the communication addressed to the Speaker of this House, by S. Pleasanton, on the 14th inst., in relation to some remarks made in the House before that time, by Mr. Grider, a member from Kentucky; which paper was received by the Speaker, and laid before the House without a knowledge of its contents, was not such a communication as ought to have been received and presented to the House; that the same be withheld from the journal and files of the House, and the original be returned to the writer.

The resolution was then adopted.

IMPROVEMENTS IN FLORIDA.

Mr. LEVY offered the following resolutions, which were adopted:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to place before this House such information as can be obtained in relation to the practicability and probable expense of draining the everglades of Florida.

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be directed to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation for constructing a dry-dock at the navy-yard at Pensacola, and for putting said yard in the necessary condition for the building, fitting out, or repair of vessels of war.

COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

Mr. FILLMORE, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported the following resolution, which was adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds be instructed to inquire into the expediency of abolishing the office of Commissioner of Public Buildings, or of reducing his salary.

Mr. GIDDINGS, from the Committee of Claims, reported a bill for the relief of George Randall: read twice, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. WARREN, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of Robert E. Ford: read twice, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. MAYNARD, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, reported a bill for the relief of the legal representatives of William E. Smith: read twice, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House.

CALL FOR INFORMATION.

Mr. JAMES COOPER, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported the following resolution; which was adopted:

Whereas, a resolution calling on the President of the United States "to cause to be communicated to this House the several reports lately made to the Department of War by Lieutenant Colonel Hitchcock, relative to the affairs of the Cherokee Indians; together with all information communicated by him concerning the frauds he was charged to investigate; also, all facts in possession of the Executive, from any source, relating to the subject," was adopted by this House on the — day of August last: and whereas, the information required by the said resolution has not been communicated, nor any reason assigned for the delay: Therefore,

Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate to this House when the information called for by the aforesaid resolution may be expected.

Mr. MATHIOT, from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, reported a bill for the relief of Captain Wilson: read twice, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House.

LAND OFFICE IN MISSISSIPPI.

Mr. JACOB THOMPSON asked the favor of the House to discharge the Committee of the Whole House from House bill 104, "to establish a new land district in the State of Mississippi," with a view to its passage. He stated that the lands had been surveyed, and the President was anxious to have their sale postponed until this bill could be passed. It was impossible for land sales to take place at present.

Mr. BRIGGS inquired whether the bill made any appropriation.

Mr. J. THOMPSON said he did not think that this bill came under the rule requiring all money bills to be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. A register and a receiver were authorized to be appointed; yet he thought it could not be said to be creating a charge on the treasury. He left it to the Chair to decide whether the bill would have to go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, under the rule of the House.

Mr. STANLY objected to the consideration of the bill at this time.

The SPEAKER decided that the bill would necessarily have to go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; because it created officers who would have to be paid out of the public treasury.

Mr. THOMPSON then moved that it be taken out of the Committee of the Whole House, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS UNDISPOSED OF.

On motion of Mr. CUSHING, two messages from the President of the United States, sent to the House on the 8th and the 25th of March, 1842, and undisposed of by the House, were laid upon the table. The first message transmitted a report on the finances; the second was the message recommending a repeal of the distribution law.

GENERAL JACKSON'S FINE.

Mr. JOHN CAMPBELL rose to present the resolutions of the Legislature of South Carolina, recommending that the fine imposed on General Jackson, during the late war, be refunded.

The SPEAKER stated that a copy of the resolutions had already been presented by another member of the South Carolina delegation, [Mr. PICKENS,] and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Whereupon Mr. CAMPBELL expressed his satisfaction, and withdrew his copy of the resolutions referred to.

BILLS FROM THE SENATE.

The following bills from the Senate were read a first and second time, and referred:

An act for the relief of Stalker and Hill: referred to the Committee of Claims.

An act allowing drawback upon foreign merchandise imported in the original packages to Chihuahua and Santa Fe, in Mexico: referred to the Committee on Commerce.

An act for the relief of sundry citizens of Arkansas who lost their improvements in consequence of a treaty between the United States and the Choctaw Indians: referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

An act to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to make an arrangement or compromise with any of the sureties on bonds given to the United States by Samuel Swartwout, late collector of the customs for the port of New York: referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

An act for the relief of J. R. Vienne: referred to the Committee of Claims.

An act for the relief of Ephraim D. Dickson: referred to the Committee of Claims.

THE BANKRUPT LAW.

Mr. WELLER moved that the rules be suspended, in order to proceed to the consideration of the bill for the repeal of the bankrupt law.

Mr. GIDDINGS called for the yeas and nays on the motion.

They were not ordered.

Tellers were called for and ordered; who reported yeas 112, nays 60. So two-thirds not voting in the affirmative, the rules were not suspended, and the special order of the day came up of course.

PRIVATE BILLS.

The SPEAKER announced the first bill before the House to be "A bill for the relief of the president and managers of the Norristown and Valley Railroad Company," which was passed on the 23d of December; but its delivery to the Senate, subsequently, arrested by a motion by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. J. R. INGERSOLL] to reconsider the vote by which it had been passed.

After some remarks from Messrs. J. R. INGERSOLL and BIDLACK, the passage of the bill was reconsidered, and carried in the affirmative.

On motion of Mr. FILLMORE, the bill was laid on the table.

Mr. BIDLACK said he would avail himself of this occasion to present the memorial of the Summit Railroad Company, asking for a remission of the duties on certain railroad iron: referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The bill for the relief of John McColgan, which was passed on the 23d of December, was next taken up.

The pending question was a motion by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HOPKINS] to reconsider the vote by which it had been passed.

After some remarks in opposition to the bill by Mr. CAVE JOHNSON, and in its support by Mr. KENNEDY, Mr. TURNEY called for the yeas and nays on the motion to reconsider; which were ordered.

A debate then arose upon the merits of the bill. Its passage was advocated by Messrs. KENNEDY, McKEON, TILLINGHAST, and WELLER; and was opposed by Messrs. CAVE JOHNSON, FILLMORE, TURNEY, and MERIWETHER;

After which, the question of reconsideration was taken by yeas and nays, and decided in the negative—yeas 75, nays 90.

So the reconsideration was not ordered.

The House then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, December 31, 1842.

Mr. HENRY DODGE presented the petition of citizens of the town of Southport, in the Territory of Wisconsin, asking Congress for an appropriation for a harbor and light-house at that town, on the western shore of Lake Michigan.

On motion of Mr. HUNT, it was ordered that the petition and accompanying papers of Thomas Thody, on file with the Clerk of this House, be taken from the files, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. J. C. EDWARDS presented letters of Robert Wallace, General Duff Green, and Stephen Cleaver, members of the convention which framed the constitution of Missouri, and of Lieutenant Fremont, all relating to the subject of the northern boundary of Missouri; which were referred to the Committee on the Territories.

On the motion of Mr. J. C. EDWARDS, it was Resolved, That the report of Albert M. Lea, in reference to the northern boundary of Missouri; the report of Captain Guion, and of Lieutenant Fremont, in reference to the Des Moines river; and the evidence in reference to the northern boundary of Missouri, be referred to the Committee on the Territories, and printed.

Mr. J. C. EDWARDS, pursuant to notice, introduced a bill declaring what was the northern boundary of the State of Missouri; which was read twice, referred to the Committee on the Territories, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. T. W. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a joint resolution for the survey of Block island; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole.

On the motion of Mr. BRIGGS, it was resolved that when the House adjourns it adjourn to meet again on Tuesday next.

Mr. J. R. INGERSOLL, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill for the relief of the rector, churchwardens, and vestrymen of St. Peter's Church; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. FILLMORE, from the same committee, reported a bill making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending the 30th day of June, 1844; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. KENNEDY of Maryland obtained permission of the House to call up a bill to alter the mode of admeasuring the tonnage of ships or vessels employed in the merchant service of the United States, which was on the Speaker's table on the question of engrossment. The bill was taken up accordingly, and Mr. KENNEDY proceeded to explain its object and necessity. A debate ensued, in which Mr. AYCRIGG, Mr. CUSHING, Mr. T. W. WILLIAMS, and Mr. McKEON, took part; and the bill was then postponed until next Tuesday fortnight.

TAX ON BANK NOTES AND ON GOLD AND SILVER PLATE.

Mr. BRESON offered the following resolution; which was read for information:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire whether it would be expedient, in lieu of the "articles of very large and universal consumption," proposed for taxation by the Secretary of the Treasury, in his letter of the 15th inst., and in aid of the operations of the mint and constitutional currency, to report a bill laying taxes on bank notes of denominations similar to our gold and silver coins, and on gold and silver plate.

The resolution being objected to,

Mr. BRESON moved for the suspension of the rules for the purpose of receiving it; and on this motion called for the yeas and nays; which being ordered, resulted in yeas 75, nays 101, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Arrington, Atherton, Besson, Bidlack, Black, Bowne, Boyd, Brewster, Burke, Green W. Caldwell, Patrick C. Caldwell, John Campbell, William B. Campbell, Thomas J. Campbell, Cary, Casey, Clinton, Colquitt, Mark A. Cooper, Cross, Daniel, Richard D. Davis, Dean, Doan, Doig, Eastman, John G. Floyd, Charles A. Floyd, Fornance, Gerry, Gordon, Gustine, Hays, Hopkins, Houck, Hubard, Charles J. Ingersoll, William W. Irwin, Jack, Cave Johnson, Lewis, Littlefield, Abraham McClellan, Robert McClellan, McKeon, Marchand, Alfred Marshall, John Thomson Mason, Mathews, Newhard, Payne, Pickens, Plumer, Read, Reding, Rencher, Reynolds, Rogers, Roosevelt, James M. Russell, Saunders, Shaw, Shields, Snyder, Sprigg, Steenrod, Jacob Thompson, Trotti, Turney, Van Buren, Ward, Watterson, Weller, Westbrook, and Wood—75.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Allen, Landaff W. Andrews, Sherlock J. Andrews, Arnold, Aycrigg, Babcock, Baker, Barnard, Blair, Boardman, Borden, Briggs, Bronson, Milton Brown, Jeremiah Brown, William Butler, William O. Butler, Calhoun, Carruthers, Chapman, Childs, Chittenden, John C. Clark, James Cooper, Cowen, Cranston, Cravens, Garrett Davis, Doherry, Everett, Fessenden, A Lawrence Foster, Gentry, Giddings, Goggin, Patrick G. Goode, Graham, Granger, Green, Hall, Henry, Houston, Hudson, Hunt, Joseph R. Ingersoll, James Irvin, William Cost Johnson, Isaac D. Jones, John P. H. Stuart, John T. Stuart, Summers, Sumter, Taliaferro, John B. Thompson, Richard W. Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, Triplett, Underwood, Wallace, Warren, Washington, Joseph L. White, Thomas W. Williams, Winthrop, Wise, Augustus Young, and John Young—101.

Mr. GIDDINGS called for the orders of the day.

Mr. CUSHING suggested that there were several Executive communications on the table, which came first in order.

The SPEAKER then communicated a message from the President of the United States, transmitting a letter from the Secretary of State, together with certain documents on the subject of the claims of citizens of the United States against the Government of Hayti; which,

On motion of Mr. CUSHING, was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed.

Also the following message from the President of the United States, communicating copies of a correspondence which has recently taken place between certain agents of the Government of the Haiwaian, or Sandwich Islands, and the Secretary of State:

To the House of Representatives:

I communicate herewith to Congress copies of a correspondence which has recently taken place between certain agents of the Haiwaian or Sandwich Islands, and the Secretary of State.

The condition of those islands has excited a good deal of interest, which is increasing by every successive proof that their inhabitants are making progress in civilization, and becoming more and more competent to maintain regular and orderly civil government. They lie in the Pacific ocean, much nearer to this continent than the other, and have become an important place for the refitment and provisioning of American and European vessels.

Owing to their locality, and to the course of the winds which prevail in this quarter of the world, the Sandwich Islands are the stopping-place for almost all the vessels passing from continent to continent across the Pacific ocean. They are especially resorted to by the great number of vessels of the United States which are engaged in the whale fishery in those seas. The number of vessels of all sorts, and the amount of property owned by citizens of the United States which are found in those islands in the course of a year, are stated, probably, with sufficient accuracy, in the letter of the agents.

Just emerging from a state of barbarism, the government of the islands is as yet feeble; but its dispositions appear to be just and pacific; and it seems anxious to improve the condition of its people, by the introduction of knowledge, of religious and moral institutions, means of education, and the arts of civilized life.

It cannot but be in conformity with the interest and the wishes of the Government and the people of the United States, that this community, thus existing in the midst of a vast expanse of ocean, should be respected, and all its rights strictly and conscientiously regarded. And this must be the true interest of all other commercial States. Far remote from the dominions of European powers, its growth and prosperity, as an independent State, may yet be in a high degree useful to all whose trade is extended to those regions; while its nearer approach to this continent, and the intercourse which American vessels have with it, could not but create dissatisfaction on the part of the United States at any attempt, by ano her power, (should such attempt be threatened or feared) to take possession of the islands, colonize them, and subvert the native government. Considering, therefore, that the United States possess so very large a share of the intercourse with those islands, it is deemed not unfit to make the declaration that their Government seeks, nevertheless, no peculiar advantages, no exclusive control over the Haiwaian Government, but is content with its independent existence, and anxiously wishes for its security and prosperity. Its forbearance, in this respect, under the circumstances of the very large intercourse of their citizens with the islands, would gratify the Government, (should events hereafter arise to require it,) in making a decided remonstrance against the adoption of an opposite policy by any other power. Under the circumstances, I recommend to Congress to provide for a moderate allowance to be made out of the treasury to the consul residing there; that in a Government so new, and country so remote, American citizens may have respectable authority to which to apply for redress in case of injury to their persons and property; and to whom the Government of the country may also make known any acts committed by American citizens, of which it may think it has a right to complain.

Events of considerable importance have recently transpired in China. The military operations carried on against that empire by the English Government have been terminated by a treaty, according to the terms of which four important ports, hitherto shut against foreign commerce, are to be opened to the British merchants, viz: Amoy, Foo-choo-Foo, Ningpo, and Chinghai. It cannot but be interesting to the mercantile interest of the United States, whose intercourse with China at the single port of Canton has already become so considerable, to ascertain whether these other ports, now open to British commerce, are to remain shut, nevertheless, against the commerce of the United States. The treaty between the Chinese Government and the British commissioner, provides neither for the admission nor the exclusion of the ships of other nations. It would seem, therefore, that it remains with every other nation having commercial intercourse with China to seek to make proper arrangements for itself with the Government of that empire in this respect.

The importations into the United States from China are known to be large—having amounted in some years, as will be seen by the annexed tables, to nine millions of dollars. The exports, too, from the United States to China, constitute an interesting and growing part of the commerce of the country.

It appears that, in the year 1841, in the direct trade between the two countries, the value of the exports from the United States amounted to seven hundred and fifteen thousand dollars in domestic produce, and four hundred and eighty-five thousand dollars in foreign merchandise. But the whole amount of American produce which finally reaches China, and is there consumed, is not comprised in these tables, which show only the direct trade. Many vessels with American products on board sail with a primary destination to other countries, but ultimately dispose of more or less of their cargoes in the port of Canton.

The peculiarities of the Chinese Government and the Chinese character are well known. An empire, supposed to contain three hundred millions of subjects, fertile in various rich products of the earth, not without the knowledge of letters, and of many arts, and with large and expensive accommodation for internal intercourse and traffic, has for ages sought to exclude the visits of strangers and foreigners from its dominions, and has assumed for itself a superiority over all other nations. Events appear likely to break down and soften this spirit of non-intercourse, and to bring China, ere long, into the relations which usually subsist between civilized States. She has agreed, in the treaty with England, that correspondence between the agents of the two Governments shall be on equal terms; a concession which it is hardly probable will hereafter be withheld from other nations.

It is true, that the cheapness of labor among the Chinese, their ingenuity in its application, and the fixed character of their habits and pursuits, may discourage the hope of the opening of any great and sudden demand for the fabrics of other countries. But experience proves that the productions of western nations find a market to some among the Chinese; that that market, so far as respects the productions of the United States, although it has considerably varied in successive seasons, has, on the whole, more than doubled within the last ten years; and it can hardly be doubted that the opening of several new and important ports connected with parts of the empire heretofore seldom visited by Europeans or Americans, would exercise a favorable influence upon the demand for such productions.

It is not understood that the immediate establishment of correspondent embassies and missions, or the permanent residence of diplomatic functionaries, with full powers, of each country at the court of the other, is contemplated between England and China; although, as has been already observed, it has been stipulated that intercourse between the two countries shall hereafter be on equal terms. An ambassador, or envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary, can only be accredited, according to the usages of Western nations, to the head or sovereign of the state. And it may be doubtful whether the Court of Pekin is yet prepared to conform to these usages, so far as to receive a minister plenipotentiary to reside near it.

Being of opinion, however, that the commercial interests of the United States, connected with China, require at the present moment a degree of attention and vigilance, such as there is no agent of this Government on the spot to bestow, I recommend to Congress to make appropriation for the compensation of a commissioner, to reside in China, to exercise a watchful care over the concerns of American citizens, and for the protection of their persons and property; empowered to hold intercourse with the local authorities; and ready, under instructions from his Government, should such instructions become necessary and proper hereafter, to address himself to the high functionaries of the empire, or, through them, to the Emperor himself.

It will not escape the observation of Congress, that, in order to secure the important objects of any such measure, a citizen of much intelligence and weight of character should be employed on such agency; and that, to secure the services of such an individual, a compensation should be made corresponding with the magnitude and importance of the mission.

JOHN TYLER.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 30, 1842.

Mr. CUSHING, after a few remarks, moved to refer the message and accompanying documents to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and that it be printed; which motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER further communicated a report from the Post Office Department, in answer to a resolution of the House, on the subject of the delays in the transportation of the mail between Washington and Augusta, Georgia: referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and ordered to be printed.

The bill from the Senate for the relief of the Steamboat Company of Nantucket;

The bill from the Senate making compensation to pension agents; and

The bill from the Senate to continue the office of Commissioner of Pensions; were severally read twice, and referred.

The amendments of the Senate to the joint resolution providing for the distribution of the copies on hand of the catalogue of the Library of Congress, were read and concurred in.

The SPEAKER observed that the next business in order would be the motions for the reconsideration of certain private bills that were passed last week, of which there were three or four.

Mr. G. DAVIS moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole, for the purpose of taking up the bill making an appropriation for paying for the printing of the Compendium of the Sixth Census.

Mr. GIDDINGS called for the yeas and nays, but they were not ordered; and, on taking the question, Mr. DAVIS's motion was decided in the negative without a count.

Mr. JOHN C. CLARK moved that the House adjourn, [at a quarter-past 2 o'clock:] rejected.

The House then took up the motion for the reconsideration of the bill for the relief of Isaac Justus; and, after some remarks from Mr. ARNOLD, in favor of the bill, the question of reconsideration was carried; and the next question being upon the passage of the bill, it was decided in the affirmative without a division.

The motion for the reconsideration of the bill for the relief of the widow and heirs of Benjamin W. Hopkins, was next considered; and, after some remarks from Messrs. PARMENTER and SLADE, it was postponed to Friday next.

The motion for the reconsideration of the bill providing for the payment of certain Iowa militia, was also postponed to Friday next.

The motion for the reconsideration of the bill for the relief of Philip Renault was taken up; and after some remarks from Mr. CAVE JOHNSON, in opposition to it, and from Mr. YOUNG, in its support,

On motion by Mr. IRWIN,

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, January 3, 1843.

Mr. CLAYTON presented a memorial from the city and county of Philadelphia against the repeal, but in favor of the modification, of the bankrupt law: referred to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. EVANS presented a memorial from Winthrop, Maine, in favor of the repeal of the bankrupt law.

Messrs. WRIGHT and TALLMADGE presented several memorials from the city and State of New York, remonstrating against the repeal of the bankrupt act; which were referred to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. WRIGHT presented a memorial, numerously signed, from Oneida county, New York, in favor of the repeal of the bankrupt act; which was referred to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. TALLMADGE presented a memorial from J. T. Hudson, praying that the Secretary of War may be enabled to execute a contract made to settle the conflicting claims to the Pea Patch island: referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WHITE presented a petition from the widow and heirs of John B. Chandonai (a half-breed Indian) praying certain compensation for the services of her husband during the war with Great Britain, and for expenditures in money and in goods for the United States: referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. BENTON presented a memorial from the city of New York, urging that the bankrupt law was uncalled for, and unconstitutional, and highly destructive of the rights of the creditor, and praying for its repeal: referred to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. CRITTENDEN presented a memorial from the city of New York, in which the memorialists express the opinion that the bankrupt law was not unconstitutional; that they were opposed to its repeal, and suggested modifications: referred to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. C. also presented a petition from George Reber, administrator of William H. Hunter, deceased, praying the allowance of a claim for services performed by said Hunter for the Indian Department: referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. YOUNG presented a petition from DeKalb county, Illinois, praying for the establishment of a mail route from Chicago to Grand Detour, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. KING presented a petition from C. G. Gunter, praying that the title to a Creek reservation may be vested in him: referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. SEVIER remarked that he had been requested by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to submit a resolution; which was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the resolution of the Senate of the 3d of March, 1841, requesting the Secretary of War to report to the Senate, at the ensuing session of Congress, his opinion upon the subject of the reservation claims arising under the Cherokee treaty, which had been rejected by the board of commissioners, &c., be, and the same is hereby, rescinded.

Mr. SEVIER remarked that the opinion of the Secretary of War was unnecessary, inasmuch as a law had been passed, and a board of commissioners had been appointed under it, to investigate those claims. The board are now investigating them. They do not want the opinion of the Secretary; and a great labor would be saved the department by rescinding the resolution.

After a few remarks from Mr. GRAHAM, doubting whether any board were progressing with an investigation, (the claims of his constituents not yet being investigated;) and by Mr. KING, assuring him that said commission was now in session in this city, and in the performance of their duty; the question was put on the resolution, and it was adopted.

Mr. MERRICK submitted the following resolution, viz:

Resolved, That the Committee on Roads and Canals be instructed to inquire into the expediency of surrendering to the State of Maryland all the interest the United States may have in the stock of the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal Company, upon such just and liberal terms as may be best calculated to induce to the early completion of that important work; and that they be instructed to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana suggested to the mover to strike out the words "report by bill or otherwise," as they were unnecessary; which suggestion being yielded to,

The resolution was adopted as modified.

Mr. BUCHANAN submitted the following resolution; which lies one day on the table, under the rule, viz:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to communicate to the Senate any report which may have been made to him, or to the Solicitor of the Treasury, by the United States attorney for the eastern district of Pennsylvania, in relation to the cloth cases, recently tried in that district, involving forfeitures consequent upon the violation of the revenue laws.

Mr. LINN submitted the following resolution; which lies one day, under the rule:

Resolved, That the report of Lieutenant Wilkes to the Secretary of the Navy, relating to the Territory of Oregon, be printed; and that the charts of Columbia river, and the waters of the Admiralty inlet and Puget sound, be engraved or lithographed under direction of Lieutenant Wilkes.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana submitted the following resolution; which lies on the table one day, under the rule, viz:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to report to the Senate, in as concise a form as may be practicable:

1. The amount of the public debt at the close of the war of the Revolution, and the amount paid by the Federal Government for the individual States, for the expenditures incurred in that war.

2. The amount of the public debt at the close of the late war with Great Britain; and the amount of the public debt at the close of each Administration of the Federal Government.

3. The amount remaining in the treasury at the close of each Administration.

4. The gross amount of the receipts of each Administration—distinguishing between the receipts from imports, public lands, and other sources.

5. The gross amount of the expenditures of each Administration—distinguishing between the amount paid in discharge of the public debt, and for other purposes.

6. The amount deposited with the States, severally.

7. The gross amount of continental paper money issued by the Federal Government, and the amount of the same redeemed by the Government.

8. The present public debt of the United States, in gross.

9. The present public debt of Great Britain, in gross.

10. The gross amount of exports and of imports of the United States, during each Administration of the Federal Government.

11. What nations have funded their public debt, or the debts of their citizens, under the original par value thereof, or at a diminished rate of interest, and the terms of such funding.

Mr. MERRICK, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported back, without amendment, House bill entitled "An act for the relief of Samuel D. Rose and others;" and House bill entitled "An act for the relief of Barent Stryker"

Mr. SMITH of Connecticut presented several resolutions passed by the Legislature of Connecticut—

1. Instructing their Senators to make suitable exertions to procure the passage of a law to refund to General Jackson the fine imposed on him by Judge Hall, in the year 1815, with interest thereon to the time of payment, without condition or qualification, as an act of long-delayed justice to that venerable citizen, patriot, and statesman.

2. Requesting Congress to make suitable provision for drilling and disciplining the militia officers of the United States, that they may be schooled in the arts of war, and be competent to discharge their duties in time of war.

3 Resolution denying the right of Congress to dictate to the States the mode in which they shall elect their Representatives in Congress; and protesting against the exercise of that right by the Congress of the United States, as a palpable and dangerous violation of rights of the Legislatures and people of the States; which resolutions, on the motion of Mr. SMITH, were ordered to be printed.

Mr. BERRIEN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which had been referred the report of the Secretary of the Treasury relating to insolvent debtors of the United States, reported a bill to continue in force the several acts now in existence for the relief of insolvent debtors; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. HUNTINGTON submitted the following resolution, which lies on the table one day:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of so modifying the existing laws as that each Assistant Postmaster General, shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

Also, whether it be expedient to repeal or modify the law which prohibits contractors for the conveyance of the mail from carrying, without the consent of the Postmaster General, newspapers other than those carried in the mail.

Mr. WOODBURY, from the Committee on Claims, made an adverse report on the claim of James B. M'Kown; which was ordered to be printed.

On motion by Mr. LINN, it was

Resolved, That the Committee on Private Land Claims be instructed to inquire into the expediency of confirming to Martin Fenwick, of Maryland, a certain tract of land lying in the State of Missouri; and that the papers on file in the office of the Secretary of the Senate be referred to the same committee.

Resolved, That the Committee on Private Land Claims be instructed to inquire into the expediency of confirming to Absalom Link a certain tract of land lying in the State of Missouri, and that the papers on file in the office of the Secretary of the Senate be referred to the same committee.

On motion by Mr. LINN, it was

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Relations be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation for the benefit of the heirs of Wm. A. Slacum; and that the petition and papers on file in the office of the Secretary of the Senate be referred to said committee.

On motion by Mr. LINN, it was

Resolved, That the Committee on Private Land Claims be instructed to inquire into the expediency of passing an explanatory law embracing certain land claims confirmed to the sons of Bento Vasquez in 1836, by the board of commissioners appointed to investigate private land claims in Missouri, under acts of Congress of 9th July, 1832, and 2d March, 1833.

Mr. LINN presented documents relating to the claim of Dr. Fenwick; which were referred.

Mr. YOUNG, on leave, introduced a bill authorizing the sale of school lands in the State of Illinois, and to legalize such sales as have been made prior to the passage of such act; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. YOUNG presented documents on the subject of a grant of land, to aid in completing the Illinois and Michigan canal, which he moved the printing of: referred to the Committee on Printing.

Sundry bills from the House were taken from the table, read twice, and appropriately referred.

THE OREGON TERRITORY.

The orders of the day brought up Mr. LINN's bill "to author ze the adoption of measures for the occupation and settlement of the Territory of Oregon, for extending certain portions of the laws of the United States over the same, and for other purposes;" the consideration of which was resumed from Friday, as in committee of the whole.

Some doubt being expressed as to the question pending,

The CHAIR explained that it was on Mr. ARCHER's motion renewing the motion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAPPAN] to strike out the preamble to the bill, which was in these words: "Whereas the title of the United States to the Territory of Oregon is certain, and will not be abandoned: therefore"—

Mr. LINN remarked that he hoped, upon reconsideration, the gentlemen who were in favor of striking out the preamble when the bill was last up, would now feel satisfied that there was nothing in it to render this motion to strike out necessary, whilst there was much to be considered in favor of letting it stand. It is very certain (as he remarked the other day) that we have some Oregon territory, and that to it we will not abandon our title. Great Britain does not deny that we have some; why, then, should our assertion to that effect give any cause of dissatisfaction? But, even if it did, the assurance that we will not abandon our title should be made, because it is requisite to quiet the minds of our own people on that point. It is all-important that we should give some satisfactory answer to the daily inquiries made. We owe it to our citizens already settled in the territory, and now amounting to 1,500 or 2,000. He had letters which led him to the conviction that, if this assurance were given, the settlers, during the next summer, would amount to at least 5,000. In a matter of this kind, it was not, in his opinion, at all necessary to have any regard to the effect it would would produce on England. If that country was so unreasonable as to object to the declaration made in this preamble, he certainly would not be deterred by that objection; nor would he make the least modification to suit her views. Still, if other gentlemen in favor of the bill continued to oppose the preamble, he would not, for the sake of retaining it, like to lose the bill itself, merely because the preamble was or was not stricken out. He hoped it would be continued as it was.

Mr. ARCHER said he was very sorry that he did not feel himself any more at liberty to day, than he did when the bill was last under consideration, to accede to the wishes of the honorable Senator from Missouri for the withdrawal of that motion. He thought, as a matter of good taste, they ought not to retain such a preamble. The motives of the honorable Senator from Missouri were—what? To give assurance to the population of that territory that this Government really mean to carry out their own bill! Was there any such assurance wanted? Was not the passage of the bill itself a sufficient assurance? Would it not, in fact, argue a sort of imputation, if, in addition to the passage of the bill, this declaration be required to be made as a sort of guaranty for the sincerity of this Government? The honorable Senator from Missouri would not affirm that such a declaration was necessary, in reference to other subjects of legislation; and if not necessary in other cases, why in this?

But there were other objections still stronger. Did not the gentleman perceive that it would be better to avoid all cause of offence, and to obtain the possession of this territory on terms of perfect amity and good feeling with all foreign powers, rather than awaken their jealousy and animosity? The adoption of such a preamble he (Mr. A.) thought was calculated to awaken the pride, and possibly the resistance, of the British Government. Did the gentleman suppose that the British Government were so little disposed to indulge the feeling of jealousy as to overlook a circumstance of this kind? Since this subject was last under consideration, he (Mr. ARCHER) had given it an attentive and laborious investigation; and, though he believed the title of the United States was a strong one, yet it was a subject involving so much difficulty, and spread over so great a surface, that he certainly felt a hesitation in saying it was wholly clear, undoubted, and unequivocal. It was a complicated subject. Did it become them, then, to say peremptorily, and at once, that the title is undoubted and unequivocal? He believed it was not the true course of policy for this Government to pursue in relation to this subject. In every view that could be taken of the subject, the preamble was useless, and it might produce evil consequences. He hoped, therefore, the Senate would concur with him in striking it from the bill.

Mr. WALKER observed that on every occasion of referring this subject to a select committee for the last four or five years, it had been his duty, as a member of such committee, (of which his friend from Missouri, [Mr. LINN,] the mover, was chairman,) uniformly to concur in opinion with him that there ought to be some action of Congress for the occupation and settlement of the territory. Heretofore, the bills introduced for that purpose had been postponed from time to time, owing to the allegation that we had many other subjects of negotiation with England to be settled, which this might embarrass. It was always urged as a motive for postponement, that it would be imprudent to act in this matter, lest our action might raise up new difficulties to protract those negotiations.

The same objections cannot now exist. All the difficulties—or, at least, the greatest of them—were settled by the late treaty. They may be considered as adjusted.

The question now was, really, whether we are to assert our rights in relation to this territory, or to abandon them—whether we shall maintain our title, or by our own neglect suffer it to be placed in doubt. Now, he was fully prepared to say, that he was not disposed to abandon one inch of the territory claimed by this country on the northwest coast, from the 42d to the 54th degree of northern latitude. To the whole of this territory, he considered the title of the United States indefeasible, and that we should not abandon our claim to one inch of it. He went further: he would say that Great Britain had no right to the portion occupied by her subjects, and claimed by her; and that it was now more than ever necessary that we should assert our rights, considering the late events with regard to her occupation of China by British forces.

From a careful examination of the various bills heretofore introduced, and the reports of committees, as well as other sources of information on the subject, he had come to the conviction that every inch of the territory within the latitudes designated belonged of right to the United States, and that the British Government has not a shadow of claim to the smallest portion of it. He fully believed that now to refuse the assertion of our claim would be injurious to this country and its honor. He did not believe that, if we made the declaration embodied in this preamble, war with Great Britain would follow. On the contrary, he believed it would extinguish her pretence for a quarrel with us. But, even if it was to produce that effect, he was prepared to make the declaration notwithstanding, and abide the issue. He was not prepared to abandon our title to an inch of the territory, on the ground that our assertion of it would lead to war, or on any other ground; because he considered that title indisputable and indefeasible. He believed it now to be the duty of Congress to assert our title; to declare to the world that we will maintain our rights, and will not abandon them. If Great Britain is to take offence at our declaration that we will maintain our rightful claim, her doing so would be no argument to him that we ought to yield. He considered the preamble to the bill of the greatest importance, and hoped it would not be stricken out.

Mr. LINN remarked that, unfortunately, by our own supineness, we had permitted Great Britain, for all practical purposes, to take possession of the territory. From 1814, through the agency of the Northwest Fur Company, and subsequently through that of the Hudson Bay Company, in which the former was merged, she had gained all she could gain from the practical possession and occupation of the country. She had, by the extension of her territorial laws of Canada, by act of Parliament, carried British laws to the very limits of our own organized territorial governments. England had thus told us what we might or might not do. She had literally said to us, You may go so far, but you shall not go one step beyond: if you do, we will object, and our objection must be enough to stop you: you must abide by our acts of Parliament. Ought we to suffer this? Ought we not, rather, to stand up to her foot to foot, and at once meet her face to face, and put an end to her encroachments?

We are too prone to pay undue deference to our old mother country. We forget how much worse than a bad stepmother she had in time past proved to us. We cannot, in spite of our reason and our recollections, cast off our colonial deference to her authority. We never will get free from her arrogance till another opportunity occurs of proving our independence—another contest, in which she will be as much humbled as she was in the last. He did not desire to see another contest with Great Britain. But he firmly believed we would never, in the face of heaven and the world, stand as freemen, till we had another conflict; and, though he did not desire it, yet he never would take one step backward to avoid it. He would recall to the Senate the aggression of England, the burning of our ships, the murder of our seamen, the destruction of property upon the frontier, which we had sustained year after year, and which all had borne as if our whole population were imbued with the divine spirit of Christianity. Was it so? No, sir; it was not through this high and exalted motive that we submitted; it was from a very different cause. He would assert again, in any contest that may take place, we have retreated so often and so long, and debased ourselves so much, that he felt he would not yield another inch of ground. But he would ask, how would this affect our relations with Great Britain? It was merely asserting that they would not abandon it. It was an encouraging declaration on the part of the United States, to those people who may think proper to cast their lot in that territory.

He could see no objection to the passage of the preamble. Would not Great Britain take the same exception to the bill as to the preamble? Practically, the bill was just as offensive without it as with it.

Mr. KING did not agree with the honorable Senator that it was at all necessary to the assertion of our rights to make the declaration which is made by this preamble. It appeared to him that the most dignified, firm, and decided course was to point out what was necessary to be done, to take possession, and to hold it until the whole matter could be finally and permanently determined. We believe (said Mr. K.) that we have the right to the territory in question; and at a proper time we may be called on to assert that right. But I do not think it necessary for us to assert that right in advance, and to say that we will have the country because it is ours. It would not make our position any better, or give us a higher standing. He hoped the honorable Senator would see the propriety of striking out the preamble. Much as he desired to see the country occupied by an American population, which would be enabled in a few years, if properly supported by the Government, to defend and maintain the territory; yet he would not resort to any such expedient—indeed, none such was necessary. The bill itself, he thought, would go very far towards giving them such a population—a population of hardy, enterprising men.

The country must be ours, and he felt no apprehension that any foreign power, however strong, can by any possibility hold long possession of any portion of this continent. He (Mr. K.) would not precipitate the matter by the adoption of such a preamble as this; he would prefer that the Senate should act on the bill by itself.

Mr. CRITTENDEN said he was inclined to vote against the preamble—not because he did not concur in the propriety of what had been expressed as to maintaining our just rights, but because it seemed to him that, however strong the language employed might be, it was a very feeble method of asserting our claim; it, in fact, rather conveyed the impression that they were doubtful of their own title, and were attempting to fortify it by a declaration that right or wrong, we intend to stand by it. If our title be a clear one, it requires no such declaration; and if it be not a good title, depend upon it, it is not more likely to be recognised by the world, in consequence of such declaration on our part. Believing as he did, that our title is complete and unblemished, he would not sully it by any such proceeding. How would it sound, if, in an act relating to the District of Columbia, we were to insert a declaration that we would never abandon the possession? Would it not be absurd? He could see no occasion for disputing about the matter. It was highly inappropriate and unfit; and he should, therefore, give his vote against the preamble.

Mr. ARCHER hoped the Senator from Missouri understood that he was not either opposed to the bill, or to the maintenance of our rights, whenever there would be occasion to assert them. He only objected to the expediency and necessity of the preamble to the bill. He thought it altogether imprudent, besides being in bad taste, to put any such preamble to the bill at all.

The question being then taken by ayes and noes, it was found that they were 17 to 17; and, as the Chair was about to give a casting vote,

Mr. ARCHER called for the yeas and nays; but before they were ordered,

Mr. KING asked whether this vote taken by yeas and nays, or indeed in any form, would not be calculated to have the very effect which the Senator from Missouri deprecated—that of prejudicing the question, and increasing the doubt he wishes to dispel. The preamble asserts an undoubted title to the territory. A vote to strike out the assertion of this undoubted right would bear the inference that the Senate had some doubt; and even if the motion to strike out did not prevail, the vote of its supporters would have the tendency indicated. He hoped the Senator from Missouri would see the disadvantage of this vote, and agree to remove the difficulty by acceding at once to the motion of the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. PHELPS, as a member of the select committee, should say that he did not consider the preamble to the bill, when pressed by the chairman, very important; but was willing to retain it, on the ground that it was necessary to satisfy the public mind. But now that the subject had been debated, and a question put on striking out the preamble, he thought it better it should be retained, than that any doubt should be increased by the decision in favor of the motion to strike out.

Mr. LINN, after a few remarks, for the sake of unanimity in support of the general provisions of the bill, consented to accept the amendment of the Senator from Virginia.

The preamble, therefore, by general consent, was stricken out.

Mr. FULTON submitted an amendment to come in at the sixteenth line, as follows:

"And to every such inhabitant and cultivator, being a married man, there shall be granted, in addition, one hundred and sixty acres to the wife of said husband, and the like quantity of one hundred and sixty acres to the father, for each child under the age of eighteen years, he may have, or which may be born within five years afterwards.

Mr. FULTON remarked that the object of his amendment was to make some equality in the provisions of the bill between married persons and those who were single. It was also his purpose, in offering it, to hold out strong inducements to men having families to undertake the hazardous enterprise of emigrating to that remote and beautiful territory. The expense to men with families to get there would be much greater than to single men; and he thought, therefore, to produce equality, a greater quantum of land should be given to married men. He hoped there would be no objection to the amendment.

Mr. BENTON said he desired to vote for this amendment. He went on to show that the French and Spanish Governments, in their plans of settlement in Louisiana, had granted land to the husband, to the wife, and so much for each of his children, and each of his slaves; and that such plan was equitable, and went to equalize the grants among the settlers. Mr. B. said that to the man having a family, it was the most costly and hazardous to emigrate He was for inducing men with families to go to that country, because it would give the strongest bonds which could be given for the faithful defence of the country. The man of family has far more responsibility on him to defend his wife and children. He would therefore vote with the greatest pleasure for the amendment.

Messrs. McROBERTS and CRITTENDEN suggested modifications of the amendment; which were accepted by the mover of it.

The question was then put on the amendment, and it was agreed to.

Mr. PHELPS remarked that the bill provided for extending the civil and criminal jurisdiction of the supreme court and district courts of the Territory of Iowa over the Oregon Territory, as defined in the bill; and for that purpose authorized the appointment of two associate judges of the supreme court of the Territory of Iowa, in addition to the number now authorized by law. He did not think it was necessary to make the appointment of two additional judges obligatory; and moved to strike out the word "shall," in the 3d line of the bill, and insert, "may, in the discretion of the President;" so as to leave discretion with the President to judge of the necessity of their appointment.

The question was put on the amendment, and it was agreed to.

Mr. LINN moved to fill the blank with $100,000 to carry the provisions of the bill into effect; which amendment, after a few remarks by Messrs. LINN, SMITH of Indiana, HUNTINGTON, McROBERTS, and CRITTENDEN, was agreed to.

At the suggestion of Messrs. WOODBURY, CRITTENDEN, and SEVIER, some further amendments were made to the bill. The bill was then reported to the Senate; and,

At the suggestion of Mr. TAPPAN, was ordered to lie on the table till to-morrow, with a view of having it printed as amended.

Mr. ARCHER remarked that George McDuffie, the Senator elected by the Legislature of South Carolina to fill the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of Mr. Preston, was present, though his credentials were not received. He had left home with the expectation that his credentials would be received on his arrival here. Mr. A. had been told by the Secretary that there were precedents to authorize the qualifying of Mr. McDuffie, though his credentials were not formally presented. He moved that he be permitted to qualify.

The CHAIR remarked that there were precedents to justify that course.

Mr. McDUFFIE then presented himself, and was qualified.

On motion by Mr. BAYARD,

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, January 3, 1843.

Mr. EASTMAN presented the petition of Joseph French and forty-nine others, citizens of Barnstead, New Hampshire, for a mail route from Gilmanton Iron Works to Manchester, in said State.

Also, the petition of Ephraim Tibbets, and fifty-one others, citizens of said Gilmanton Iron Works; of James Knox and seventy others, citizens of Pembroke; of R. T. Leavitt and one hundred and seventeen others, citizens of Pittsfield; and of J. G. Cilley and one hundred and twenty-nine others, citizens of Manchester; all praying for the establishment of said mail route from Gilmanton Iron Works to Manchester; which said several petitions were referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Also, the petition of Thomas D. Morrison, of New Hampshire, for remuneration; which was referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. BOYD presented the petition of sundry citizens of Marshall and Calloway counties, Kentucky, praying that a pension be granted to Joseph Bowlin, a disabled soldier of the late war.

Mr. H. DODGE presented a petition, signed by four hundred and thirty-two inhabitants of the city of Buffalo, in the State of New York, asking Congress for an appropriation for a harbor at the town of Milwaukie, in the Territory of Wisconsin.

Also, the petition of inhabitants of Sac county, in the Territory of Wisconsin, asking Congress for an appropriation for the improvement of the navigation of the Fox and Wisconsin rivers,

Also, a petition numerously signed by inhabitants of the town of Southport, in the Territory of Wisconsin, asking Congress for an appropriation for a harbor at that town, on the western shore of Lake Michigan.

Mr. LOWELL presented the petition of Edward S. Jarvis, and twenty-six other shipmasters and merchants of Mount Desert, for an appropriation to improve the navigation of Penobscot bay, Maine; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The several committees were called on for reports.

Mr. C. J. INGERSOLL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill to amend the act entitled "An act to establish a district court of the United States at Wheeling, in the State of Virginia."

Mr. I. said, as he presumed there would be no objection to the bill, he moved that it be now passed.

The bill was then read three times and passed.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT.

Mr. C. J. INGERSOLL offered the following resolution, which was adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of abolishing capital punishment in public.

Mr. WISE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, made sundry adverse reports.

COST OF FIRE-ARMS.

Mr. CALHOUN offered the following resolution, which was adopted:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War report to this House, as soon as practicable,

1st. The cost of the materials for the fabrication of fire-arms at the United States armories.

2d. The price paid for labor on the musket.

3d. The expense, per musket, for all other labor, comprising the making and repairing of tools, pay of officers, &c.—presenting a distinct statement for each of the last three years.

And that he further report the amount expended at each of the armories during the last three years, separately, for all purposes not directly connected with the construction of the musket.

LIGHT-HOUSE IN MAINE.

Mr. LOWELL offered the following resolution, which was adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of erecting a light-house at Little River harbor, in Cutler, Maine.

ABOLITION.

Mr. SLADE rose and said he wished to present the resolutions of the Legislature of Vermont in relation to the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia. As their reception was precluded by the 21st rule, he should be under the necessity of moving a suspension of that rule, for the purpose of accomplishing his object, and offering the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas, by a law of the United States, framed on the 15th of May, 1820, the foreign slave-trade is declared to be piracy, and is made punishable by death:

And whereas, there is, and has long been carried on in the District of Columbia, within sight of the halls of the two Houses of Congress, and the residence of the Chief Executive Magistrate of this nation, a trade in men, involving all the principles of outrage on human rights which characterize the foreign slave-trade, and which have drawn down upon it the maledictions of the civilized world, and stigmatized those engaged in it as enemies of the human race:

And whereas, the trade thus existing in this District is aggravated in enormity, by reason of its being carried on in the heart of a nation whose institutions are based upon the principle that all men are created equal, and whose laws have, in effect, proclaimed its great and superlative iniquity; aggravated, moreover, by its outrage on the sensibilities of a Christian community, by its sundering of the ties of Christian brotherhood, and by the anguish of its remorseless violation of all the domestic relations, rendered the more deep and enduring by the hallowing influence of the Christian religion upon those relations, and by the increased strength which it gives to the domestic affections:

And whereas, one of the purposes of the Constitution, in providing for the setting apart, and exempting from State jurisdiction, a district for the seat of the Government of the United States, was, to provide a common ground whereon all could meet, under a system of laws not involving, of necessity, principles or usages peculiar to any of the States, but based upon the great principles asserted in the Declaration of Independence, and looking to the great objects contemplated in the preamble to the Constitution:

And whereas, that purpose of the Constitution is defeated, by subjecting a majority of the Representatives of the people and of the States, in the two Houses of Congress, and a majority of those employed in the executive departments at the seat of Government, to the necessity of witnessing a trade in human beings, which is to them a source of grievous annoyance, and an object of deep abhorrence and detestation:

And whereas, this trade in human beings is carried on under the authority of laws enacted by the Congress of the United States; thereby involving the people of all the States in its guilt and disgrace—a guilt and disgrace enhanced by the consideration that those laws are a virtual usurpation of power, the Constitution of the United States having conferred upon Congress no right to establish the relation of slavery, or to sanction and protect the slave-trade in any portion of this Confederacy: Therefore,

Resolved, That all laws in any way authorizing or sanctioning the slave-trade in this District, ought to be repealed, and the trade prohibited; and that the Committee for the District of Columbia be instructed to report a bill accordingly.

Mr. GILMER inquired if the motion was in order; to which

The SPEAKER replied in the affirmative.

The yeas and nays were ordered on the motion.

Mr. A. V. BROWN asked if it would be in order to move to lay the motion on the table?

The SPEAKER said No.

Some confusion then ensued, and several gentlemen attempted to get the floor; in the midst of which, the calling of the roll was commenced.

The House refused to suspend—yeas 73, nays 109, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Sherlock J. Andrews, Aycrigg, Babcock, Baker, Barnard, Birdseye, Blair, Boardman, Borden, Briggs, Bronson, Jeremiah Brown, Burnell, Calhoun, Childs, Chittenden, John C. Clark, Staley N. Clarke, James Cooper, Cowen, Cranston, Cravens, Richard D. Davis, Everett, Ferris, Fessenden, Fillmore, John G. Floyd, Gates, Giddings, Patrick G. Goode, Granger, Halsted, Henry, Hudson, Hunt, Joseph R. Ingersoll, James, Linn, McKennan, McKeon, Mathiot, Mattocks, Maxwell, Maynard, Morgan, Morris, Morrow, Oliver, Osborne, Parmenter, Partridge, Pendleton, Ramsey, Benjamin Randall, Randolph, Ridgway, Roosevelt, William Russell, James M. Russell, Saltonstall, Sanford, Slade, Truman Smith, Stokely, Stratton, Tillinghast, Toland, Tomlinson, Trumbull, Joseph L. White, and Winthrop—73.

NAYS—Messrs. Landaff W. Andrews, Arnold, Arrington, Beeson, Bidlack, Black, Bowne, Boyd, Brewster, Aaron V. Brown, Milton Brown, Charles Brown, Burke, Green W. Caldwell, Patrick C. Caldwell, William B. Campbell, Thomas J. Campbell, Caruthers, Cary, Casey, Chapman, Clifford, Clinton, Coles, Mark A. Cooper, Cross, Daniel, Garrett Davis, Dawson, Dean, Deberry, Eastman, John C. NAVAL DEPOT.

Mr. TILLINGHAST presented the resolutions of the General Assembly of the State of Rhode Island, setting forth the very decided and superior fitness of some place in Narraganset Bay for a naval depot: referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

BREAKWATER.

Mr. SALSTONSTALL presented a resolution instructing the Committee of Ways and Means to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation for the construction of a breakwater at Sandy Bay, Massachusetts.

BANKRUPT ACT.

Mr. ROOSEVELT offered a petition from sundry citizens of New York, praying for the repeal of the bankrupt law: referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

ABOLITION.

Mr. MORGAN presented a resolution instructing the Committee on the Territories to inquire into the expediency of repealing an act passed by the Territorial Legislature of Florida, entitled "An act to prevent the future migration or emigration of free negroes and mulattoes into said Territory," or so much thereof as imposes a capitation tax on such of them as may enter said Territory, and authorizes their sale for ninety-nine years for non-payment of said tax.

Mr. BLACK moved to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. JAMES called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered; and being taken, resulted in yeas 113, nays 80; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Landaff W. Andrews, Arrington, Bidlack, Black, Bowne, Boyd, Brewster, Aaron V. Brown, Milton Brown, Chas. Brown, Burke, William O. Butler, Green W. Caldwell, Patrick C. Caldwell, William B. Campbell, Thomas J. Campbell, Caruthers, Cary, Chapman, Clifford, Clinton, Coles, Mark A. GENERAL JACKSON'S FINE.

Mr. BOWNE offered a resolution on this subject, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to report, on Thursday next, the following bill to refund the fine imposed on General Andrew Jackson at New Orleans.

[The bill was that introduced by Mr. LINN, in the Senate, on the 10th March, 1842, which provided that the proper accounting officers of the Treasury Department be directed to ascertain the amount of the penalty or damages awarded by the district judge of the United States at New Orleans, in the year 1815, against Major General Andrew Jackson, then commander-in-chief of that district, for official acts in that capacity, and paid by him at that time; and that the sum so paid, with interest at 6 per cent. per annum, be paid to Major General Andrew Jackson, out of any money in the treasury not otherwise appropriated.]

Mr. BOWNE moved the previous question on the adoption of his resolution.

The SPEAKER took the question, and being of opinion that the motion was negatived—

Mr. WELLER called for tellers; and they were ordered.

Messrs. WELLER and BRIGGS were appointed tellers; and they, having taken the vote, reported 66 in the affirmative, and 83 in the negative; so the motion for the previous question was not seconded.

Mr. J. R. INGERSOLL submitted the following resolution, which was adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making early provision, by special bill or otherwise, for renewing and continuing the pensions of the widows of persons who were lost in the United States ship Epervier.

THE BANKRUPT LAW.

Mr. EVERETT called for the orders of the day.

The SPEAKER announced the order of the day to be the bill to repeal the bankrupt law; on which the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MARSHALL] had the floor.

Mr. T. F. MARSHALL, who had the floor, rose, and observed that he was extremely anxious to have said a word or two on the subject of the repeal of the bankrupt law, and was particularly anxious to have said something upon the incidental questions started in debate by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. CUSHING;] but he was warned by the experience of last night that personal debility would prevent him from proceeding, as he could have wished, for the short time the rules of the House allowed him. He should, therefore, yield the floor to any gentleman who wished to address the House on the subject. He was perfectly sure, he added, that the state of his health would not enable him to proceed as he wished.

Mr. MILTON BROWN regretted the disappointment that all must necessarily feel in consequence of the gentleman's declining to address the House on this subject, as was expected. He regretted, in common with all others, the circumstances that rendered it necessary for him to do so. For himself, he had no purpose to enter into the general debate in regard to these subjects of political controversy which had been discussed by the gentlemen who preceded him. His simple and sole object in now rising to address the House was to say something in regard to the reasons which would induce him to vote against the repeal of the bankrupt law. He voted for that law originally, under the impression that his constituents desired him to do so; and, having no information that they desired its repeal, he voted against that measure at the last session; and, pursuing the same course, he should, for stronger reasons, vote against it now.

Perhaps, in the history of our whole legislation, there never had been a law more misunderstood and more misrepresented than this. Objections had been urged against it, that, he ventured to say, had seldom originated in the law itself, but in the representations of those who raised the objections. It was not his purpose (Mr. B. said) to give this question a party turn; on the contrary, it was his intention to discuss it in connexion with the opinions of both the political parties of the country. It would be borne in mind that, before the last presidential election, the passage of a bankrupt law was advocated by gentlemen of both political parties; and even now it would be found that there were very few who object to such a bankrupt law, of itself, though they object to its details. It was said that there were obnoxious features in the law which not only ought to be repealed, but that the law itself should be repealed. It was worthy of observation, that the clause in the Constitution which gave to Congress the power, and the only power, of passing a bankrupt law, was adopted by nine States to one. At that time a large majority of all parties concurred in the belief that it was a wise provision, and should be acquiesced in by Congress.

To show that both parties, previous to the last presidential election, concurred in the propriety of passing a bankrupt law, he would refer to the fact that there were two bills reported in the Senate, at the same time, from the two political parties in that body; each professing to be the plan of the party who reported it. One of these bills was reported by Mr. Clayton, the other by Mr. Wall. That reported by Mr. Clayton was looked upon as the bill of the Whig party, to which he belonged; and that reported by Mr. Wall, as the bill of the Democratic party, of which he was a distinguished member. For this he had the authority of Mr. Benton, from whose speech on that occasion (which would be found in the Congressional Globe) he begged leave to read a few extracts. Mr. Benton said:

"Three members of the Judiciary Committee have reported one bill; two members have reported another; and these two bills emanate from the two political parties which, under whatsoever names, have existed in this country for fifty years."

And again he says, after stating his objections to the bill reported by Mr. Clayton, turning to Mr. Wall's bill, he says:

"The other is a general bill, looking to the rights of creditors, as well as to the relief of debtors—intended for the future as well as the present and the past—applicable to corporations as well as to persons—embracing the compulsory as well as the voluntary feature—and making provisions for those who are not, as well as those who are, technically merchants and traders."

Another prominent objection that Mr. Benton had to the bill reported by Mr. Clayton, would be found in the same speech.

"After all, [said Mr. Benton,] the bill is not to be applicable to all debtors—the relief is not to be for all persons owing debts. There is to be a line of division between the debtors—a horizontal line—those above the line are to have relief; those below it are denied it. This results from the amount which the debtor must owe in order to entitle himself to the benefit of its provisions. The bill provides for an amount, but leaves the sum in blank. Will the reporter of the bill (said Mr. B., addressing Mr. Clayton of Delaware) name the amount which it is proposed to insert?

"[Mr. Clayton said he had not been instructed to move a particular sum; but $500 had been mentioned in the committee.]

"Mr. Benton continued: Five hundred dollars. That was the sum mentioned in the committee, and no other sum is mentioned here. Five hundred dollars must be considered, then, as the amount necessary to be owed, to entitle a person to the relief of the act. Now, this is arbitrary and unequal; it cuts off the small dealers—the persons of little property—the laborers; it cuts them off from the benefits of the act, and operates as an encouragement to people to go largely in debt, as the large debtors are to be relieved, and the small ones not. It makes the act exclusive for the large dealers, and this contrary to the principle of equality which is professed in the bill, and without any foundation in reason and justice. The weight of debt is relative, not absolute. It depends upon the amount of the debtor's property, and not upon the amount of the debt. To one man, a debt of one hundred dollars is as much as a hundred thousand, or a million, is to another. To one man, five hundred dollars is as much as five hundred thousand is to another; and, beyond question, the most numerous class of debtors in the United States are those who owe less than the minimum proposed in this bill. But these small debtors, numerous as they are, are disregarded and overlooked by the bill. They are to work out their debts in sorrow and in misery, carrying their endless load to the grave; while the dashers—the large debtors—clear out theirs by a declaration and a surrender."

Again: Mr. Benton said—and he referred to this for the purpose of showing that both parties concurred in favor of a bankrupt law—

"I do not think the present session the propitious one for beneficial action on this subject. Five hundred thousand voters, demanding the passage of a law, on the eve of an election, must have an influence upon the hopes and fears of the lawgiver, as well as upon his judgment and conscience. Since they have waited so long, I should have preferred the delay of a few months more. Still, the subject is before us, and we are here; and I am willing to act, and to do what I believe to be my duty. I am ready to assist in framing an act which shall be general in its provisions, and just in its application—which shall do justice to the creditor, as well as to the debtor—which shall apply to trading and money-dealing corporations, as well as to trading and money-dealing individuals—which shall be compulsory with regard to traders and dealers, whether natural or artificial—which shall be optional with respect to other classes of the community—and which shall distinguish between misfortune and misconduct."

Further on, Mr. Benton made the following remark, which proves that the bill of Mr. Wall was the bill of the Democratic party:

"The bill of the minority furnishes the true basis for the enactment of a bankrupt system. We offer to provide for all; and it is for the gentlemen on the opposite side to say that all shall miscarry if they are not allowed to provide for one part, and one side, only.

Here was the proof of two facts: First, that the bill of Mr. Wall originated with the party to which he belonged; and, secondly, that it was considered by them as the true basis of a bankrupt law. Now, what were the provisions of this bill? He had it in his hand, and found that it contained every objectionable feature that was so strongly condemned in the present law. Mr. BROWN then referred to Mr. Wall's speech, published in the Congressional Globe of 1839, page 462, from which he read the following extract:

"It is intended to act both retrospectively and prospectively.

"It looks upon the past, not to condemn, but to relieve. The whole land is strewed with the wrecks of bankruptcy, and we cannot look in any direction, without perceiving the "jetsam et flotsam" of trade cast upon its shores. All must admit the fact, however much they may disagree as to the causes, that this state of things has resulted from the contractions and expansions of the currency; and that the fluctuations growing out of it have imparted to all business depending on prices, the hazards and vicissitudes incident to commerce and trade. The best energies of the country have been paralyzed; the brightest visions of gain have disappeared; and the wisest and most prudent schemes, uniting public improvement with individual interest, have perished as if by magic, in the universal revulsion that has desolated the country. This bill proposes to cast the mantle of oblivion over the past conduct of the debtor—over his acts which may have been compelled, or the preferences which may have but extorted, in his vain struggles to prolong his existence in the marts of trade. All that it demands from the debtor who seeks its benefits is, that he should honestly surrender what is left, however small, for the general benefit of his creditors."

Now, continued Mr. B., here was the bill which Mr. Benton said originated with his party, and looked not only to the present, but the past; and which Mr. Wall said demanded nothing from the debtor but that he should honestly surrender what was left of his effects, however small, for the benefit of his creditors. Mr. Benton said that it looked not only to the present, but to the past—to small sums, as well as large ones—and was not confined to the limit of $500, like the bill of Mr. Clayton. Now, it was to be observed that the great feature of the present law which had served to render it unpopular, was the retrospective one; and he had just shown that the bill which was looked upon as the peculiar bill of the Democratic party, was also retrospective in its provisions.

Another objection which had been urged to this bill, was, that it not only embraced merchants and traders, but other classes of the community. He would not dwell on this part of the subject, but would just remark that both Mr. Benton and Mr. Wall supported a bill which contained the same provisions in this respect.

Great objections had also been made to the present law, because it relieved all persons indiscriminately, no matter how small their debts might be; and it was made a matter of complaint, that men took the benefit of the bankrupt law whose debts did not amount to $100. That was a popular argument, throughout the country.

Now, here it was seen that Mr. Benton and the party who acted with him objected to Mr. Clayton's bill, that it was partial and unjust in its operations, because it was confined to debts of five hundred dollars and upwards. He would venture to assert, that if a bankrupt law had been passed at the extra session, excluding small debtors from its benefits, there would have been an outcry from one end of the country to the other. It would have been said that it was a bill for the benefit of large traders and magnificent speculators only; that it was aristocratic in its provisions, and not made for the really poor and unfortunate, who were alone deserving of relief.

Another objection to the present law was, that it discharged debtors without the consent of a majority of their creditors. Now, this bill, which was so highly eulogized by Mr. Benton and Mr. Wall, contained precisely the same provision. Again: it had been objected to the present law that it allowed the bankrupt debtor to retain too much of his effects. Mr. B. here explained the provisions in Mr. Wall's bill on this subject, contrasting them with the present, and, as he said, highly to the advantage of the latter.

What was the difference between those two laws? The bankrupt bill of Mr. Wall included banks, and this did not. Had, then, the unpopularity of this bill arisen throughout the land, because it did not include banks? Certainly not. If it were so, it would be proper to amend it by including banks, or (what was still more proper) by passing a separate bill; for there was no congruity between the two subjects. But he believed that this topic was used rather as a popular hobby, than with the design that it should be adopted. He would not, however, dwell on the subject. His intention had been merely to show that this bill originated with the self-styled Democratic party, for which he had the express endorsement of Mr. Benton, and that it contained all the objectionable features of that passed at the extra session.

But a word or two as to the provisions of this bill, and the reasons given for its repeal. Those reasons had all turned on its retrospective operations. And what did gentlemen propose? To let all its retrospective features stand, and to repeal its prospective features, which every gentleman on that floor professed to believe was right. There were two views to be taken of the operation of that bill: the first, its operation as beneficial to the debtors; and, secondly, its operation as affecting creditors. In the discussion of this bill, at the time of its passage, he expressed his apprehension that it would at first be misapprehended and misunderstood by the country; but that if it could withstand the first shock, it would be upheld by the people; and he now deemed it most unwise and impolitic to sweep off that which all agreed was wise and constitutional. Why was this? Was it because, in the desire for political effect, a storm had been raised against one part of the law which it was too late to repeal, that that storm had been turned against that part which was unobjectionable? It was admitted that this law, in its prospective operation, was calculated to do good by preventing fraudulent conveyances and dishonest preferences. One of the greatest evils abroad in this land, was the liberty of the debtor to prefer one creditor to another. Not that honest preference which the law designed; but a preference in favor of a member of the debtor's family—perhaps a son, a brother, or a father. Again: this law was calculated to operate favorably on the morality of the country in another point of view. It was calculated to induce the debtor to give up all he had, in consideration of getting a discharge from all his debts. What was the effect now? A man might be in failing circumstances, with a wife and children dependent upon his exertions; or, by a stroke of adverse fortune, nearly everything might be swept away from him, and from those who were dependent on him; and, in such circumstances, there was strong temptation which human nature could not always withstand, to withhold something in the hands of a friend for his wife and children. It was wrong, but he confessed there was strong miligation in consideration of what a man must feel who had a wife and children dependent on him. In these two points of view, then, it was calculated to benefit the morals of the country, by cutting off preferences, and inducing the debtor to give up everything he had, in consideration that he should then have the right to go free. But it was calculated, in its prospective operation, to protect a large class of creditors from the cunning and artifice of the few; for a man might stand by and see a debtor overtrading until (while the mass of the creditors knew nothing of what was going on) a deed of trust was executed, and all his effects were swept from the mass of his creditors into the hands of one who stood by and saw his overtrading. This law, however, stepped in, and said you shall have no private and confidential relations with the debtor, if misfortune overtakes him, but all creditors shall share alike. Was not this, then, calculated to protect the mass of the creditors from unlawful and unhallowed preferences? Would they not believe, then, if this feature of the law was understood, that the people would feel it to be their interest to preserve it? And did they not also believe that, if it was preserved, it would cut off a most fruitful source of litigation, with which the country was flooded? Go into their courts of justice, and the most fruitful source of litigation would be seen to be in questions of preference, deeds of trust, and mortgages; and after exhausting the property, it perhaps fell into the hands of that creditor who was the least of all entitled to it. It not only did this, but it produced a most fruitful crop of perjuries; and if they desired to cut off the inducement to that class of crimes, it must be by the adherence to a simple and equitable proceeding in the division of property, and the cutting off that source of litigation which, in its operation, caused a thousand frauds where but one would exist under this law.

But a most prominent benefit from this law was still to be mentioned. It was the restraining of excessive credits. His doctrine of credits was this: there was no legitimate credit, except that which rested on the ability of a man to pay all his debts. A man who gave credit in the hope of a preference, gave a false and an illusive credit; whereas a legitimate credit was that based on the ability of the debtor to pay all his debts. These were no visionary theories. This was the law in England, where insolvencies, as illustrated by a statement of Judge Story, were as one in seventeen compared with the same number of credits here; for there every creditor was bound to watch over the solvency of his debtor, while here he was bound but to watch over the ability to pay his own debts. Now this country wanted the passage and sustaining of a law which would connect itself with the permanent advancement of its great commercial interests. But mortgages and deeds of trust were the pillars on which false credit rested: sweep them away, and false credit would fall. He believed there should be no preferences. When a man endorsed for another, he should endorse that he was good for all his debts, and that endorser should not be entitled to a preference. And would not this restrain credit? If they destroyed the system by which these preferences were given, they would restrain the ability of the individual to run into debt. And he thought, if these checks had been thrown over the law some years ago, there would have been many saved from total ruin and destruction by endorsing the paper of others. These, then, were some of the advantages of this law; and it had been his object not to argue this question in any party point of view, further than to show that both parties had been in favor of it, from the fathers of the Constitution, descending by the line of great men who have succeeded them.

Mr. WELLER said the speech of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BROWN] was, by the rules of the House, in order; but by the practice of the House it was out of order; for he had confined himself to the question upon which they should be called upon to vote, and it was but the second or third speech which they had had on that question.

He then went on to say that he was opposed to the enactment of the present bankrupt law, because he deemed it to be a violation of the Constitution, which he had sworn to support. He did not find in that instrument any power given to Congress to enact laws giving to individuals the power to violate their contracts. He held that Congress could exercise no powers but those expressly delegated. If the power to pass a general bankrupt law could be exercised without making the law retrospective, he should have no objection to vote for such a measure.

The present bankrupt law was passed at the extra session, under peculiar circumstances. On one day, it was laid upon the table by a majority of eleven votes. The next day the motion was reconsidered—the majority having determined, when the wine flowed freely the night before, to change their determination. It was found necessary to the passage of another bill—the land distribution bill—that this bankrupt measure should be carried through. The whole legislation of the extra session was accomplished by contract. Now that the land bill had been practically repealed, those who voted for the bankrupt law, in order to secure its passage, were calling for a repeal of that measure likewise. The cry for the repeal of the bankrupt law was general, and he presumed no one would have the independence to stand up on that floor and say that the popular voice was not in favor of an early repeal. Indeed, it had been pretty generally admitted by all who spoke, that public sentiment was against the law. Let Congress, then, act in accordance with the wishes of the people. The advocates of the law seemed to concede its unpopularity; yet they contended that the people were ignorant, and did not understand the principles of the law! He had often observed how common a practice it was, with politicians of a certain stamp, to pronounce public opinion, when against them, as erroneous and ill-founded. These same politicians contended that the policy of a bankrupt bill was before the people in 1840, and that they then decided in its favor. He (Mr. W.) denied the assertion. The people were not called upon, in 1840, to decide upon any such measure as a bankrupt law. That was passed by the Whigs at the extra session, and went forth to the people. With ample opportunities to discover its operation—after the law had been largely discussed on the stump and by the press—their verdict was rendered against it, unequivocally and decidedly. Why not carry out that judgment? Because, argued gentlemen, the people are ignorant; because they do not understand their own interests; and because, after one year's operation, they cannot understand the character of the law which has been enacted!

He then went on to argue that a properly digested bankrupt law, prospective in its character, and including corporations within its provisions, would be beneficial. He admitted that the repeal of the present law would be attended with some hardships; that the declaration of some men to be bankrupt necessarily brought on others; and that the continuance of the law might be productive of some advantages; yet, believing the measure to be unconstitutional, he was bound to vote for its repeal. It was a paramount duty which he owed to the Constitution he had sworn to support, to seize the first opportunity to wipe it from the statute-book. He held that this course should be adopted by all who were convinced of the unconstitutionality of the measure, no matter how well they might be convinced of its advantages.

Inasmuch as party politics had been dragged into this discussion, he should follow the example of his "illustrious predecessors." He was aware that the present Executive had extraordinary difficulties to encounter. He came in on the popular wave which swept over so many States, and defeated the Democratic party. It was not, then, to be expected that he would be looked on with kind feelings by that party. Indeed, it was natural that they should distrust him who had such an agency in bringing about their defeat. Yet they resolved, whilst in a minority, to adopt a respectful course of conduct towards him and their Whig opponents. What was the course of the Whig majority towards them? Was it characterized by magnanimity, by chivalry, by courtesy? No. The Democratic party were constantly told that they were defeated; and were compared to convicted criminals, only awaiting the executioner to swing them off. The triumph of the Whig party in twenty States was a constant theme of exultation. Never was such a victory before obtained. He would not stop to inquire into the means by which it was brought about; suffice it to say, they were such as the party should, in their sober senses, be ashamed of, and such as he hoped, for the honor of his country, would never be resorted to again.

But (continued Mr. W.) you were in power. Your chieftain—your favorite Western statesman—was at the other end of the Capitol, shaping the legislation of the country to suit himself. He thought the difficulties which had long encompassed his way were all removed, and the road to the Presidency short and easy. He already imagined himself in the chair, dispensing favors and showering patronage with a lordly air. But he is fallen! fallen, like Lucifer, to rise no more! Blasted by the withering indignation of an insulted people, he stands a melancholy monument of ill-directed ambition. I might, sir, quote the language which Shakspeare has put into the mouth of Wolsey; but I will not. I will spare his friends the mortifying thought of having his picture before them. [Cries of "Quote it."—"Oh yes! let's hear"—"Let's see if he's enough poet for that."] Then I will quote the memorable, and, in this instance, appropriate passage:

> "This is the state of man; to-day he puts forth
> The tender leaves of hope, to morrow blossoms,
> And bears his blushing honors thick upon him:
> The third day comes a frost, a killing frost;
> And when he thinks—good easy man—full surely
> His greatness is a ripening, nips his root,
> And then he falls as I do."

Yes, Mr. Speaker, there has been a frost, a killing frost, in Ohio, Pennsylvania, New York, Maine, Maryland, and elsewhere. The victorious banner which waved so triumphantly in 1840, is now prostrate, and trailing in the dust!

But, he (Mr. W.) was not disposed to exult over a prostrate foe, except on account of the triumph of principle. He would not wound the feelings of the great fallen statesman, by descanting on his melancholy fate. If their affection for him was to be measured by the chastisement they had received on his account, it was certainly very great. But it was said that some men were hardened by adversity. If such were not the fact, he should suppose the recent elections would have materially softened down the Whig party. They seemed to be going on as before—persisting in their former course of conduct, whilst the people laughed at their calamities. They would, he thought, yet find that they have been kicking against the pricks.

As to the extra session, the Democrats were in a minority, and too weak to resist the onward march of constitutional encroachment by the Whig party. The Executive was, however, found to possess sufficient devotion to the Constitution to save it from aggression. He vetoed the bank; and, in so doing, defeated a measure fraught with danger to the liberties of the people. Was it to be wondered at, that the Democratic party applauded him for the act? Did gentlemen of the Whig party expect the Democratic members to apply fish-market epithets to him?

He repeated, the President came into power surrounded by peculiar circumstances, requiring great firmness and great moral nerve. Both parties refused to support him. The Whigs would not, because he refused to obey the mandate of their Captain General. The Democrats supported many of his measures, whilst they denounced others. Moreover, they saw him surrounded, then as now, by men in whom they never had, and never can have confidence.

The President was denounced as a traitor. Why? Because he refused to sign the bank bill. What right had they to expect John Tyler to sign the bank bill, when his former votes had been against such a measure; and when, at the extra session, he declared that it had been condemned by the people? Why, then, denounce him? To what was he a traitor? To the Constitution? No; but to the "universal Whig party"—the same which, in 1840, denounced Mr. Van Buren as the President of a party, and declared that they wanted a man who would soar above party! Yes, the same party, in 1840, protested that they did not ask for patronage; that they were not actuated by a love of the spoils and of office, but by a sincere devotion to their country! How changed the scene in one short year! John Tyler refuses to be a mere party President—refuses to permit Whig caucuses to dictate to him—refuses to allow others to construe the Constitution he had sworn to support. This was the head and front of his offending. This was the reason of his denunciation by the same men who were, in 1840, so eloquent in denunciation of party Presidents. He (Mr. W.) believed that John Tyler had been governed by exalted patriotism. He did not doubt that the measures recommended by him were conscientiously believed to be for the best interest of the country. When the excitement of the times had subsided, and partisans should have turned to other objects, his integrity would be questioned by none.

He trusted that he should not be charged with making war upon this Administration, whenever he should feel compelled to vote against any of its measures. He could not permit his personal associations to influence his political principles. He was wedded to his political principles; yet he believed that this Government belonged to all; and that, being but joint tenants, we were bound not to stop the wheels of Government because a man not altogether after our own heart was at the helm. He held it to be the duty of the Democratic party to support the measures of this Administration, so far as they did not conflict with the opinions which they advocated and with the Democratic creed of Jefferson and Jackson; to support them, in short, whenever they were not made up of the old leaven of Federalism. Had he understood the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CUSHING] as coming here to offer the patronage of the Administration to such party as should support its measures, he should have told him that the President did not possess patronage enough, all told, to buy even his humble self, and still less a majority of the Democratic members. The people were made of sterner stuff than that. They could not be bought, or sold, or transferred to any party for a consideration.

Mr. W. said that the Executive, if sustained at all, must be sustained upon principle; and to be sustained upon principle, he must take care to make his principle conform to those which are supported by the Democratic party. It was idle to talk about organizing a party on Executive patronage alone; those who were governed by no principle, who were alone actuated by desire for office, would fawn on the Executive in the hour of his prosperity, but in the day of his adversity they would abandon him. So far as he (Mr. W.) was concerned, if any wished to know where he was to be found, he would say that in a few months he expected to retire to the shades of private life; but either in a public or private station, he would always be found adhering to the Democratic party. He expected that there would be a national convention for the purpose of reconciling the differences in that party in regard to men; and when that convention spoke, he would be found contending for their nomination with all the energy, all the zeal, and all the ability he possessed.

Mr. FERRIS said that he had so fully expressed his views in relation to the bankrupt law, when it was under consideration, before its passage, that he had deemed it unnecessary to make any observation in relation to the bill for its repeal; that he came to the House with the expectation of hearing the honorable gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. MARSHALL,] and regretted the cause which prevented him from laying his views on this important subject before the House; that he (Mr. F.) felt it his duty to reply to some of the observations he had heard against the repeal of the bill, and, in doing so, he should but briefly advert to some prominent objections against the bill itself. The bankrupt bill (said Mr. F.) was passed at the time the country was in a state of extraordinary excitement arising from revulsions in commerce, embarrassments in trade, the derangement of the currency, and the desolation and ruin spread over the land from the extravagant speculations and wild projects engendered by the inflation of the paper system. It passed in its present unconstitutional and objectionable form, in which the rights of creditors were totally disregarded, and the obligation of contracts violated, by the most powerful and eloquent appeal to the passions, by which reason was dethroned, and sympathy substituted for judgment. The prominent constitutional objections then urged against the bankrupt law, were, that it was not such a bankrupt law as was authorized by the Constitution, inasmuch as it was retrospective in its operation, and violated existing contracts; that this part of the law came within the spirit, if not within the express letter, of the prohibition against the passage of ex post facto laws; that it was voluntary, and the proceedings might be commenced by the debtor, without the actual assent or concurrence of the creditors, or any part of them; and that it extended to all persons, instead of being confined in its operation to traders. It was also urged that the law was inexpedient; that it held out temptations for fraud and perjury; destroyed confidence between man and man; and that, while it held out relief to the unfortunate, imprudent, or profligate; it carried desolation to the homes of the industrious, prudent, economical, and substantial part of the community. In vain it was urged that it would be better to allow the unfortunate to resort to the State insolvent laws, and to a compromise with creditors—which is seldom refused to men who make a fair exposé of their affairs—than to afford them relief, by inflicting on the community evils of such magnitude and danger as would result from an unconstitutional and badly organized bankrupt law; that it was better even that individuals should suffer the consequence of their own extravagance, folly, or imprudence, than that the Constitution should be trampled upon, and the rights of the citizens violated, to accomplish the relief which the bankrupt law was intended to afford. The bankrupt law was passed; and experience has shown the evils resulting from it: and, so far as I can form an opinion, the people call for its repeal. It has been said that a bankrupt law was absolutely essential to the prosperity of a commercial country. This is not warranted by the past experience of our own country. For a period of near forty years between the repeal of the first and the passage of the second bankrupt law, this country had enjoyed an unexampled state of prosperity. Her commerce whitened every sea, and the enterprise of her citizens penetrated the most remote climes. No nation of the same population had, during that time, advanced to prosperity and greatness with more rapid strides, or whose commercial transactions were more extensive or various: yet all this was accomplished without a bankrupt law; and the unfortunate found relief in a compromise with creditors, or the State insolvent laws.

It has been observed by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. SALTONSTALL,] that a bankrupt law was more necessary, and better adapted to a country like ours—consisting of many sovereign States, with one federal head—than in a kingdom under one Government. With deference to that honorable gentleman, I am of opinion that a bankrupt law is better adapted to the condition of a people under an integral Government, like that of Great Britain, than in a Government like the United States, of a limited character, having, in its legislation on this subject, to interfere with and crush the legislation of the States in relation to insolvency and contracts. That in one case the law was universal and absolute; and in the other, it gave rise to innumerable questions, arising from the conflicting legislation and judicial collision between the Federal Legislature and courts, and the Legislatures and tribunals of the several States.

We have had, since the organization of the Government, two bankrupt laws: the first bankrupt law, passed soon after the formation of the Government, was a regular constitutional English bankrupt law, and was confined in its operation to traders. It was severe in its provisions, and coercive in its character. It was made in conformity with the Constitution, and in the spirit and policy of a bankrupt law which in its origin and formation was intended to afford to creditors a means of relief against fraudulent or defaulting debtors, by coercing the debtor, in the commission of an act of bankruptcy, to deliver up all his estate for the benefit of his creditors; and in its improved organization, it extended relief to unfortunate traders, as such persons were liable, from contingencies against which human prudence could not guard, to sudden losses and misfortunes. But it never was intended by the bankrupt law to extend to all persons relief from the effects of their own voluntary imprudence or extravagance, to encourage the contracting of debts and obligations, without the means of payment or performing them. This first bankrupt law was severe and searching in its provisions, and was calculated to secure creditors, and reach the fraudulent, nevertheless. It became unpopular; and, although it was limited in its duration to five years, it was repealed in less than three years, in obedience to the voice of the people, loudly expressed in all parts of the country.

We have recently had the experience of a bankrupt law of a different description—a law which was so framed, that the debtor could, on his own application, be discharged from his liabilities without the assent of his creditors, and in absolute violation of their rights, and his own contract, solemnly and voluntarily entered into; and notwithstanding its advent was hailed with so much enthusiasm, it has inflicted injuries on the country incomparably greater than any benefits it has conferred; and now, in the short space of one year, its repeal is loudly called for from all parts of our widely-extended country. Thus both experiments have failed; and it must be manifest that the difficulties of making a bankrupt law which is calculated to prevent fraud, while it relieves from oppression, are almost insurmountable. In England, from the first formation of a bankrupt law, under Henry VIII., to the present time, there have been constant and repeated efforts to improve the bankrupt law. There appears to have been a conflict between the Legislature and those disposed to commit frauds under the law—the one passing provisions against practices of a fraudulent character; and the other seeking to elude them. The bankrupt law was revised in the reign of George IV; improved in the reign of William IV; and Queen Victoria has issued a commission to inquire into the measures necessary to improve the bankrupt law. So productive of fraud and iniquity have been the English bankrupt laws, that some of her best statesmen and jurists—and among the rest, Lord Eldon—have lamented their existence. And here let me observe, that one great objection to the retention of the involuntary portion of the bankrupt law is, that persons disposed to act fraudulently, after arranging their affairs to suit their purposes, obtain some friend to commence proceedings against them—apparently hostile, but in reality to aid the bankrupt fraudulently to obtain a release from his creditors; and the check to this fraud in the English law, which does not exist in the law (and which it is not probable will be incorporated into its provisions) now under consideration, is a provision requiring a large part of the creditors—I believe four-fifths of all the creditors of the bankrupt—to assent in writing to his discharge.

An objection has been urged in this debate against the repeal of the bill, of an extraordinary character. It is said that the bill has discharged many persons from their debts, and that, by so doing, it has swept away the assets of solvent debtors, and placed them in a state of bankruptcy; and it is urged that the law should be continued for their relief. It may be recollected that this was one of the fatal results which was predicted from the passage of the bill. It was then said, you propose relief by releasing one part of the community from their debts and obligations, and by depriving another portion of the community of their rights and property; you propose to relieve the insolvents, by bankrupting their creditors—to benefit one part of society by ruining the other part; and here is an argument based upon the assertion that all these results have been fully verified. If this argument prevails, the bankrupt law must be perpetual, because it will be continually producing the same effects; and if it has made bankrupts by its past operation, what will prevent the like causes from producing like effects by its future operation? Is it not better to check the evil by immediately repealing this bill, thereby restoring confidence between man and man, and proclaiming to the community that those who contract obligations must perform them, and that those who confide their property on the faith of contracts shall have the legal means of enforcing them?

The honorable gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BROWN] has urged an argument for the continuance of the law still more untenable: he has described to us a bankrupt law introduced by Mr. Wall into the Senate of the United States; and pointed out all its defects; and clearly shown, by his description of Mr. Wall's law—which I have not seen—that it was as objectionable as the law now under discussion. He has conjured up a phantom, and fairly battled it down. What does all this prove? Why, simply that Mr. Wall's law was a very unconstitutional and inexpedient law. Can it be justly pretended that any person is responsible for Mr. Wall's law, except himself and those who advocated it? Surely the members of this House who opposed the present bankrupt law, are not responsible for Mr. Wall's law; and the fair presumption is, they would have opposed it for the same reasons they have opposed the present law. Nor does the badness of that law form any apology or argument in favor of the existing law, which has worked, and is daily working, great evils in the community; and I am firmly persuaded that one of the great barriers to the return of active business trade and commerce, is the existence of this law, which destroys confidence between man and man, and obstruct that faith and reliance on the performance of engagements which constitute the life and impulse to active business. With these views, I am an advocate for the repeal of the law; and for the reasons before mentioned, and considering the lateness of the hour, I shall not detain the House by going into a more extended view of the subject.

Mr. BOWNE then obtained the floor; but yielded it for a motion to adjourn to—

Mr. ANDREWS of Kentucky, on whose motion,

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, January 4, 1843.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, transmitting copies of a correspondence which has recently taken place between certain agents of the Government of the Haiwaian or Sandwich Islands, and the Secretary of State; which, on motion of Mr. EVANS, was ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Also, laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of State, transmitting additional information, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate, as to the operations of the bankrupt act; which was referred to the Judiciary Committee, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CALHOUN said he had been requested to present to the Senate a petition from the city of Philadelphia, against the repeal of the bankrupt law; which law, the petitioners say, is both constitutional and expedient. Mr. C. said he cheerfully complied with the request to present the petition; but, notwithstanding the declaration of the petitioners as to its expediency and constitutionality, he had not changed his opinion that the law was both inexpedient and unconstitutional; and he would therefore vote for its repeal.

Mr. CALHOUN presented a resolution adopted by the Legislature of South Carolina, on the subject of the fine imposed on Dr. Thomas Cooper, deceased, by the courts of Pennsylvania, in the year 1800, under the alien and sedition law, for an alleged libel on John Adams, then President of the United States; and urging that it ought to be refunded by Congress to his heirs, inasmuch as the law under which it was imposed was generally admitted to be unconstitutional.

Mr. C. also presented other resolutions of the Legislature of South Carolina, expressing the opinion of that body that the fine imposed during the late war with Great Britain, by Judge Hall, on General Jackson, for an alleged contempt of judicial authority, was tyrannical and unjust, and put an unmerited stain on the reputation of that distinguished citizen; and that it ought to be refunded with full legal interest, not merely as a pecuniary indemnity, but as a reparation justly due by the whole country for his eminent services, his wounded character and feelings.

The resolutions were read, and referred to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. TAPPAN presented five memorials from Columbiana county, Ohio, praying for the repeal of the bankrupt law: referred to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. TALLMADGE presented memorials from the city of New York, and Erie county, New York, remonstrating against the repeal of the bankrupt act.

Mr. T. took occasion to express the hope, as this subject was before the Judiciary Committee, that they would, instead of recommending a repeal of the law, propose such amendments as would remove all objections as to its alleged unconstitutionality and inexpediency.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented a memorial from a number of citizens of Pennsylvania engaged in the pilotage of vessels to and from the Delaware bay and river, asking Congress to make an appropriation to repair the pier on Reedy island, for the protection of commerce: referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Also, presented a memorial from citizens of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, asking Congress to refund the fine imposed on Gen. Jackson by Judge Hall.

Also, presented a memorial from a number of underwriters of Philadelphia, signed by the presidents of all the insurance companies, asking Congress to make an appropriation to clear out the snags and other obstructions in the Ohio and Mississippi rivers; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MILLER presented a petition from citizens of Newark, New Jersey, representing that they are strongly interested in the commerce on the Mississippi and Missouri rivers, and recommending the passage of a law appropriating money to remove obstructions from those rivers: referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Also, presented a petition from citizens of the States of New York and New Jersey, praying for the establishment of a mail route from Dickerstown, via Mount Salem, New Jersey, to Minisink, New York; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Messrs. MILLER and DAYTON presented memorials against the repeal of the bankrupt law; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. RIVES presented a memorial from Richard Pollard, late chargé d'affaires of the United States at Chili, praying to be indemnified for certain losses sustained in consequence of the omission of the United States to give him a letter of credit on London, in payment of his salary, &c.: referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. BAYARD presented a memorial from citizens of Delaware, praying that a regulation of the Post Office Department, preventing the transmission of newspapers and documents on the mail routes, unless in the mail, may be repealed: referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. MERRICK presented a like memorial from Richard Sands and others, of the city of Annapolis; which was referred to the same committee.

Mr. EVANS, from the Committee on Finance, reported back to the Senate, without amendment, and with a recommendation that they do pass, the following bills from the House:

The bill for the relief of Isaac and Thomas Winslow;

The bill for the relief of Burr & Smith;

The bill for the relief of Ferdinand Libert; and

The joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to settle, on certain terms, the liabilities of the sureties of Gordon D. Boyd, late receiver of public moneys at Columbus, Mississippi.

Mr. BARROW submitted the following resolution; which lies on the table one day, under the rule, viz:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be directed to communicate to the Senate the evidence in his possession showing that depredations of a most ruinous kind are being daily committed on the navy timber growing on the public lands; and that our own people are daily selling to our Government live-oak timber, which they take from the public lands; and also such proof as may be in his possession tending to show that any foreign Government has, by contracts with any of our citizens, obtained supplies of live oak, cut from the public land; and, also, inform the Senate what additional grants of power and means to the officers of Government are, in his opinion, necessary to complete the preservation, for national use, of the live-oak timber growing on the public lands in the State of Louisiana and the Territory of Florida.

Mr. BENTON rose to call the attention of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. RIVES] to an error in the printed copy of his speech, made in secret session last August, when the subject of the treaty with Great Britain was under discussion. That part of the printed speech to which he called the attention of the Senator, was this: "The Senator who produced it"—that is, the map from Mr. Jefferson's collection, now lying on his (Mr. B.'s) desk—"could see nothing but the microscopic dotted line running off in a northeasterly direction; but the moment other eyes were applied to it, there was found, in bold relief, a strong red line, indicating the limits of the United States according to the treaty of peace, and coinciding, minutely and exactly, with the boundary traced on the map of Mr. Sparks."

The error to which he referred was in the first part of this quotation—that "the Senator who produced it [the map] could see nothing but the microscopic dotted line, running off in a northeasterly direction; but the moment other eyes were applied to it, there was found, in bold relief," &c. The error was in supposing that the Senator (himself) could not, or would not, see the strong red line in bold relief, or endeavored to conceal it from the Senate, and to make it believe there was no other boundary line on the map but the "microscopic dotted line." Now, what really did take place in the Senate on the occasion of his (Mr. B.'s) producing this map? When he saw that the Senator from Virginia was yet in the act of pressing the importance of the map referred to by Mr. Sparks, he interrupted the Senator by calling out from his seat, "Here is the very same red line on Mr. Jefferson's map, for many years in the library of Congress; it is the same in this map." And, on comparison, it was found to correspond exactly. He did not at all, on that occasion, produce the dotted line as proof of the boundary intended. It was 24 hours afterwards he did that. His object in then interrupting the Senator by the exclamation he had just mentioned, was to show that the grand secret on which so much stress was laid by him, was no secret at all. It could be no secret, for Mr. Jefferson's map had lain in the library of Congress, open to every one's inspection, for twenty or thirty years. It would be recollected that, when he made the announcement, several Senators crowded round him to see the "broad, strong red line." After they had inspected it, the map was carried round to the opposite side of the chamber, and there also examined. There was no more debate that day on the treaty. The moment he had produced this map, it became commonly known to all the Senators who chose to look at it, that there was the same broad, strong line on it, as on the map found by Mr. Sparks, and taken to be Dr. Franklin's map. As well as he recollected, the inspection of that very line occupied the remainder of the sitting in secret session that day. What surprised him was, that the Senator from Virginia could so far mistake the matter as to suppose he (Mr. BENTON) wished to conceal the broad red line, and only bring forward the small dotted line. What he did on the occasion was quite the reverse; he produced this map, and pointed to the "broad, strong red line," to prove that the Senator's great secret was no secret at all; and for no other purpose.

Mr. RIVES said, if the Senator from Missouri, in the statement which he had just made, desired to convey the idea that he (Mr. R.) had intended to make the impression that the object of the honorable Senator, in exhibiting the dotted boundary upon the map which he had produced, was to conceal the red line from the Senate, he was greatly mistaken. He (Mr. R.) had not suspected, or imputed to him any such absurd purpose; but his impression was—and he believed that impression was universal—that, at the time the honorable Senator produced that map, such was the prepossession of his mind with regard to the spuriousness of the map which was understood to have the sanction of Dr. Franklin; and that the only true line was that running in a northeast direction, as represented by the dotted line upon the map which he produced, that his attention was, in a great measure, confined to the dotted line, and his endeavor was to prove the other to be spurious. And to show the honorable Senator that he (Mr. R.) was not singular in this view, he would appeal to the whole Senate, and particularly to those Senators who took part in the discussion—especially to the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN,] (who, he perceived, had in his speech, as printed, referred to the same occurrence,) whether their impression did not coincide with his own, that the map had been produced by the Senator from Missouri expressly for the purpose of contradicting and rebutting the map exhibited as Dr. Franklin's map. He never suspected the Senator of any design of concealment, for the affair occurred in the face of the whole Senate. His belief was, that the Senator's mind was so prepossessed with the notion that Mr. Sparks's map was spurious, and that the dotted line he pointed out was the line recognised, that he fixed upon that line, and disregarded the other. And, in justification of this impression, he appealed to the Senate, individually and collectively, whether it was not the universal impression at the time, that the honorable Senator produced his map for the purpose of rebutting and falsifying the map communicated by Mr. Sparks. The Senator had remarked that Senators had collected around him. This was true; it was a scene which would not soon be forgotten by any who were eye-witnesses of it.

He (Mr. RIVES) was happy to hear the Senator now admit (for this was the only point of controversy he at all anticipated as possible) that it is the red line which does represent what the constructor of the map intended as the boundary of the United States. He confessed he was surprised when he saw the honorable Senator's printed speech, and observed the aspect in which the production of the French map was there presented. The honorable Senator must pardon him for mentioning, in justification of his impression of the transaction, the remark which was made at the time—that the Senator had been caught in his own trap, and fallen into the pit he had laid. The impression of all present, so far as he knew or believed, was, that the Senator had entirely failed in the particular design with which he produced the map from the Herculaneum of Mr. Jefferson's manuscripts.

He felt it due to himself to refer to these circumstances. He was not in the habit of lightly placing before the public representations of what had taken place in the Senate chamber; and he endeavored always to adhere strictly to the history of things referred to, precisely as they transpired. And, if he had, in this instance, fallen into error, it was an error which, he had every reason to believe, was common to the whole Senate.

Mr. BENTON observed that there was but one point to which he should again refer. The printed speech of the Senator from Virginia says:

"A map has been vauntingly paraded here, from Mr. Jefferson's collection, in the zeal of opposition, (without taking time to see what it was,) to confront and invalidate the map found by Mr. Sparks in the Foreign Office at Paris; but, the moment it is examined, it is found to sustain, by the most precise and remarkable correspondence in every feature, the map communicated by Mr. Sparks. The Senator who produced it could see nothing"—[&c., as before quoted.]

The point was, that he (the Senator, Mr. BENTON) could not see, or would not see, the broad, strong, red line—and consequently concealed from the Senate that it existed on the map he brought forward—coinciding with the red line on Doctor Franklin's map; while it was held out that he could see, and did see, the little microscopic dotted line, and showed it to the Senate; the other line—the broad, strong red line—being concealed till "other eyes" were applied to the map. This was a question of fact, on which he took his stand. He now made the declaration, in the presence of those who were present on the occasion alluded to, and who now heard him, that the first thing he did, on producing the map, was to proclaim the red line; and he did proclaim it loudly, too, to prove that Mr. Sparks's secret was no secret at all. This was the point he made, and he could not and should not be driven from it.

Mr. CALHOUN said that, having been called on to state his impression, he rose to say, that he had not doubted that the object of the Senator, in introducing the map referred to, was to rebut the one which had been introduced in connexion with Dr. Franklin's note. He had so stated in his printed speech on the treaty; and never knew, till this morning, that there was any diversity of opinion on the subject.

As to the facts which transpired in secret session in reference to the subject, he must say that his impression corresponded, on material points, with the statements made by the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. BENTON. I affirm, in the presence of forty-eight Senators now present, and most of whom were present on the occasion alluded to, that I proclaimed the red line for the very purpose of rebutting the allegation that the discovery of Mr. Sparks was a secret; and that I did show, by the production of this map, that it could not be a secret. What I now assert is, that I was the first human being that proclaimed the red line in this map to the Senate, and that I called out to the Senator from Virginia for the purpose of showing it to him. I did rebut the assertion that it was a secret newly brought to light. I deny that I made any concealment of that red line. I deny it in the presence of forty-eight Senators, who must know the facts of the case. I now again say, in their presence, that I did proclaim the red line, and did not wait till "other eyes" had discovered it. I say this in the presence of forty-eight Senators, who know what I say is true.

Here the subject dropped.

Mr. MERRICK, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported to the Senate the following bills; which were read, and ordered to a second reading, viz:

A bill to authorize the Postmaster General to make permanent contracts for the transportation of the United States mail on railroads; and

A bill to prevent the employment of private expresses on mail routes, and for the prevention of frauds on the revenues of the Post Office Department.

Mr. M. also gave notice that he would ask leave to introduce a bill to regulate the use and to correct the abuse of the franking privilege, and to regulate the charge for carrying matter through the mails.

Mr. ARCHER gave notice that he would on to-morrow ask leave to introduce a bill for the settlement of claims for French spoliations committed prior to 1800.

Mr. RIVES submitted the following resolution; which lies on the table one day, under the rule, viz:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to the Senate (if not, in his opinion, inconsistent with the public interest) copies of any correspondence between the Government of Great Britain and the minister of the United States at London, on the subject of the destruction of the steamboat Caroline, which may not have been heretofore publicly communicated to either House of Congress.

WAREHOUSING SYSTEM.

Mr. WRIGHT said that some days ago he presented a memorial from the Chamber of Commerce of New York city, on the subject of the warehousing system, and proposed to refer it to the Committee on Finance; and that motion, at the solicitation of the Senator from Connecticut, and by his consent, was postponed until Senators might have an opportunity to read the memorial, (which was ordered to be printed,) and enable them to vote understandingly on the question of reference. The proposition to resume the subject had been delayed, that certain Senators who were absent might return to their places, and vote on the question. He now moved to take up the memorial, with a view to its reference. He would merely make the motion, for he did not desire to occupy the attention of the Senate, under the conviction of his own mind that the warehousing system, however arranged, must be, in the business of Congress, a financial system, and not one of commercial regulation. He was confident that, if Senators had read the memorial, they would agree with him that the memorialists viewed the question as one of finance, and which only incidentally affected the commerce of the country.

Mr. HUNTINGTON said that the motion to refer this memorial, which was made some days since, was postponed, at his request, with a view to examine the memorial in connexion with the proposed reference, for the purpose of enabling him to see whether there was anything in it that, with propriety, might be made a subject of reference to the Committee on Finance. The perusal by him of the document, so far from changing his opinion expressed to the Senate, that the subject was primarily and principally one of commercial regulation, and not of finance, had but confirmed it. It would be seen that the warehousing system, as argued in this memorial, was one principally to increase the trade of the country, to benefit the importing interests—to give to the importers and the factor the benefits that, under the cash system of duties, they do not now enjoy—the benefits of such a credit system as was afforded by means of dock-warrants. He contended that the object of the warehousing system, as was stated in the memorial, was to build up the commercial marine of the United States.

Mr. H. spoke at some length upon the subject of the English warehousing system, which, though it was characterized as a liberal one, took care to carry out one principle—that of securing a home market at the expense of all other commercial countries. He then viewed the system as proposed by the memorial, as one to benefit merchants of small means, and to counteract the bad effect of the present system of cash duties, which gave a monopoly in trade to large capitalists.

Messrs. WRIGHT and KING spoke at some length upon the subject, maintaining that the warehousing system was one pre-eminently of finance—especially so, as it might have the tendency to withhold from the treasury, for the present, some portions of the revenue which were indispensably necessary to carry on the operations of Government. They argued, that, so far as the system went either to increase or diminish the present amount of revenues, it was a question of finance; and that it would have the effect to diminish them, it was very probable. They, therefore, thought there could be no doubt as to the propriety of referring the memorial to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SIMMONS made some remarks in favor of the reference of the memorial to the Committee on Commerce, believing that it was a question of commercial regulation merely.

Mr. WRIGHT demanded the yeas and nays on the question of reference to the Committee on Finance, which were ordered; and the question being put, it was decided in the negative—yeas 17, nays 27.

On motion of Mr. HUNTINGTON, the memorial was then referred to the Committee on Commerce.

NAVAL NOMINATIONS.

Mr. BAYARD gave notice that he would, on to-morrow, move the Senate to go into the consideration of executive business, with a view to make disposition of the naval nominations.

Mr. KING presented a memorial from Thomas S. Easton, stating that he had an admirable invention to prevent the explosion of steam-boilers, and praying that Congress would authorize some mode by which to ascertain which, of all the inventions for that object, was the best: referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

THE OREGON TERRITORY.

Mr. LINN moved that the Senate proceed to the unfinished business of yesterday; which was agreed to.

The bill providing for the occupation and settlement of the Territory of Oregon was then taken up.

The CHAIR stated that the question pending was on concurring with the amendments made in committee of the whole.

Mr LINN moved to amend the bill in the 231 line, by inserting a provision saving to the grantees of land all claim to it till patented; and prohibiting liens, transfers, &c., (as will be seen in the amended bill below.)

This amendment was adopted.

Mr. BATES suggested a verbal amendment, which Mr. LINN accepted.

Mr. CRITTENDEN thought the bill might be freed from some ground of objection, by striking out the THIRD section, which related to the appointment of two additional judges for the Territory of Iowa to attend to the business of the Oregon Territory, in which there was, as yet, scarcely any population. It would be time enough hereafter, when settlers were numerous enough to require it, to legislate for the occasion.

Mr. LINN explained that in 1839 memorials from Massachusetts showed that 3,000 emigrants from that place would probably proceed to the Oregon Territory, if assured that they would there enjoy the protection of the laws of the United States. But they would not go, unless this assurance was given. He would suggest that, for the present, probably one judge would be enough to provide for. It should also be recollected that it was discretionary with the President to make the appointment, which he would not do till called for.

Mr. CRITTENDEN was satisfied that one judge should be allowed.

The amendment was so made.

Mr. TAPPAN objected to the indefinite power given to the President to make military posts from Arkansas and Missouri to the mouth of the Columbia river.

This point was discussed by Messrs. LINN, TAPPAN, and BENTON; and, at the suggestion of the latter, an amendment was adopted, limiting the military posts to stockades and block-houses, not exceeding five in number.

Mr. TAPPAN made another objection; but it was removed by an explanation from Mr. FULTON, pointing out a provision in the bill on the subject.

The amendments were all concurred in; and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, as amended, as follows:

A bill to authorize the adoption of measures for the occupation and settlement of the Territory of Oregon, for extending certain portions of the laws of the United States over the same, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States is hereby authorized and required to cause to be erected, at suitable places and distances, a line of stockade and blockhouse forts, not exceeding five in number, from some point on the Missouri and Arkansas rivers into the best pass for entering the valley of the Oregon; and, also, at or near the mouth of the Columbia river.

That provision hereafter shall be made by law to secure and grant six hundred and forty acres, or one section of land, to every white male inhabitant of the Territory of Oregon, of the age of eighteen years and upward, who shall cultivate and use the same for five consecutive years; or to his heir or heirs-at-law, if such there be, in case of his decease. And to every such inhabitant or cultivator (being a married man) there shall be granted, in addition, one hundred and sixty acres to the wife of said husband, and the like quantity of one hundred and sixty acres to the father for each child under the age of eighteen years he may have, or which may be born within the five years aforesaid.

That no sale, alienation, or contract of any kind, shall be valid, of such lands, before the patent is issued therefor; nor shall the same be liable to be taken in execution, or bound by any judgment, mortgage, or lien, of any kind, before the patent is so issued; and all pretended alienations or contracts for alienating such lands, made before the issuing of the patents, shall be null and void against the settler himself, his wife, or widow, or against his heirs-at-law, or against purchasers, after the issuing of the patent.

That the President is hereby authorized and required to appoint two additional Indian agents, with a salary of two thousand dollars each, whose duty it shall be (under his direction and control) to superintend the interests of the United States with any or every Indian tribe west of any agency now established by law.

That the sum of one hundred thousand dollars be appropriated, out of any money in the treasury not otherwise appropriated, to carry into effect the provisions of this act.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the civil and criminal jurisdiction of the supreme court and district courts of the Territory of Iowa, be, and the same is hereby, extended over that part of the Indian territories lying west of the present limits of the said Territory of Iowa, and south of the forty-ninth degree of north latitude, and west of the Rocky mountains, and north of the boundary line between the United States and the Republic of Texas, not included within the limits of any State; and also, over the Indian territories comprising the Rocky mountains and the country between them and the Pacific ocean, south of fifty-four degrees and forty minutes of north latitude, and north of the forty-second degree of north latitude; and justices of the peace may be appointed for the said territory, in the same manner and with the same powers as now provided by law in relation to the Territory of Iowa: Provided, That any subject of the Government of Great Britain, who shall have been arrested under the provisions of this act for any crime alleged to have been committed within the territory westward of the Stony or Rocky mountains, while the same remains free and open to the vessels, citizens, and subjects of the United States and of Great Britain, pursuant to stipulations between the two powers, shall be delivered up, on proof of his being such British subject, to the nearest or most convenient authorities having cognizance of such offence by the laws of Great Britain, for the purpose of being prosecuted and tried according to such laws.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That one associate judge of the supreme court of the Territory of Iowa, in addition to the number now authorised by law, may, in the discretion of the President, be appointed, to hold his office by the same tenure and for the same time, receive the same compensation, and possess all the powers and authority conferred by law upon the associate judges of the said Territory; and one judicial district shall be organized by the said supreme court, in addition to the existing number, in reference to the jurisdiction conferred by this act; and a district court shall be held in the said district by the judge of the supreme court, at such times and places as the said court shall direct; and the said district court shall possess all the powers and authority vested in the present district courts of the said Territory, and may, in like manner, appoint its own clerk.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That any justice of the peace, appointed in and for the territories described in the second section of this act, shall have power to cause all offenders against the laws of the United States to be arrested by such persons as they shall appoint for that purpose, and to commit such offenders to safe custody for trial, in the same cases and in the manner provided by law in relation to the Territory of Iowa; and to cause the offenders so committed to be conveyed to the place appointed for the holding of a district court for the said Territory of Iowa, nearest and most convenient to the place of such commitment, there to be detained for trial, by such persons as shall be authorized for that purpose by any judge of the supreme court, or any justice of the peace of the said Territory; or where such offenders are British subjects, to cause them to be delivered to the nearest or most convenient British authorities, as hereinbefore provided; and the expenses of such commitment, removal, and detention, shall be paid in the same manner as provided by law in respect to the fees of the marshal of the said Territory.

Senate bill No. 31, settling the value of foreign coins of gold and silver circulating in the United States, was taken up as in committee of the whole, and read.

Mr. BENTON made a few remarks in opposition to any action being taken on this bill at the present session. He was but imperfectly heard in the reporter's gallery, but was understood to be opposed to the bill altogether. He read from Childs & Co.'s Price Current, Philadelphia, the following comment on this identical bill, which was reported to the Senate at the last session:

NEW GOLD AND SILVER BILL.

A bill of incalculable importance to the currency of the United States has been reported by the Senate Finance Committee; providing—

Sec. 1. Gold, of British coinage, of 915½-1000ths fineness, [22 carats,] shall be a legal tender at 94 6-10ths cts. per dwt.; French, of 899-1000ths fineness, [21 carats 2 4-10ths grs.,] at 92 9-10ths cts. per dwt.

Sec. 2. Spanish pillar dollars, and dollars of Mexico, Peru, and Bolivia, of 897-1000ths fineness and 415 grs. weight, shall be received at 100 cents; and five-franc pieces of France at 93 cents.

Sec. 3 provides for assays at the mint.

Sec. 4 repeals all former acts making foreign coins current.

By the act of 1834, foreign gold coins are received at—

English, Brazilian, and Portuguese, 22 carats fine, 94 8-10 cts.

French, 21 car. 2 4-10ths grains, fine, 93 1-10 cts.

Spanish, Mexican, and Colombian, 20 carats, 1 7-16th grains, fine, 89 9-10 cts.

Other gold coins are received at the mint assay, and silver coins generally by tale.

We have included in brackets the carat for comparison, though it is found at the United States mint that English coin yields but 915½ pure gold in 1,000 parts, instead of 916⅔, the legal standard of 22 carats.

Before the act of 1834, gold, because of its reduced value

CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

27TH CONG.....3D SESS. TUESDAY, JANUARY 10, 1843. VOLUME 12....No. 8

here, sought a foreign market; and scarcely a single coin was seen in our currency. Since that time, it has constantly formed a part of our circulating medium, without driving silver away. This proves that they are equalized in intrinsic value by that standard.

The effect of the remodelled standard is apparent. It banishes utterly all but French and British gold, and renders them less current, by reducing their value. American eagles and shares form but a small proportion of the gold circulation, and are quite inadequate to this end. Gold must, therefore, be excluded from its place, as silver is too cumbrous for the offices of gold denominations.

But this bill looks farther, and excludes foreign silver; for it admits only dollars and five-franc pieces, diminishing the value of Spanish dollars.

The English and French gold coinage always falls below the lawful standards—by design, it is said, at their mints; and it is found that the valuation of 1834 does not admit of recoinage here, without loss. There is good reason, then, for equalizing according to fineness; but we object to any attempt at exclusion.

The whole object of the bill, if we judge by the effect, is to diminish the specie of the country; for our own coinage, with a constant foreign drain, or without it, is yet insufficient for our wants. The deficiency must be supplied with paper money. The wisdom of experience counsels no such change; and we leave it to her lessons to plead, trumpet-tongued, against any measure designed to increase promises without fulfilment.

Mr. B. desired, if it was the intention of the chairman of the Finance Committee to press the bill through at this session, to have some time to examine the subject.

Mr. EVANS had no objection to accommodate the Senator from Missouri by a postponement of the subject for the present, but would certainly call up the bill at an early day, as he understood from the directors of the mints that it was necessary the bill should be passed, in order to place foreign gold and silver coins at a fair relative value with our own. He mentioned several communications he had had on the subject, pointing out the necessity of this measure. He also alluded to the concurrent opinions of Mr. Gallatin and Mr. Appleton, in pamphlets published by them on the subject of the currency, both in favor of this measure.

Mr. BENTON pointed out the effect it would have of driving out foreign specie, and encouraging, as a substitute, paper promises to pay. He asked but a day's delay, to produce evidence which he intended to bring forward on the subject.

Mr. EVANS said the bill might be laid over for one week.

Mr. BENTON observed that he would be ready to-morrow morning to produce the evidence he alluded to.

The bill was then laid on the table for the present.

WAREHOUSING SYSTEM AGAIN.

Mr. WOODBURY remarked that he wished to make a motion. The latter portion of the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury relates to the warehousing system, to which were appended several documents on that subject, and, among them, was the very identical memorial which had been a few moments ago referred to the Committee on Commerce. He believed that all that portion of the report of the Secretary (including this document) was referred to the Committee on Finance, as a financial question purely. But now, as the Senate had deliberately decided that it was not a question of finance, it would be necessary to discharge the Finance Committee from the further consideration of the subject, and to commit it to the Committee on Commerce. He made that motion.

Mr. HUNTINGTON was not aware that the report of the Secretary on the subject had been referred to the Finance Committee. He wished the general subject to go to the Committee on Commerce.

The Committee on Finance was accordingly discharged from the subject, and it was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The bill for the relief of Benjamin Murphy was then considered as in committee of the whole, reported to the Senate, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

On motion of Mr. WHITE,

The Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, January 4, 1843.

Mr. BEESON presented the petition and documents of Mrs. Drusilla Gieseg, widow of Valentine Gieseg, late superintendent of the Cumberland road, praying to be refunded the amount of a judgment recovered in the court of Fayette county, Pennsylvania, against the estate of the said superintendent, for work done on the Cumberland road: referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. DODGE of Wisconsin presented a petition, numerously signed by inhabitants of the town of Milwaukie, in the Territory of Wisconsin, asking Congress for an appropriation for a harbor at that town.

Also, a petition from citizens of Brown county, in the Territory of Wisconsin, asking Congress for an appropriation for the improvement of the navigation of the Fox and Wisconsin rivers.

ARMY APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. FILLMORE, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill, making appropriations for the support of the army and military academy, and for armories and arsenals, for the half calendar year ending 30th June, 1843, and for the fiscal year, commencing 1st July, 1843, and ending 30 h June, 1844. The bill was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

COMPENSATION OF DECEASED MEMBERS.

Mr. J. T. MASON submitted a resolution, directing the Sergeant-at-arms to pay the widow of the Hon. J. W. Williams, deceased, his mileage and per diem to the 24 day of January, 1843, being the day of election of his successor. [Cries of "no, no, no."] There could be no question that the executors of the deceased member were entitled to his mileage, and a portion of his per diem, as he was on his way to the seat of Government.

After some conversation with, and suggestions from, various members, Mr. MASON modified his resolution, so as to direct the Committee on Accounts to inquire into the expediency of making such payment.

Mr. L. W. ANDREWS objected to the reception of the resolution.

Mr. HALSTED also objected.

Mr. J. T. MASON moved a suspension of the rules, for the purpose of receiving his resolution; which was agreed to, and the resolution was received.

Mr. HALSTED moved to amend the resolution, by substituting "the day of his death" for the "2d day of January," as the limit of the period for which the deceased member's per diem should be paid.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STANLY said he did not see why the widow or executors of the late Hon. Richard W. Habersham, deceased, should not have the same benefit, and therefore he moved the insertion of the name of Mr. Habersham.

Mr. J. T. MASON accepted the amendment.

Mr. BIDLACK said the resolution, as modified so as to pay the deceased members' mileage and per diem to the day of their death, corresponded with the precedent in the case of his late colleague, the Hon. Mr. Dimock.

Mr. J. T. MASON, under those circumstances, again modified his resolution, so as to direct the Committee on Accounts to allow to the widows of the honorable J. W. Williams and the honorable Richard W. Habersham, deceased, late members of this House, the usual mileage.

After a few words from Mr. BLACK, Mr. BRIGGS, and Mr. UNDERWOOD,

Mr. WISE inquired if either of the deceased members had started to the seat of Government?

Mr. J. T. MASON. Yes; Mr. Williams had.

Mr. WISE. And how far had he travelled? From three to five miles. There was not a particle of service. He (Mr. W.) never had, and never would, vote for such a resolution.

Mr. UNDERWOOD asked if there was any precedent for taking this money away from the administrators, and giving it to the widows? He saw one encroachment after another in this House, on principle; and he saw one allowance after another, which the law did not sanction. This was part of the system of making donations to the families of individuals, which had been introduced into this House. Now, if they intended to pay their debts, according to law, to those individuals who started from home, they would pay the mileage and per diem as long as the member lived, and for that he would vote; but he would not vote for the allowance which the law did not sanction.

Mr. SAMSON MASON submitted an amendment, so as to direct the Committee on Accounts to inquire into the expediency of allowing this payment. He said the House had no information on the subject; but he understood that Mr. Habersham had not even left his residence in Georgia at the time of his death; and, therefore, the resolution, in its original terms, was improper. It directed the Sergeant-at-arms to pay the usual travelling expenses and per diem; but what were the usual travelling fees paid to a member of this House before he left his residence at all? He was opposed to the adoption of this resolution as a peremptory order to the Committee on Accounts to audit the accounts for the deceased members; but he was willing that it should go as a resolution directing an inquiry into the expediency of paying the mileage and per diem in such cases; and he moved to amend the resolution accordingly.

The amendment was concurred in; and the resolution, as amended, was adopted.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

The SPEAKER called the committees for reports, and the following were presented:

Mr. BURKE, from the Committee of Claims, reported a bill for the relief of Charles Waldron; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole House.

He also reported, from the same committee, against the petition of Joseph H. Waring.

Mr. COWEN, from the same committee, reported a resolution to discharge the Committee of Claims from the further consideration of the case of George C. Johnston, and that it be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs. The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill to establish two additional military posts; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. [This bill was understood to refer to military posts on the Columbia river.]

On the motion of Mr. STANLY, 5,000 extra copies of the report accompanying that bill were ordered to be printed.

Mr. A. H. H. STUART, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported a bill for the relief of John Randolph Clay, late secretary of the American legation at the court of Vienna; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MATHIOT, from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, reported a bill for the relief of Jacob White; which was read twice, and committed.

GENERAL JACKSON'S FINE.

Mr. BOWNE again submitted the resolution on this subject, which he offered yesterday, as published in the Globe Congressional reports.

Mr. WARREN inquired if there was not already a bill on the same subject before the House?

The SPEAKER said he had not read the bill, and was not, therefore, prepared to say what shades of difference there were between the two bills.

Mr. BARNARD objected to this mode of bringing bills before the House.

Mr. ARNOLD presumed the principal motive with gentlemen who brought forward bills and resolutions on this subject, was, that they might make an harangue in favor of the Old Hero. He would, therefore, move to refer the resolution to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, where there was already a bill pending on this very subject.

Mr. BOWNE did not wish, on this question, to trust himself at all in making an answer to charges like those which had emanated from the member from Tennessee, [Mr. ARNOLD,] farther than to say, that gentlemen who were the most ready to impute motives of this description to others, are most apt to entertain them themselves. The motion of the gentleman from Tennessee would most certainly be liable to the objections of his colleague, [Mr. BARNARD;] for it would not be taking the ordinary incipient steps of legislation. His resolution, however, did not conflict with the usual course of legislation. It proposed to instruct the Committee on the Judiciary to bring in a bill on Thursday next; and when that bill came in, it would, of course, take the ordinary channel of legislation. His colleague was mistaken in supposing there was no precedent for the resolution he offered. His recollection informed him that at the last session there was a resolution passed, instructing the Judiciary Committee to report a given bill, (the bill to repeal the bankrupt act;) in consequence of which, that committee did report the bill; and it was in this way brought summarily before the House. His only desire (Mr. B. said) was to have this bill—which he deemed the best one—brought at once before the House, so that there might be a chance of acting on it at the present session. It must be remembered that more than one-third of the session was already gone; and therefore, if they expected to pass a bill on this subject at the present session, it must be brought speedily before the House.

[Mr. CUSHING here handed to Mr. B. the case in point, to which he alluded—being the resolution referring the petition of inhabitants of the county of Otsego, New York, to the Committee on the Judiciary, instructing said committee to report, instanter, a bill to repeal the act establishing a uniform system of bankruptcy.]

Mr. B., having read the resolution, said that the difference between it and the one he offered was, that the first directed the committee to report a given bill, instanter; while his directed the committee to report the bill accompanying it on the next day. He acted, therefore, in accordance with precedent, as well as parliamentary law. He would say to his colleague that his party had mistaken his ground in opposing this bill. The people had spoken on the subject; the President had recommended it to the favorable consideration of Congress; and the public press of both political parties had loudly called for action on it. His resolution could do no harm; and it would require no great length of time, and no great labor from the Judiciary Committee, to obey its instructions. Let us, then, (said Mr. B.) have this bill at once before us, so that we may act on it before the session closes.

Mr. EVERETT could not see what object the gentleman from New York had in view. A bill on this subject had already been referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and was now before the Committee of the Whole House; so that if the gentleman should attain his object, the bill he now sought to introduce would take its place on the calendar after the one already on it.

Mr. C. J. INGERSOLL explained that the bill reported at the last session was referred anew to the committee at this.

Mr. EVERETT said he spoke of what was on the calendar. The gentleman, if he got a bill reported now, must have it to come in after the one already on the calendar.

Mr. BARNARD said that, after this explanation of the gentleman from Vermont, he would move to lay the whole subject on the table.

Mr. BOWNE asked his colleague to withdraw his motion for a moment, in order that he might make an explanation, promising to renew the motion. The motion being withdrawn, Mr. B. said there was, it was true, a bill before the House at the last session, and was now on the calendar of the Committee of the Whole. But the subject at this session had been referred to the Committee on the Judiciary; and should they reach the bill on the calendar, it would be urged as an excuse for delay that the Committee on the Judiciary had not reported. Assuredly, Mr. B. said, such an excuse would be made. Mr. B. then, according to his promise, moved to lay the resolution on the table, and called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

On taking the question, it resulted in yeas 91, nays 107, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Sherlock J. Andrews, Arnold, Aycrigg, Babcock, Baker, Barnard, Birdseye, Blair, Boardman, Botts, Briggs, Bronson, Jeremiah Brown, Burnell, Calhoun, Childs, Chittenden, James Cooper, Cowen, Cranston, Cravens, Garrett Davis, Deberry, John Edwards, Everett, Fessenden, Fillmore, A. Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, Tomlinson, Trumbull, Underwood, Warren, Washington, Edward D. White, Joseph L. White, Thomas W. Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Winthrop, Yorke, Augustus Young, and John Young—91.

NAYS—Messrs. Landaff W. Andrews, Arrington, Beeson, Bidlack, Black, Bowne, Brewster, Aaron V. Brown, Milton Brown, Chas. Brown, Burke, William Butler, William O. Butler, Green W. Caldwell, John Campbell, William B. Campbell, Thomas J. Campbell, Caruthers, Cary, Casey, Chapman, Clifford, Clinton, Coles, Mark A. Cooper, Cross, Cushing, Daniel, Richard D. Davis, Doan, Doig, John C. Edwards, Ferris, John G. Floyd, Charles A. Floyd, Fornance, Gerry, Gilmer, Goggin, Gordon, Graham, Harris, Hastings, Hays, Hopkins, Houck, Houston, Hunter, Charles J. Ingersoll, William W. Stuart, Sweney, John B. Thompson, Triplett, Trotti, Turney, Van Buren, Wallace, Watterson, Weller, Westbrook, Christopher H. Williams, Wise, and Wood—107.

Mr. BARNARD then offered the following amendment:

To report to the House, with all convenient despatch, the principal and material facts in relation to the fine imposed on General Jackson at New Orleans by Judge Hall, and the opinion of said committee upon the material questions of law involved in the imposition of such fine, and the acts leading thereto.

Mr. BOWNE remarked, that, should the course proposed by his colleague be adopted, the matter would stand just where it did now. A report had already been made, accompanying the bill which was reported.

Mr. MERIWETHER said he should vote against the resolution of the gentleman from New York [Mr. BOWNE.] The gentleman said that the people had called aloud for a remission of the fine on General Jackson. True, he admitted that fact; but the call was got up by interested politicians. He (Mr. M.) wished something to be done at the present Congress. It was many years ago when the fine was imposed. During the long period which had elapsed, the Democratic party had often had a majority in Congress, and made no effort to have the fine refunded. Now, he wished to help to do that which they had been too modest to bring about. They would have a majority in the next Congress; and as he presumed they would be again too modest, there was a greater necessity for having the fine returned by the present. For himself, he was willing to return the fine, with interest; not because General Jackson ought to have it—not because the imprisonment of Judge Hall was right—but because he believed the motives of General Jackson to be pure. He wished to do that which the friends of the General would not themselves do for their chief. He wished the committee to report the facts, and to show that censure of Judge Hall was not implied.

Mr. UNDERWOOD next obtained the floor. He commenced by referring to a pamphlet which had been recently laid upon the tables of the members, which was a republication of certain essays in the Louisville Journal on the subject of the fine, martial law, &c. He had recently heard that the Nashville Union contained a publication from General Jackson, in which the General gave the lie direct to the statement contained in the pamphlet to which he referred. Now, he (Mr. U.) knew something of the author of this pamphlet; and he was a man of talent, and of the strictest veracity. He had also seen the statement of Louallier, and had read it over and over again. When he was on the stump in 1828, the fine, the imprisonment of Judge Hall, and all the facts connected therewith, were made the subject of daily discussion. The statements contained in the pamphlet to which he referred were then corroborated by General Jackson's friends. Now, if the fine was to be returned, he wished to see the facts reported upon by a committee of the House. If he voted against refunding the fine, it would be for the purpose of showing his condemnation of martial law; setting an example to all military men that no such thing as martial law was ever to be proclaimed [A voice: "Except in Rhode Island"] in this country.

Mr. GWIN then obtained the floor; but

The SPEAKER announced the expiration of the morning hour.

Mr. BIDLACK presented a petition from Auburn, Pa., praying for the repeal of the bankrupt law.

THE BANKRUPT LAW.

Mr. EVERETT called up the orders of the day—the bill to repeal the bankrupt law.

Mr. BOWNE, who held the floor, said that when he obtained the floor on yesterday, it was more with a view to end the debate than for any other object. He was satisfied, however, that the motion which he intended to have made would, if now submitted, not be sustained by the House. He therefore, on this occasion, rose to make an appeal to the House; to address its sober judgment on the propriety—nay, the necessity—of bringing to a termination this debate, in order that it might proceed to the important measures which had been brought before it. He had supposed that the subject did not need much discussion; that the bankrupt law was already sufficiently understood by the Representatives and the people; and that the House was prepared for action, and for carrying out the known will of its constituents. He felt confirmed and justified in this view, from the fact that, at the last session, when the people had not spoken so emphatically as now—when their thunders had not rolled over the country, declaring to their Representatives, in a manner not to be mistaken, that the law must be repealed,—then, with hot haste, and by a strong vote, the law was repealed, so far as the legislation of this House could go. Having given this vote, the members returned to their constituents, where the will of the people was conveyed to them through many channels. Yet, with such facts before them, what did they witness? The bankrupt law under discussion; and not only its repeal delayed, but the public business deferred, and a debate going on upon everything else except the bankrupt law! What would an intelligent man from abroad—what would the constituents of Representatives sitting here say, were they to step in and hear such a debate as had taken place, when they understood that the subject before the House was the repeal of the bankrupt law? He felt humbled and mortified at the course which had been pursued. Not only had the rules appointed for the governance of the House been violated, without any call to order from the Speaker or any one else; but the very courtesies of life had been violated and set aside. He did not desire to speak censoriously, or to judge harshly; and he would on no account intentionally wound the feelings of any member; but he would ask, is it becoming the character of an American Congress, the representatives of an enlightened and free people, to utter—nay, to listen to the language which they had heard in relation to the Chief Magistrate of the nation? Why, the fish-women, and the inmates of Five Points establishments, would in vain endeavor to find in their vocabulary such terms as had been here poured out upon the President. Was nothing due to his station? Was there no respect left for the highest officer of the Government—for the highest officer, in fact, in the world? Were any other man beside John Tyler, no matter how offensive politically to him, holding that station, he (Mr. B.) would not venture to indulge in such language as he had heard. Nay, what convinced him the more, was the fact, that, however members might speak on the floor, in the heat and impulse of the moment, yet, when reported accurately in the public prints, they were ashamed of their declarations, and could hardly bear to be told that they had used such language.

He did not rise to become the eulogist of the President. This was neither the time nor the occasion for such a thing; other matters were under consideration. He had adverted to the subject for the purpose of calling attention to the importance of gentlemen confining themselves to the rules, and of proceeding to the business of the people.

But he would proceed further. The President had not only been called a low wretch, an unprincipled creature, a base man, together with other ignominous epithets; but we were told—and he also had it from some of his (Mr. B.'s) political friends on this floor—that the Administration of John Tyler was such that no Democrat could accept an office under it. Some of the leading organs of the Democratic party held the same language; and, strange to say, in juxtaposition to a paragraph declaring that no Democrat could hold office under John Tyler, would be found another, declaring that the party could not support his Administration because it was surrounded by such men as Daniel Webster and John C. Spencer! What would these organs have the President to do? Dismiss his cabinet? Who would fill their places? According to the doctrine held out, no Democrat could hold office under him at all; and the President would, therefore, find himself in a strange predicament.

He (Mr. B.) yielded to none in his attachment to the principles of his party; yet, if attachment or non-attachment to men was necessary to secure the esteem of his fellows, he feared he should be thrown overboard. Whilst this was apparently a discussion as to whether the bankrupt law should be repealed, it was in reality a discussion as to who should be President. What, he asked, did the people care who was the President? What did the masses care about the man at the head of affairs, so that the Government was well administered?

Gentlemen on the Whig side were desirous of prostrating the Administration at all hazards. They contended that the President had violated his faith and pledges. No matter what might be its principles, these gentlemen thought the Administration was to be prostrated. They declared to the Democratic party that they must avow their adherence or opposition to the Administration—that silence would be construed into support. This appeal brought no fear upon him. Whilst he held the same doctrines he had always professed, he should, upon all occasions when measures were presented to him in the capacity of a Representative of the people, that conformed to the principles of the Democratic party, not be found wanting in his support of this Administration. It would make no difference in his course, even if the tenant of Ashland were seated in the Presidential chair. Should the measures of that statesman accord with his notions of political economy, he would as soon support them as if they emanated from any of the chiefs of his own party—Martin Van Buren, or any one else. But the party had been told that it could not rally around the Administration, because Daniel Webster was there—the great stumbling-block. He was amazed at these declarations. For himself, bad as he considered Daniel Webster, if Mr. W. would renounce the errors of his ways, and come into the Democratic party, he would be for receiving him into its folds, as thousands of others who had left the old Federal party before. [Laughter.]

Bad doctrine, say gentlemen. It was his doctrine; and he, for one, was not disposed to deny it; and the Democratic party, with which he acted, had reason to be proud of it. Ay, to be proud of it. [Laughter.] When great distinguished old Federalists—men noted for their intelligence, and with talents of a high order—renounced the error of their ways, and joined the Democratic party, for what reason should it be said that the doors are closed, and there is no admittance for you? He feared, if that rule had been applied always, he should have been able to point out gentlemen on that floor who might have been debarred entrance, and might not have occupied the places in the Democratic party which they now hold. He might, perhaps, have a little more feeling on this subject than some other gentlemen, for he was brought up a Federalist [laughter,] of the old school, [renewed laughter,] by a father who, though not an active politician, was too honest to disown the name; and he owned it to this day, and despised the shifting and changing of names which had been so often resorted to. He (Mr. B.) did not, until he was 24 years of age, enter the political arena at all; but when he did, and when he examined the question for himself, he espoused the Democratic cause. He repented, however, that he was educated a Federalist; and if this stern, inflexible course had been adopted, he and others on that floor might have been shut out—entirely shut out. [Laughter.]

And if he were once satisfied that Daniel Webster had changed his political creed, and was at heart a Democrat, he, for one, would be as willing to receive him, as to receive any other of those distinguished members of that party who had left it before. [Laughter.] His (Mr. BOWNE's) friends said they could not take him. He had only to say that he spoke for himself. He spoke plainly his own individual feelings; and neither before the country, nor elsewhere, did he wish to have his party responsible for his views on this question. He did not know (nor did he care) what evidence Mr. Webster had given of his conversion to Democracy. He did not know that Mr. Webster had given any. He did not know that Mr. Webster desired or wished to belong to the Democratic party; but he made the remark in answer to the allegation of a gentleman yesterday, who thought there was an insuperable barrier between that party and the Administration and its measures. Now, so far as the measures of the Administration were concerned, there were those of which he approved, and had supported; and, as they came up, he should act as his judgment dictated.

But while he was attempting to reprove the course which gentlemen had taken in this debate, he had almost unconsciously fallen into that course himself. [Laughter.] He had only intended to call the attention of the House to the strange nature of this debate, and to make an appeal to the House to bring it to a close, and to have action upon it. Did gentlemen suppose the mind of a single member could be enlightened by this debate on the bankrupt bill? Did gentlemen suppose that a single vote could be changed, if this debate should be still further tolerated? Or, did gentlemen suppose that they could escape a direct vote on the question, or that it could be shuffled off entirely to another session? Now, he would ask, were not gentlemen who professed to be in favor of a repeal of the bankrupt law willing to come to a test vote on the direct question? Or was the policy which he saw suggested some days ago, in a country paper, to be pursued by gentlemen of the North, who were to oppose repeal, that the Democrats in the next Congress might have the credit of repealing it? Was that to be the policy pursued respecting a law against which the people had unequivocally pronounced? He hoped and trusted not. Let them have a direct vote on the question. They well understood that the people desired to know whether they intended to repeal the law or not. Some gentlemen had said it was to be repealed—that the decree had gone forth; but as day after day passed away, he became more and more convinced that they should get no action on this measure. Let but the motion of his colleague [Mr. BARNARD] be carried, and this bill referred to the Judiciary Committee—thirty days of the session having gone, and two-thirds of the session only remaining, with the various measures before them which called for their action, and which must be acted upon—and what time should they have, if they protracted this useless debate, to act upon it at a future period? Why, if it should go to that committee, it might come back when other measures required all their time; and then this bill would go precisely where its enemies wished it to go. He asked the House whether they might not then take the question, and whether that debate then might not cease. They heard yesterday—and he listened to him with great pleasure—the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. M. BROWN,] and his colleague, [Mr. FERRIS,] who were both guilty of being so much out of order, as to discuss the bill itself. [Laughter.] He (Mr. B.) was pleased, because they dealt with the subject candidly and fairly. They heard their arguments on this subject; they heard the arguments on both sides, when the bill was passed, and they had heard them through the columns of the newspapers; why, then, delay? He should close with the remark, that he hoped they would now have action.

Mr. BARNARD was understood to ask the gentleman from New York, who had said that public sentiment called for the repeal of the bankrupt law, whether the gentleman who succeeded him in the representation of his congressional district was not an open, avowed advocate of the bankrupt law?

Mr. BOWNE was understood to reply that he believed he was; but that was not made a question in the late election. And further, the gentleman alluded to was the only advocate of the bankrupt law that he had met with in that district.

Mr. MERIWETHER said if the bankrupt law had not been made a subject of discussion at the last election, it showed that there was not much trouble on that question in that district. He went on to state that he was opposed to the repeal of the bankrupt law; he foresaw that great mischief would result from the repeal; and he intended to take the responsibility of voting against it.

He then made some passing remarks on the speeches of gentlemen who had preceded him in this debate; and said the observations of the gentleman from New York [Mr. BOWNE] verified the distich—

"Long as the lamp holds out to burn,
The vilest sinner may return."

Pursuing that subject (he said) from the givings out on that floor, he concluded the corporal's guard was much larger than was generally supposed; and even the gentleman from New York [Mr. BOWNE] might not be very averse to enlist. The Democratic party had many members who were not unwilling to go over; and at a meeting of Democrats, held on the 19th of December, 1842, at Frankfort, in Kentucky, (which was attended by some of the most distinguished of the Democratic party of that place,) the following resolution was adopted:

"Resolved, That Daniel Webster and John C. Spencer, the brightest luminaries of the Whig sky, have, in their transit to Democracy, formed a halo of glory around its principles." [Roars of laughter.]

According to the gentleman from New York, they were willing to take as many as would come. But he had another curious document which he wished to read. It was a letter said to have been written at the White House—at least, it was published in the Union of New York. One gentleman had said something about the voracity with which the Whigs struggled for office, or of their "voracious maw;" but it seemed, from this letter, that there was a good deal of trouble among the Democrats about the offices. He then read a letter from the Union newspaper, which dolorously depicted the troubles of the President, and likened him to a man walking along a road who was met and despoiled of hat, coat, waistcoat—yea, and breeches also. [Roars of laughter.] From this he glanced at the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. CUSHING,] and the offering of the spoils of party at auction.

Mr. CUSHING rose, and said the gentleman from Georgia had repeated a remark which had been made several times in that House, and to which he had desired to reply; but he had not been so fortunate as to obtain the floor. He now begged the gentleman from Georgia to put his finger on a single sentence in his speech which authorized that imputation. [Laughter, and cries of "Oh, Oh, Oh."] He repeated his request, that the gentleman from Georgia would select from his speech a single sentence which would justify that imputation, or a sentence which the gentleman from Georgia would stand there and declare to the House was unjust in principle, and untrue in fact.

Mr. MERIWETHER said the gentleman from Massachusetts was playing the Yankee with him. He was answering one question by asking another.

Mr. CUSHING said he replied by a denial that he had said anything like that which was imputed to him.

Mr. MERIWETHER had asked the gentleman from Massachusetts whether the Whig party had bid? And the gentleman asked him to point to that part of his speech which said there was an auction. Perhaps the sale had been postponed. If so, he would say no more about it, further than, if it was, it was not for the sake of encouragement.

But he did not think that it was for want of encouragement that the sale ought to have been postponed; for they had some glorious bids—not open ones, to be sure, for it would not do for gentlemen to bid openly; they must cover up appearances. But he would ask, what better bid could be given than that of the gentleman from Indiana, who would not bid openly, to be sure; but "Mark you," said he, "I won't run against your constitutional fact."

Mr. CUSHING asked leave to make an explanation. The gentleman from Georgia asked him if he expected the Whig party to become bidders; and, on his asking him what part of his speech authorized such a question, he charged him with playing the Yankee on him. Now, he would beg leave to ask the gentleman the same question, in substance, again; and he expected a serious and candid answer to it. Would he put his finger on a single passage of his (Mr. C.'s) speech which he considered unjust in principle, or untrue in point of fact. If he did, he (Mr. C.) would bring forward some of the most distinguished men of the country, from the days of the Revolution down to the present time, in support of the doctrines there advanced.

Mr. MERIWETHER said that he had answered the gentleman already, by pointing to the whole of his speech. He could not take time to read it through for the gentleman; but he would advise him, when he went to his room, to take it up and review it again. The gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE,] in endeavoring to explain it away the other day, showed that, in his opinion, it required some explanation.

But when he was interrupted, he was going to show that there was trouble in the Democratic camp, and that there was somebody at the White House, or connected with it, who would have a word to say when the proper time came, as intimated by the gentleman from Massachusetts. Here was a letter, from which he would take the liberty of reading a few extracts, written from somebody at the White House, and published in one of the New York papers. [Mr. M. here read some extracts from the letter he referred to, stating, in substance, that "Mr. Calhoun was here, and that the writer never saw him look so well; that he seemed uneasy about going into a national convention, for fear that Mr. Van Buren, who was more dexterous with the cups and balls, might cheat him out of the nomination."] Now, (said Mr. M.) here is an intimation that there is some difficulty; but he would read further on, to see if there was not some intimation of what the gentleman from Massachusetts threw out in the course of his speech. Mr. M. read as follows:

"If a storm is brewing between the Whigs and the Calhoun men, the Administration has only to remain tranquil; and if the people will only unhorse the leaders, no man would be so strong as John Tyler."

All this, Mr. M. said, went to establish the assertion of the gentleman from Massachusetts—that Mr. Tyler was creating a division in the Democratic ranks, in his own favor. We have heard (said Mr. M.) the confessions of the North wing of the party; but we have heard nothing, as yet, from the Southern wing. He trusted that, before this debate closed, they should hear the confessions of that wing also. All these divisions in the Democratic party certainly showed some signs of their defeat. Why did they keep so many candidates in the field? Why did they not bring out their man, and advocate his pretensions to the Presidency? It was said that they were waiting for a national convention to reconcile their differences about men, and concentrate the opinions of the party on some particular candidate. He would not venture upon a prophecy; but there was one thing he should not be surprised at—and that was, that, when the convention should be held, they should nominate Daniel Webster for the Presidency, and John C. Spencer for the Vice Presidency—who, according to the Kentucky resolutions, which he had just read, had cast a halo of glory around the principles of Democracy.

As he remarked when he set out, he voted for the bankrupt bill, and voted for its repeal; but he should now vote against the repeal. Numbers had taken the benefit of the bankrupt act, who had been driven to it because their debtors first availed themselves of it, and in this way drove them to bankruptcy. It would be cruel and unjust, therefore, to deprive them of the benefits of the act, after they had been ruined by its operation. He should, therefore, vote against the repeal on these grounds, if there were no others to sustain it. Mr. M., in conclusion, contended that the act did not in its operations violate existing contracts, and was not an ex post facto law in the meaning of the Constitution.

Mr. PICKENS desired to detain the House but a few moments in relation to this subject. He was aware that it had been sufficiently discussed, and he would be pleased to see an early action upon it. Were he to legislate according to the feelings of his heart, and the sympathies of his nature, he would not deny to those unfortunates who seek for the benefits of this law the relief that it would give them. The gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. DAWSON,] the only Democrat who voted for this law, said the other day all that could be said in its favor. He confessed (Mr. P. said) that all the sympathies of his nature were deeply roused by the gentleman's warm-hearted and feeling address; but he did not stand here to legislate according to his feelings, nor to give relief to a particular class, at the expense of the Constitution of his country. He did not mean to say that a bankrupt law could not be framed in accordance with the Constitution; and this brought him to the remark of the gentleman from Georgia on this part of the subject. The gentleman asked why this law should now be repealed, since the Constitution gave to Congress the express power to pass a bankrupt law. He agreed with the gentleman that the power was given in the Constitution, but he always considered it as the most dangerous one that could be exercised. That, and the clause giving the power to regulate commerce, were the most dangerous and uncertain powers in the Constitution—powers of which he always thought that Congress should be exceedingly cautious, and strict in their construction when exercising them. When the framers of the Constitution inserted the provision in it in relation to bankruptcy, they must have had in view its meaning as it was then understood from English law and English decisions. All know the statute of Henry VIII, and how extremely limited it was in its provisions. It was intended to apply to swindlers, and dishonest traders only who become bankrupt, and to make them place their assets at the disposal of their creditors. That law was the foundation of all the English laws on the subject made since that time; and there was some doubt whether they had not done more harm than good. If, then, there were just grounds for complaint against the system in a country of limited extent like England, with a consolidated Government, how much more likely would it be to operate injuriously in a country like ours, of diversity of interests and pursuits, and of twenty-six independent sovereignties?

Mr. P., after some further remarks, went on to argue against the principle of voluntary bankruptcy in the present law. He knew that it had been said that there was but little difference between an insolvent law and a bankrupt law, and the opinion of the Attorney General had been given in support of this assumption; but Mr. P. contended that there was a broad distinction between them. The insolvent law was intended for the benefit of the debtor; while the bankrupt law was intended for the benefit of the creditor, and to provide that the assets of his debtor should be paid over for his use. Now, when a bankrupt law contained within it the voluntary principle of bankruptcy, allowing the debtor at his option to relieve himself from his obligations to his creditors, it was nothing but an insolvent law, and, therefore, entirely out of the meaning of the clause in the Constitution referred to. He would, therefore, make the act, if he passed one at all, in strict conformity with the meaning of bankruptcy, as it was understood at the time the provison on the subject was inserted in the Constitution: the meaning of bankruptcy, as laid down in Blackstone, was precisely the one that he would be governed by. He thought that the present law was unconstitutional; because it clearly interfered with existing contracts, and clearly an ex post facto law; and he held that gentlemen who supported it were bound to argue that Congress had a right to interfere with contracts, and make an ex post facto law. In fact, a gentleman at the last session did take such grounds; and what was his argument? Why, that Congress could interfere with contracts, because the power was prohibited to the States. This was a perfect solecism, and an argument he never expected to have heard. He had thought that this was a Government of limited powers, and confined within the provisions of a written Constitution. But, if such doctrines prevailed, it would sweep within the powers of the Federal Government all the contracts within the country, all the relations between debtor and creditor, and nearly all the transactions of private life. Were gentlemen aware of the tremendous powers they claimed for the Federal Government, by adopting such an argument as this? Credit and confidence between man and man would be broken up. No man would trust his neighbor; and all business would be destroyed, if it should be decided that the Federal Government could step in and interfere with contracts, releasing the debtor from the obligations he had entered into, and thereby depriving the creditor of a portion of his property. If gentlemen took it on this ground, they were compelled to take the argument that this Government can interfere with contracts, and pass ex post facto laws. It was a power that would shake the very foundations of civilized society; and, of course, it was not granted to this Government by the framers of the Constitution. It was on this ground principally that he was in favor of a repeal of the law. It had been argued that it should be retained, because all the harm that could be done under it had been done already, and that there were numbers who, having been driven into bankruptcy by it, were now, in justice, entitled to its benefits. Much had been said to excite the commiseration of the House for this class of unfortunate persons. Though he loved the attribute of mercy, he was still bound to do justice. He would not do evil that good might follow. He was for doing equal and exact justice to all, and would not, for the sake of indulging in the kindly feelings of his nature, trample on the Constitution of his country. Mr. P. next went into an argument against the proposition of the gentleman from New York, to include banks and other corporations in the provisions of the bankrupt law. He asked if the gentleman had reflected on the alarming consequences that would follow the successful termination of his motion. What, he asked, would be left to the States, if this proposition should be carried into effect? Their churches, their railroads, their school corporations, and private chartered companies of every description, would be swept away. He was as much opposed to banks as any gentleman on that floor, and had assailed them with all the energies of which he was capable, when other gentlemen, who were now so ready to attack them, quailed under their power. He was utterly and irreconcilably opposed to them; but he would not, for the sake of getting at them, sweep away that noble instrument, on which our liberties rest. Look at Alabama, whose State Bank is a part of her financial system. Look at South Carolina, which was largely interested in her banks. Would gentlemen have these to be placed at the mercy of the Northern and Eastern banks, to sue out commissions of bankruptcy against them, and drag them down to ruin? What would be the effect of such a provision on the banks of the South and Southwest? Exchanges were generally against them, and in favor of the Northern and Northeastern banks, and they would be placed at the feet of New York and New England. The provision the gentleman sought to introduce would be, in effect, a tremendous bank of the United States, with branches in the North and East, having the power to ruin the Southern banks at their pleasure. Having said all that he intended to say on the bill before the House, he would now briefly touch on the incidental subject that had been brought forward in the debate.

The gentleman from Massachusetts the other day made a very extraordinary speech; and that speech had been quoted variously by different members on that floor, as well as by the public press. He did not know that he understood the gentleman exactly; but if he meant to say (as charged against him by several gentlemen, and by the newspapers) that the power and patronage of the Government were to be held for the purpose of sustaining the Administration in office, and for pulling down and putting up political aspirants, he could only say to the gentleman that he trampled such doctrines with scorn under his feet. The gentleman knew that he (Mr. P.) stood up here in opposition to power and patronage, when it required some nerve to do so; and he now could not be diverted from the line of conduct his principles had marked out for him, either by fear or favor. He wanted nothing from any Administration, and would fearlessly do his duty to his country and the people he represented, without looking to any Administration for its approbation. Not that he had any objection to the present President of the United Statesn; on the contrary, he respected his character and his integrity. He had been abused and traduced grossly and unjustly, and he had his (Mr. P.'s) sympathies on that account.

He would say to the gentleman from Massachusetts, that he rejoiced to see him standing in the position in which he now stood. He would do the gentleman the credit of saying that he had always had a leaning to Democratic principles. [A laugh.] He had great cause to congratulate the country, and the gentleman himself, that, although he had been the most violent ultra—though he had been actually so full of ranoorous abuse, that even he (Mr P.) had shuddered with fear, [laughter,]—though the gentleman and a colleague of his (another of the guard) had been so violent in denunciation that he (Mr. P.) had actually shuddered lest he should be robbed of his seat—yet he had now cause to congratulate them that they had at last embraced the truth. He did not believe they were leaving the truth; because, according to the adage, "truth was mighty and would prevail," and that could hardly be said of the cause they were leaving. The Greeks well understood the frailty of poor human nature. They represented the Goddess of Wisdom with a crown upon her head, clothed with the trappings of power, and sitting in imperial state. They sought to make her attractive. They well understood nature when they represented Wisdom invested with the trappings and symbols of power.

He would not say the gentlemen only loved truth because presented to them in this form; but he would say this—that those gentlemen with whom he (Mr. PICKENS) acted, acted upon broad principles: and, as to the divisions which were supposed to exist in the Republican party, he knew nothing of them. He did not believe that any serious divisions existed. He believed there were no divisions but such as might be reconciled, with prudence and judgment. He could see no cause for the least want of harmony. They stood upon the broad principles of the Constitution.

He would tell the gentlemen, that one of the principles upon which he would not be found harmonizing with them, was the question of free trade. The bank question he considered dead; but, as to this question of free trade, he would tell the gentlemen—those who may come into power—let them come in as they may, the banner of free trade will wave, whether on the part of the Administration or of the opposition. Those principles which were identified with the best interests of the country would prevail.

Did they ask for favor? No, sir. He could assure them, (and there were gentlemen there who knew the fact,) that if he had thought proper to fawn and flatter, he could have borne the trappings of office; but he scorned to dress himself in the livery of any man, he cared not what power or what patronage he might wield. He went for his country—for the Constitution of his country—the constitution and rights of South Carolina against the world. [A laugh.] He would be unworthy of the place he occupied, if he could have suffered his mouth to be muzzled. He contended not for the sake of paltry, party triumph. No: he scorned, he despised the thought; it was for those great principles which it had been the pride and glory of his life to contend for.

As for the divisions in the Whig party, he knew nothing about them; others were better informed. He could only say that he felt a sincere sympathy for them. They came into power under the most abandoned and profligate principles; and now they were about to be dissolved, without much regard to principle. [Laughter.] In reply to the famous Kentucky orator, he would say they (the Whigs) were standing aghast at the handwriting on the wall which proclaimed their guilt.

Mr. PROFFIT said he presumed no man, reading the reports of the debates in that House, could suppose that they were discussing the bankrupt bill. He could tell them what the feeling of the country was in relation to the repeal of the bankrupt law, and in regard to the insincerity which had marked the proceedings of the majority there. The bankrupt bill had always been in a minority; it was laid on the table by 13 or 17 votes; and afterwards taken up by means of a caucus, and passed by a minority—five members standing behind the columns, and refusing to vote. The bill passed against the known will of the people of the United States—against the will of those who sent the members of that House to Congress. And he would tell those gentlemen, by whose votes it passed, that, when they returned home and met their constituents face to face, they found that it was for their interest to return here, and vote for its repeal, before it could go fairly into effect. They now found themselves called upon by the country to repeal the bankrupt law. They were now in the very same condition that they were in last year, in regard to the pay of members. All were in favor of the repeal of the bill, and yet they could never get a dozen votes in its favor. If gentlemen supposed the people would not understand them, they were greatly mistaken. He would now say a word to the Democratic party; for, thank God, he stood in a situation where he cared not whether he pleased or displeased either party. [A laugh.] He had said so at home, and he repeated it here. A plague on the heads of both. He would now tell the gentlemen what was the condition of the Democratic party. Every man of them was anxious to have the bill passed, but did not want to take the responsibility of voting for its repeal; desiring to throw all the odium possible on the Whig party for having voted for its passage. And now they say you do not intend to repeal it, but intend to keep up the divisions and dissensions which exist here. He would say, then, to the Democrats, Do not, when you go home, charge it upon the Whig party that they were unwilling to repeal the law. You know that you said at the last session you were opposed to it; if so, walk up; let us have no humbugging; walk up to the work, and repeal it. He (Mr. P.) clearly saw that the law was not going to be repealed in that House; and the only hopes he had, were, that a bill would come from the Senate for its repeal.

Gentlemen said, strike out the voluntary clause. But did not gentlemen see that that would be perfectly useless? Did they not suppose that it would be an easy thing for a man to go to some good friend, and say, Force me into bankruptcy? Might not a man compel his creditor to drive him into involuntary bankruptcy? All systems connected with this sort of business were liable to fraud. He believed he had spoken very plainly in regard to this matter. He held it to be the duty of every Democrat in that House to walk right up and vote for the repeal of the bill. He believed that nine out of ten of all parties were really in favor of its repeal. He had not impugned the motives of any one; he had but expressed his own opinions.

He had heard a good deal about putting up the Administration at auction. He would ask the gentlemen what they had to offer them in case they should come forward and repeal the bankrupt law? It was the most laughable thing he had ever heard of. What would the gentlemen give them? Did they mean to go upon the credit system? He (Mr. P.) was not disposed to sell himself upon credit. [Laughter.] He would tell the Whigs how it was possible for them as a party, having among them men of intelligence, of tact, of ingenuity, to permit themselves to be drawn into such a debate as this. Would they acknowledge that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CUSHING] might, at any time he chose, draw them into a debate which must end in their defeat as a party? They had been accused of wasting the time of the House; but to allow such a debate as this to go on, and to continue, day after day, talking about Captain Tyler and Democracy, without doing anything, was the greatest abuse of time that had yet occurred. He gave them his advice freely: he did not intend to charge them anything for it. [A laugh.] There were some few on whom the responsibility would fall: they could gain nothing by it politically—they could not injure the Administration. They might butt their heads against it; but they would be likely to get their brains knocked out, if they had any. [A laugh.] When he acted with the Whig party, he never fought with shadows—he had sought out the substances, and combatted them. The overthrow of that party he should attribute to his having left them. [A laugh.]

He knew not exactly what the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CUSHING] intended to intimate, in the declaration made by him to the House a few days since; but he knew that his friend had some peculiarities of expression. [Laughter.] He wished he could imitate his compressing and condensing power of style; for his friend from Massachusetts could put into one sentence what other men would occupy a whole speech with. But was it wonderful that he should have said that persons connected with this Administration would have something to say in the next presidential election? Did gentlemen suppose that his (Mr. P.'s) tongue could be kept still? [Laughter.] Did they suppose that Daniel Webster would say nothing?—that man whom they were constantly braying at as wolves at the moon? [Laughter.] Did they suppose that John C. Spencer would say nothing?—that his friends from Massachusetts, [Mr. CUSHING] Virginia, [Mr. WISE,] and himself, as well as others, would say nothing? [Laughter.] They—he could assure the gentlemen—were accustomed to have something to say; and he hoped they would not be denied that poor privilege. He cared not who might be the candidate, nor how much might be said about political consistency or inconsistency.

He then went into a series of reminiscences of scenes in the House during the late campaign—the calling of the previous question—the course pursued by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. PICKENS] in that contest—the remarks make by Messrs. Vanderpoel and Dromgoole. He next proceeded to comment upon an article in the November number of the Democratic Review, in which the exchequer was condemned, and the re-establishment of the sub-treasury recommended with modifications. This writer in the Democratic Review, who always wrote with sense, proposed that there should be a separate vault in the sub-treasury for private deposites; certificates to be sold at a small premium, in order to "accommodate the people." Hence, he drew the inference that the exchequer, in its essential features, was popular with the Democratic party.

Much had been said about political inconsistency and changes. How had the Whig party got into power, but by constant accessions from the Democratic party of men who were badly treated, or dissatisfied? The Democratic party were coming into power; but it was not the power they wanted. They would have a majority in the next Congress; but they would die on congressional power, unless they could get some executive power. [Laughter.] How could they get power, unless from changes? They would not reject an old farmer who had come up to vote for them, and acknowledged that he had always been in error before. Everything intended to operate on public sentiment was to produce change.. What else but political changes had produced the revolution of 26,000 votes in Ohio, 14,000 in Maine, and so on in other States? It was, then, idle to talk about political instability and inconsistency, when public sentiment so much depended on the wisdom and prudence of those in power.

He did not go for merging with the Democratic party. He, however, claimed to be a Republican Democrat, and always would be. The ticket which he voted had Harrison and Tyler on it, and headed "Democratic Whig" ticket. [Laughter.] But many of those who supported that ticket knew not, until it got in power, whether it was Democratic or not.

When the next election came, though he did not expect to get a Jeffersonian Democrat fully after his own heart, yet he would take the best he could get. [Laughter.] It would not be in his power to go out and cull flowers of his own choosing. If he understood the wishes of the present Administration, it was desirous and anxious to go out of power with a good name. In a few years, most of the speeches now made here would be forgotten, and with them would have passed away the excitement and asperities of the scenes now passing around them. Then, the country would look to the records for the acts of the present Administration; and he believed that it would be imperishably recorded as having honorably settled every question with which it was charged when it came into power "without a party." Its very success would arise from the circumstance of its having no party. Did any one believe that the treaty with England could have passed the Senate, had the President been possessed of the support of a party in that body? Had the Democracy been in a majority, and a Whig President, they would have said, "this treaty will favor our opponents; let us reject it." So, also, if the case were reversed. But John Tyler held the executive power; and, having no party in the Senate, the result was 39 to 9. He (Mr. P.) thanked God that such a state of facts existed as a President without a party. Upon this he predicated his prophecy that the Oregon question would be settled by this Administration; the Mexican claims settled; and many other public questions, which had long agitated the public mind, brought to a close. All he asked was, that gentlemen would not forestall questions of public policy. Keep still, and, his word for it, the Administration would come out in triumph.

He concluded by declaring it as his conviction that it was the duty of all those who were in favor of the repeal of the bankrupt law, to come up and so vote, instead of giving to the country the idea that Congress could not pass a single measure of importance without incessant cavil.

Mr. GORDON next obtained the floor, but yielded it to a motion for an adjournment.

The House then adjourned, at a quarter past 3 o'clock.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, January 5, 1843.

Mr. WRIGHT presented a memorial from William De Puyster, now of the State of New York, but lately of the Territory of Florida, praying compensation for a certain slave taken into the service of the United States by the commanding officer in Florida, and sent to Arkansas with the emigrating Seminoles: referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented a memorial from the Philadelphia Board of Trade, signed by the president and secretary, in favor of the warehousing system; which, on motion of Mr. B., was, in connexion with three memorials upon the same subject heretofore presented by him. and laid on the table, referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. TALLMADGE presented three memorials from New York, remonstrating against the repeal of the bankrupt act; which were referred to the Judiciary Committee.

OBSTRUCTIONS IN THE MISSISSIPPI RIVER.

Mr. McROBERTS presented a memorial from citizens of Illinois, numerously signed, asking Congress to adopt an efficient system, and to appropriate means, to remove the snags and other obstructions to the navigation of the Mississippi river.

Mr. McR. remarked that the memorial contained some specific information in regard to the losses of boats and property, at places called the "Graveyard" and "Goose island," in the Mississippi river, and both of which places were within the limits of Illinois—losses which had occurred within a few months past, and which, from their magnitude, presented a subject for the gravest consideration. The losses at those places and others on the river include the following list of boats:

1. The Mentor, sunk at Goose island—boat and cargo a total loss.
2. The New Orleans, sunk at Goose island—boat and cargo a total loss.
3. The Pre-emption, sunk at Goose island—the boat a total loss, and most of the cargo.
4. The Robert T. Lytle, sunk at Goose island—the boat since raised; the cargo lost.
5. The Eliza, sunk at Goose island—boat and cargo, and thirty lives lost.
6. The Fort Pitt, sunk near Goose island—boat a total loss, and part of the cargo.
7. The Louisville, (which was used as a lighter to the Eclipse,) lost near the mouth of the Ohio—boat total loss, and part of the cargo.
8. The Osage Valley, sunk at same place as the Louisville—boat a total loss, and part of the cargo.
9. The John Perry, sunk at island 14, below the mouth of the Ohio—boat and cargo total loss, with the exception of the machinery.
10. The Louisa, sunk between St. Louis and the mouth of the Ohio—whether she would be a total loss, is not stated.
11. The North Alabama, snagged and sunk near Natchez, said to have been loaded with cotton—a total loss.
12. The Glaucus, sunk above St. Louis, on her way to Galena—boat and cargo a total loss.

13, 14, and 15. The Winchester, the Fair Play, and the Lawrence, lost in the Ohio, above its confluence with the Mississippi.

16 The iron steamer Valley Forge, snagged and sunk at the "Graveyard" or Goose island.

In addition to this list are to be added the Transit, Queen of the West, Vicksburg, General Pratt, Neptune, Lebanon, and Corvette; besides others, the names of which are not stated in this memorial.

In a memorial from citizens of St. Louis, it is stated that, in less than five weeks during the last fall, boats and property were lost between St. Louis and Cairo, amounting to two hundred and thirty-four thousand dollars.

The losses, since the period referred to, and those at other places on the Mississippi, Ohio, and Red rivers, would, in all probability, swell the sum to half a million—and this in a period of less than six months. The magnitude of the losses has become alarming, and has seriously affected the value of steamboat property.

Mr. McR. said that, according to a statement recently published, it appeared that there were about one hundred steamboats regularly employed in the trade of the Mississippi as high up as St. Louis and Alton; and that, of this number, twenty-three were lost in 1841, and nearly as many have been lost in the same trade the present year. He said the appropriations made at the last session had enabled the department to put some of the snag-boats in repair, and to commence operations; but that much more means were required, and the establishment of an efficient system to afford protection to the commerce upon our great Western rivers.

He believed that, in the adoption of the system, and in the execution of the work, the experienced captains of steamboats were the men who would best accomplish it. The practical knowledge which they possess of the river, and which they have acquired by years of experience, and their intrepidity of character, render them better qualified than any other class of men. He would prefer to see them employed; but, be that as it may, he hoped an ample appropriation would be made; and that, at all practicable seasons of the year, the work would be vigorously prosecuted.

The petition was, on his motion, referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. EVANS, from the Committee on Finance, to which had been referred the bill from the House entitled "An act for the relief of the owners, officers, and crew of the armed brig Warrior, and their legal representatives," made a report recommending that the bill do not pass; which report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. SMITH of Ia., from the Committee on Public Lands, reported back, without amendment, and with a recommendation that it do pass, the House bill for the relief of Elisha Moreland, William M. Kennedy, Robert J. Kennedy, and Mason E. Lewis.

Also, from the same committee, to which had been referred the petition of the citizens of Scott county, Arkansas, praying a donation of land for the county seat of said county, reported that the object of the petition was provided for in the general law, and asked that the committee be discharged; which was done.

Also, reported back from the same committee, with an amendment, the bill to authorize the Legislatures of Illinois, Arkansas, Louisiana, and Tennessee to sell the school lands heretofore appropriated for the use of schools in those States.

Also, reported back, without amendment, the bill to authorize the sale of school lands in the State of Illinois, and to legalize such sales as have been made prior to the passage of this act, and recommending that it be indefinitely postponed; the bill immediately preceding having been so amended by the committee as to embrace the objects of this bill.

Mr. GRAHAM, from the Committee on Claims, reported back without amendment, and with a recommendation that they do pass, the following bills from the House, viz:

The bill for the relief of Peter Lionberger.

The bill for the relief of John R. Delany.

The bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Captain Samuel Shannon, deceased.

The bill for the relief of Cornelius Wilson and James Carter; and

The bill for the relief of James M. Morgan.

Mr. PHELPS, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, reported adversely on the claim of George Burke, for bounty land for revolutionary services; which was ordered to be printed.

The following resolution, heretofore submitted by Mr. BUCHANAN, was taken up and adopted, viz:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to communicate to the Senate any report which may have been made to him, or to the Solicitor of the Treasury, by the United States attorney for the eastern district of Pennsylvania, in relation to the cloth cases, recently tried in that district, involving forfeitures consequent upon the violation of the revenue laws.

The following resolution, heretofore submitted by Mr. SMITH of Indiana, was taken up and adopted, viz:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to report to the Senate, in as concise a form as may be practicable:

1. The amount of the public debt at the close of the war of the Revolution, and the amount paid by the Federal Government for the individual States, for the expenditures incurred in that war.
2. The amount of the public debt at the close of the late war with Great Britain; and the amount of the public debt at the close of each Administration of the Federal Government.
3. The amount remaining in the treasury at the close of each Administration.
4. The gross amount of the receipts of each Administration—distinguishing between the receipts from imports, public lands, and other sources.
5. The gross amount of the expenditures of each Administration—distinguishing between the amount paid in discharge of the public debt, and for other purposes.
6. The amount deposited with the States, severally.
7. The gross amount of continental paper money issued by the Federal Government, and the amount of the same redeemed by the Government.

8. The present public debt of the United States, in gross.

9. The present public debt of Great Britain, in gross.]

10 The gross amount of exports and of imports of the United States, during each Administration of the Federal Government.

11. What nations have funded their public debt, or the debts of their citizens, under the original par value thereof, or at a diminished rate of interest, and the terms of such funding.

Mr. BENTON submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to communicate to the Senate a report of the exports and imports of gold and silver coin and bullion, annually, from the 30th June, 1834, to the end of the last year.

Mr. WOODBURY suggested to the mover of the resolution the propriety of so modifying it as to distinguish between the exports and imports of foreign and domestic coin. The resolution only calls for the exports and imports of gold and silver coin, without regard to whether foreign or domestic. The Senate might not be aware of it, but there was at least $2,000,000 of domestic coin exported annually.

Mr. BENTON, in accordance with the suggestion, modified his resolution by adding, at the end thereof, the words "distinguishing between foreign and domestic coin." It was then adopted.

CAROLINE AFFAIR.

The resolution introduced by Mr. RIVES on yesterday, calling upon the President of the United States to communicate to the Senate, (if not incompatible with the public interest,) all the correspondence between the American Minister at London and others, in relation to the destruction of the Caroline, was taken up for consideration.

Mr. RIVES said it was proper, perhaps, to say a single word as to the particular object he had in view in presenting the resolution. It was in the recollection of the Senate, that a great deal of correspondence, touching this subject, of a very important character, was before this body, in secret session. In several of the published speeches on this treaty, partial extracts had been made from that correspondence. As a matter of justice to all concerned, it was due that the whole correspondence should be communicated, and that they should not be judged by partial extracts therefrom. In all candor and fairness towards those concerned, it was due that it should be published entire; and he saw no reason why the whole should not be communicated to the Senate, for that purpose.

The resolution was then adopted.

The following resolution, introduced by Mr. BARROW, on yesterday, was taken up, and agreed to, viz:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be directed to communicate to the Senate the evidence in his possession showing that depredations of a most ruinous kind are being daily committed on the navy timber growing on the public lands; and that our own people are daily selling to our Government live-oak timber, which they take from the public lands; and also such proof as may be in his possession tending to show that any foreign Government has, by contracts with any of our citizens, obtained supplies of live oak, cut from the public land; and, also, inform the Senate what additional grants of power and means to the officers of Government are, in his opinion, necessary to complete the preservation, for national uses, of the live-oak timber growing on the public lands in the State of Louisiana and the Territory of Florida.

House bill entitled "An act to amend the act establishing a district court at Wheeling, Va.," was read twice, and referred to the Judiciary Committee.

The bill declaring the assent of Congress to the State of Illinois to impose a tax on all lands sold in that State from and after the time of such sale, was read the second time.

THE BRITISH TREATY AND THE [RED LINES.

Mr. WALKER rose and observed that, before the morning hour passed away, he desired to make a brief statement in relation to a matter which he understood the attention of the Senate was called to yesterday; and, during the discussion of which, he had been appealed to by the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. RIVES,] as to a conversation which he had had with him on his arrival at the beginning of the present session. He alluded to the subject of the maps brought forward last session, in secret session, while the treaty with Great Britain was under discussion; one of which maps was referred to by the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. RIVES,] and the other by the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON.] He understood that the Senator from Virginia, yesterday, in connexion with the remarks which he had made, referred to him (Mr. WALKER) as entertaining, on one point of the controversy between him and the Senator from Missouri, concurrent recollections and impressions of what occurred at the time of the discussion in secret session particularly referred to by the latter Senator. That point was in relation to the object and purpose for which the Senator from Missouri introduced the old French map of 1784, from Mr. Jefferson's collection in the library of Congress. The Senator from Virginia, he understood, referred to a conversation with him lately in confirmation of this. The conversation alluded to, he recollected, occurred the day after he took his seat in the Senate. His friend from Virginia asked him if he had seen the printed speech of the Senator from Missouri, on the subject of the treaty. He replied that he had not. He then asked if he (Mr. W.) had, at the time of the discussion, understood the Senator from Missouri as introducing the old French map of 1784, from Mr. Jefferson's collection in the library, with a view of rebutting the map referred to by Mr. Sparks, on the supposition of its being Dr. Franklin's map, which indicated by a red line the northeastern boundary of the United States. He (Mr. W.) replied that he did understand the Senator from Missouri as introducing the old French map, with the view of rebutting the statement of Mr. Sparks, that the line marked on the map found by him in the archives of the foreign department in France, was made by Dr. Franklin.

The Senator from Virginia also asked him (Mr. W.) if he recollected whether, at the time of the discussion on that point, his impression was that the Senator from Missouri had or had not succeeded in effecting the object and purpose for which he produced the old French map; and, as well as he (Mr. W.) recollected, he replied that it was his impression that the old French map proved nothing: that, standing by itself, if it proved anything at all, it would be rather more unfavorable to the claim of the United States than anything else. He (Mr. W.) reiterated to the Senator what he had during the discussion in secret sesion repeatedly asserted—that the map referred to by Mr. Sparks never did belong to Dr. Franklin, and most probably never had been seen by him. Now, as regards the object or purpose with which the Senator from Missouri introduced the old French map, all he could do was merely to give his opinion, and to state the impressions left on his mind by what occurred at the time. And, first, with regard to the dispute as to the time the Senator introduced the map, he should say that it was his opinion, that when the subject of Mr. Spark's communication was mentioned by the Senator from Virginia, the Senator from Missouri produced this map, to rebut the statement of Mr. Sparks, and most especially the presumption that the red line alluded to by Mr. Sparks was made by Dr. Franklin. The Senator from Missouri pointed to the red line on the French map, to show that the same line was marked on other maps besides that alluded to by Mr. Sparks. That line, in fact, was on all the old French maps, and indicated merely the boundary of Canada claimed by the French when it was in their possession.

Mr. BENTON. I not only produced it for that purpose, but to show that the great secret was no secret at all; and I proclaimed the "broad, strong red line" aloud from my seat.

Mr. WALKER resumed. He thought that the Senator not only proclaimed it aloud, but, in an emphatic manner, used the expression "here is the bloody red mark." He (Mr. W.) did not think the old French map of 1784 sustained the presumption that the red mark on the map found by Mr. Sparks was either made by Dr. Franklin, or intended to indicate the boundary line between the United States and the British territory.

There were reasons, probably well known to the Senate, why he (Mr. W.) should have his attention arrested by any mention of the name of Dr. Franklin. When, therefore, the Senator from Virginia, during the discussion in secret session, had introduced the subject of Mr. Sparks's communication, the moment the name of that distinguished patriot was mentioned, his (Mr. W.'s) attention was aroused. As soon as an opportunity was afforded, he rose and stated that it was not his purpose to make a speech; but that he had risen with a view of entering his protest against the inference that the map found by Mr. Sparks was, the one referred to in Dr. Franklin's note quoted by him. He then took the ground that it could not be the marked boundary made by Dr. Franklin; and sustained this position by reference to the treaty which Dr. Franklin had drawn up himself but a few days previous. He even pointed out to the Senator from Virginia the impossibility of reconciling that red line with the description of the boundary line given in the treaty drawn up by Dr. Franklin, and which he must have referred to in the note quoted by Mr. Sparks. The red line on the map did not run one inch to the north, and therefore could not answer to the description of the boundary line given by Dr. Franklin. His friend from Virginia [Mr. RIVES] seemed particularly struck with this view of the matter. He rose in his place, and doubted that such could be the case; but he (Mr. W.) showed him that it was, and immediately demonstrated to him that the red line did not run one solitary inch to the north, but took its course due east. Now, it was very well known that Dr. Franklin's great anxiety was to extend the boundary line of the United States as far north as it was possible to extend it. How, then, could it be reconciled to this well-established fact, that, instead of keeping up to the words of the treaty, he should so far sacrifice the rights of the United States as to draw a line on the map which did not run north at all, but ran due east? It was not reconcilable with his solicitude for the northern extension of his native State, and his anxiety to procure all he could for his country, that he should mark out such a boundary as that supposed by Mr. Sparks to be his. On comparing the wording of the treaty drawn up by Dr. Franklin, with the act of Parliament of 1774 designating the boundary line of Canada, it would be found that he must have had of that act of Parliament before him, and that he literally copied from it the description of the boundary line, agreeing in every particular except the last word.

Here Mr. W. quoted both the act and the treaty, and commented on the subject of the true boundary line intended, for some time.

He insisted that the French maps in use at the time all followed the boundaries fixed by maps made 40 years before that date, when Canada belonged to the French, and when France maintained her right to the territory north of that red line. It was a mark merely indicating on a French map the French claim of boundary. In renewing those maps, no regard was paid to errors committed in the old maps. It was not at all probable that Dr. Franklin would take one of those old erroneous French maps upon which to draw the line of boundary intended by him in the wording of the treaty. It was more consistent with all the circumstances of the occasion that he should take the best English map of the day, and mark it with the line referred to in his note quoted by Mr. Sparks. There was not one particle of evidence to be adduced from the circumstance that the map found by Mr. Sparks in Paris had a broad, strong red line, indicating some boundary of Canada, was the map marked by Dr. Franklin; because every French map of the day had the same red line on it. Nothing could be more common than it was for maps to have such red lines. They proved nothing in such a case as this.

Mr. W., after a few more remarks, concluded, reiterating his impressions as to the object and purpose with which the Senator from Missouri introduced the old French map from Mr. Jefferson's collection.

Mr. TAPPAN said he recollected perfectly well the circumstances referred to; and he could say that what had been stated by the Senator from Mississippi, regarding the purpose of the Senator from Missouri in producing the map, conformed exactly with the recollection he had of what occurred.

Mr. RIVES said he certainly did not feel it to be at all necessary to follow the Senator from Mississippi in his very extraordinary reargument. The only thing they had anything to do with was the question, For what purpose was the map produced by the Senator from Missouri? It would be recollected that this was the gist of the whole matter. And, until he heard the remarks of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. TAPPAN,] he had supposed that the whole Senate agreed with him in the opinion that it was for the purpose of contradicting and invalidating the map already in the possession of the Senate. It appeared, however, according to the statement now made by the Senator from Missouri, that it had been produced by him, not for the purpose of contradicting and invalidating the other, but for the purpose of showing that the map was no secret; that it had been produced long before; that there had been no new discovery. What was it the Senator from Mississippi said was his impression as to the object of the Senator from Missouri in producing the map? Did he not say, as was said by him, (Mr. RIVES,) yesterday, that its production was not to prove there was no secret in the matter, but to invalidate and rebut the authority of the one produced as the map of Doctor Franklin. He (Mr. RIVES) was far from saying that he might not have been led into error, as well as other members of that body; but he certainly thought he might claim, at the hands of the Senate, the acknowledgment, in his justification, that, if he had been led into error, it was an error common to almost the whole of the body.

The complaint of the Senator from Missouri seemed to be, that he (Mr. RIVES) had stated the production of the map by the Senator to have been for the purpose of invalidating, falsifying, and contradicting the other. This was the whole question. And, though he (Mr. R.) would, when the honorable Senator from Missouri assured them that such was not his object, be very unwilling to assert the contrary; yet he felt it due to himself, and to the Senate, to say that such was his impression, and, he believed, the impression of a large majority of the Senate.

The Senator from Missouri now said that his object was not to falsify and invalidate the map of Dr. Franklin. But what did the Senator from Mississippi say? He said the object of the Senator from Missouri, according to his impression, was to rebut and falsify the map of Dr. Franklin.

He (Mr. R.) felt it was due to himself to enter a little into these circumstances, to show how natural it was for him and other Senators to entertain the impression which he did. Why should so much stress have been laid on the map coming from Mr. Jefferson's collection? Why the remark of the Senator, underrating the red line—that any little school miss might have traced it? Why the insinuation that the microscopic-dotted line was the true boundary, and not the broad red one? Surely he could not have mistaken the object of the honorable Senator. He had been assured by several Senators that they had a distinct recollection of the circumstances, and that they agreed with him in the opinion he had expressed; and when, therefore, he found himself arraigned upon that floor for making a statement not justified by the occurrence, he felt he had a right to stand upon his justification, and to say, that if there had been a mistake, it was not his fault, but was owing, perhaps, to the precipitate manner in which the whole matter had gone on. All he had to say was, if there had been a misapprehension, it was a misapprehension that was natural, under the circumstances. The Senator from Missouri was generally very distinct in stating his views and opinions upon any subject; and he (Mr. R.) was the more confirmed in the opinion that he could not have been mistaken on this occasion, from the circumstance that several Senators had collected about him to examine the two maps; and they had all pronounced that, instead of the one being a contradiction of the other, it was precisely the contrary.

Mr. BENTON observed that he was not to be dragged away from the question of fact by any issue as to opinions or inferences. He would adhere to the simple question of fact. Yesterday he had confined himself to the statement made by the Senator in his printed speech. He would do so now. He should not be driven from that by any diversion of the question to opinions. He would again read the Senator's own words. They were in his printed speech:

"The Senator who produced it [the map] could see nothing but the microscopic dotted line running off in a northeasterly direction; but the moment other eyes were applied to it, there was found, in bold relief, a strong red line, indicating the limits of the United States according to the treaty of peace, and coinciding, minutely and exactly, with the boundary traced on the map of Mr. Sparks."

Now the point he made yesterday, and to which he would confine himself to-day, was, that the fact was not as stated in the passage just read. He asserted that the fact was not so, in the presence of forty-eight Senators. In the presence of these forty-eight Senators, his statement was, that the facts were not as represented in those words: that he could see something else besides the "microscopic dotted line;" that he did see something else—that he saw the broad "strong red line" before any other Senator saw it on that occasion, and that it did not require "other eyes" to be "applied" to the map to discover that broad "strong red line," to have it made known to the Senate that it was in existence. What he asserted was, that there was no necessity for "other eyes" to make that discovery; for the moment the subject of Mr. Sparks's secret was divulged, he (Mr. BENTON) proclaimed aloud that "here was the very same red line." Here, then, was the question of fact. It lay between the assertion of the printed speech he had quoted, and his own assertion now and yesterday in the face of the whole Senate; and that assertion was, that he did see something else besides the microscopic dotted line—that, instead of anything like concealing or not knowing of the broad "strong red line," he proclaimed it aloud; and that his proclamation of it was the first announcement to the Senate of the line on this map corresponding with the line alluded to by Mr. Sparks. The first intimation to the Senate of the existence of that line on this map was made by him to the Senate—and that loudly, so that every one could hear it. The first intimation did not come from any other person. He had stated this yesterday. The Senator from Virginia did not then reply to this assertion. He took twenty-four hours to consider the matter, and now he came forward with opinions and inferences to answer facts. His (Mr. B.'s) assertions were of facts, and nothing but facts. He was met with nothing but assertions of opinion and inferences.

Mr. RIVES said the controversy between him and the Senator from Missouri was, as the Senator stated, as to a question of fact; and he did not mean, any more than the Senator, that the attention of the Senate should be diverted from what was the true and material question of fact between them, by any special pleading. That question was—for what purpose did the Senator from Missouri produce the map from Mr. Jefferson's collection, in executive session? He says it was to prove that Mr. Sparks's map was no secret, by producing a map from Mr. Jefferson's collection corresponding with it. On the contrary, I asserted, as I believed, that the Senator produced the map from Mr. Jefferson's collection to contradict and falsify Mr. Sparks's map, by exhibiting one of superior authenticity, which he supposed to conflict with it; but which, when examined, turned out to sustain it by a most remarkable coincidence. Having always supposed that this was the real object of the Senator from Missouri, in the production of the map from Mr. Jefferson's collection, in which he had signally failed in the view of the whole Senate at the time, I felt and expressed great surprise, as mentioned by the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. WALKER,] that, in the printed speech of the Senator from Missouri, a different turn had been given to the affair; and if there seemed as if the sole object of the Senator, in producing the map from Mr. Jefferson's collection, was to show that Mr. Sparks's map was no secret, and that one exactly like it had long existed in the public Library of Congress! Now, sir, this was all new to me, and I supposed it to be so to the Senate. This, then, is the only material point at issue. The Senator from Missouri, however, chooses to take out a solitary sentence from my speech, separating it entirely from the context, and insists upon reading, in a literal sense, a figurative expression relative to a subordinate and immaterial circumstance. I will recite the whole paragraph, as it stands in the speech, to the Senate:

"A map has been vauntingly paraded here, from Mr. Jefferson's collection, in the zeal of opposition, (without taking time to see what it was,) to confront and invalidate the map found by Mr. Sparks in the Foreign Office at Paris; but, the moment it is examined, it is found to sustain, by the most precise and remarkable correspondence in every feature, the map communicated by Mr. Sparks. The Senator who produced it, could see nothing but the microscopic dotted line running off in a northeasterly direction; but the moment other eyes were applied to it, there was found, in bold relief, a strong red line, indicating the limits of the United States according to the treaty of peace, and coinciding, minutely and exactly, with the boundary traced on the map of Mr. Sparks. That this red line, and not the hardly visible dotted line, was intended to represent the limits of the United States according to the treaty of peace, is conclusively shown by the circumstance, that the red line is drawn on the map all around the exterior boundary of the United States;—through the middle of the Northern Lakes, thence through the Long Lake and the Rainy Lake to the Lake of the Woods; and from the western extremity of the Lake of the Woods to the river Mississippi; and along that river to the point where the boundary of the United States, according to the treaty of peace, leaves it; and thence, by its easterly course, to the mouth of the St. Mary's, on the Atlantic."

Now, sir, what is the plain gist and substance of this paragraph? Why, that the Senator had, in the zeal of opposition at the moment, produced the map from Mr. Jefferson's collection, to "confront and invalidate" Mr. Sparks's map, which, however, upon examination, sustained it by a most remarkable and striking coincidence: that the Senator disregarded the strong red line, and fixed upon a microscopic dotted line, running off in a northeasterly direction, as intended to represent the true boundary; but that, in fact, the red line, and not the microscopic dotted line, was intended by the constructor of the map to represent the limits of the United States, according to the treaty of peace; and this I proceeded to show, by the face of the map itself. The Senator contends that he did see the red line, and announced it to the Senate while I was upon the floor in the midst of my speech. Now, I have only to say, that, if he did so, I did not hear it; and it is not remarkable, under the circumstances, that I did not. But, sir, did not the Senator do all he could to discredit, to hold for naught—in effect to obliterate, to expunge the red line as the boundary intended by the constructor of the map? Why did the Senator speak of it as a colored demarcation, which any school miss might have made? Did not the Senator from Missouri earnestly insist that the "microscopic dotted line," and not the red line, was intended to represent the true boundary? And upon this point, I would appeal distinctly to the recollection of the Senator from Mississippi. [Mr. WALKER, from his seat, said he did.]

In regard to the material fact of the purpose for which the Senator from Missouri produced the map from Mr. Jefferson's collection, I understand the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WALKER] to have already stated the concurrence of his recollection with my own, to wit: that the map was produced to rebut and falsify Mr. Sparks's map, and not to prove that Mr. Sparks's map was no secret. The Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN,] who took a distinguished part in the proceedings on the treaty, and who, in his printed speech, has referred to the same subject, yesterday stated to the Senate that his recollection and impression of the occurrence, in regard to every material fact, concur entirely with the representation I have given of it. So far as has yet appeared, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAPPAN] is the only member of the Senate whose impression of the transaction seems to concur throughout with the version the Senator from Missouri has given to it. There are obvious reasons why Senators should not find it very agreeable to make themselves volunteer parties to a controversy of this sort. I can only say, that I have not conversed with a single one of them (and I have conversed with many, since the discussion of yesterday) who does not bear out my recollection as to every material fact of the case, going to demonstrate the object with which the Senator from Missouri produced the map from

Mr. Jefferson's collection, in secret session, and his signal failure in that object, which made too strong a sensation in the Senate chamber at the time, to be readily forgotten by any who were witnesses of the scene. The Senate, in whose presence this transaction passed, are the only competent triers of the fact; and to their conscious knowledge and recollection of what occurred, I leave, with unshaken confidence, the justification, in every material particular, of the representation I have given.

Mr. BENTON. I will bring this matter to a point. I will not make a speech about opinions. I want the facts only. The Senate will recollect that, at the time of the occurrence about these maps, I had not spoken on the subject of the treaty. It was the next day that I made my argument. So that, so far from its being part of that argument, the argument itself was not made till the day after the occurrence. When the Senator from Virginia had gone through his exposition, and produced what he called our attention to as a grand secret of state, the moment I heard what it was, I proclaimed the red lines on this map. I said aloud, "Here are your red lines—it is no secret at all." Yes, sir, I proclaimed it from my seat—"Here are your red lines." And so identical were they in both maps, that I could not but think, for some time, they were the same. I did produce the map to rebut Mr. Sparks. First, to show that his grand state secret was no secret at all; and, next, to show that there was no evidence in it that Doctor Franklin drew the red line which Sparks relied upon as his. Any schoolboy or girl might make it was well as Dr. Franklin. I did produce the map to destroy the inferences drawn by Mr. Sparks; to show that his secret was no secret; and that there was not a particle of evidence in it that Dr. Franklin ever knew anything about it. I do not complain of gentlemen entertaining opinions or drawing inferences; but I do complain of statements being made as facts, which are the reverse of facts; and to keep to this point I shall read again the words in the printed speech of the Senator from Virginia. They are:

"The Senator who produced it [the map] could see nothing but the microscopic dotted line running off in a northeasterly direction; but the moment other eyes were applied to it, there was found, in bold relief, a strong red line indicating the limits of the United States, according to the treaty of peace, and coinciding minutely and exactly with the boundary traced on the map of Mr. Sparks."

Here is the point of which I do complain—that I could not, or would not, see the "strong red line;" but could, and did, see the microscopic dotted line, which I pressed upon the Senate as the true boundary, concealing the "strong red line." I complain of the assertion for fact, that not until "other eyes" were applied to the map, was it discovered that a "strong red line" was on it, corroborating the line on Sparks's map. Now, on this question of fact, I appealed yesterday to forty-eight Senators, who were present on the occasion, that I was the first to proclaim from my table, "Here are your red lines." On this question of fact, I stated yesterday, in the presence of those forty-eight Senators, who must know the truth, that I took my stand; and I will not now be driven from it. I stand now, as well as then, on the question of fact, that I did not wait for "other eyes" to see this "strong red line." These are questions of fact on which I take my stand; and nothing that has yet been said can drive me from it.

Mr. RIVES said he certainly did not deem it necessary to say anything further upon the subject. The Senator from Missouri must know that they were speaking in the presence of gentlemen who were well aware of all the circumstances. His (Mr. R.'s) belief was, that his representation of the transaction was thoroughly borne out. If the Senate would not decide between them, the Senator must be left to entertain his own opinion.

Mr. BENTON. I will read the words over again. I stick to the words, sir:

"The Senator who produced it [the map] could see nothing but the microscopic dotted line running off in a northeasterly direction; but the moment other eyes were applied to it, there was found, in bold relief, a strong red line, indicating the limits of the United States according to the treaty of peace, and coinciding minutely and exactly with the boundary traced on the map of Mr. Sparks."

Mr. RIVES. Will the Senator be so good as to read the whole paragraph from the beginning?

Mr. BENTON. I make no complaint about that part. I complain only of the assertion in the part I have read, and that assertion I deny. Yes, sir, I deny the assertion. I deny it in the presence of forty-eight Senators, who know——

The CHAIR interposed to say that the whole of this was quite irregular.

Some indications of a desire to continue the controversy were manifested; but the Chair called the Senate to order by the usual knocking of the hammer on the table, and other business proceeded.

INDEMNITY FOR FRENCH SPOLIATIONS.

Mr. ARCHER, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to which numerous memorials upon the subject had been referred, reported a bill to settle the claims for French spoliations committed prior to 1800; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

OREGON BILL.

The bill to authorize the adoption of measures for the occupation and settlement of the Territory of Oregon, for extending certain portions of the laws of the United States over the same, and for other purposes, was taken up for the purpose of receiving its third reading.

Mr. CALHOUN remarked that this was a bill which involved the most important consequences; and it was of the utmost importance, therefore, that it should be examined with great care, to see whether its provisions accorded with existing treaty stipulations.

Mr. LINN remarked that the bill did not conflict with treaty stipulations.

Mr. CALHOUN further remarked, that its provisions should be examined with great care, and compared with treaty stipulations. In the negotiations which led to the conclusion of the treaty, there was correspondence of great ability, which went fully into the subject; and he, for one, was desirous to look a little more into that correspondence before giving his vote for that bill. He would, therefore, either move to lay the bill on the table, or to fix a day for its consideration, as might best suit the wishes of the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. LINN.]

Mr. LINN said he would prefer that the bill should be passed over informally. He disliked the fixing of any particular day for its consideration, because other business would be almost certain to get precedence over it.

It was finally agreed, however, that its consideration should be postponed until Monday next.

The bill for the relief of Benjamin Murphy was then read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BAYARD, the Senate then proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and, after some time spent therein,

Adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, January 5, 1843.

Mr. A. C. DODGE offered the following resolution, which was adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Territories be instructed to inquire into the expediency and necessity of so amending the act approved 29th of August last, entitled "An act to provide for the settlement of certain accounts for the support of Government in the Territory of Wisconsin," &c., as to authorize the Legislatures of the respective Territories of the United States to employ a sufficient number of officers and assistants for the transaction of the public business, and to regulate their per diem compensation so that it shall not, in the aggregate, exceed the sum of three dollars per day to each, and that they report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. HOPKINS asked and obtained leave to withdraw, from the files of the House, the papers of Sally McCraw, of Grayson county, Virginia, praying to be allowed a pension; which, upon his motion, was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.

He also offered a resolution directing the same committee to inquire into the expediency and propriety of reporting a bill for the relief of the heirs of William Howell, for his services in the war of the Revolution; which was agreed to, and the papers accompanying it were also referred.

Mr. MARCHAND presented a petition of J. M. Carpenter and 108 citizens of Pennsylvania, for the repeal of the bankrupt law.

THE APPORTIONMENT ACT.

Mr. J. CAMPBELL introduced a bill to suspend the operation of the 2d section of the act for the apportionment of Representatives in Congress, according to the sixth census.

The bill was twice read, as follows:

A BILL to suspend the operation of the second section of the act entitled "An act for the apportionment of Representatives among the several States, according to the sixth census."

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the operation of the second section of the act entitled "An act for the apportionment of Representatives among the several States, according to the sixth census," approved June 25, 1842, be, and the same is hereby, suspended, so far as the same may affect the election of any person who has been, or may be, chosen to serve as a Representative in the twenty-eighth Congress.

Mr. J. CAMPBELL hoped it would now be engrossed and passed. [Cries of "No."] He moved that it be printed.

Mr. BARNARD moved to refer the bill to the Committee of Elections.

Mr. J. CAMPBELL said he should like to submit a few remarks upon the bill. [Cries of "No."]

The bill was then ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee of Elections.

Mr. CROSS introduced a bill supplementary to an act entitled "An act to settle the title to certain tracts of land in the State of Arkansas, approved 11th August, 1842;" which was twice read, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. R. W. THOMPSON offered the following resolution, which was adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee on Revolutionary Claims be instructed to inquire into the expediency of allowing to the heirs of George Yates, deceased, compensation for his services as a surgeon's mate in the war of the Revolution.

Mr. HALSTED introduced a bill "to regulate the mode of taking testimony in contested elections, and for other purposes." Read twice, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

DUELLING IN THE NAVY.

Mr. STRATTON offered the following resolution, which was adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reporting a bill for the suppression of duelling in the navy.

Mr. M. A. COOPER introduced a bill to authorize the issuing of a land patent to John H. Howard; which was twice read, and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

PUBLICATION OF THE ACTS OF CONGRESS.

Mr. W. W. IRWIN offered the following resolution, which was adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary inquire into the expediency of repealing so much of the 21st section of the act of Congress, approved 26th August, 1842, entitled "An act making appropriation for such necessary objects as have been usually included in the general appropriation bills, without authority of law, and to fix and provide for certain incidental expenses of the departments and offices of the Government, and for other purposes," as prohibits the Secretary of State from publishing the laws of the United States in any newspaper except those published in the city of Washington; and that said committee also inquire into the expediency of providing by law for a more extensive publication of the acts and resolutions of Congress, in the English and German languages.

MAIL ROUTE IN NORTH CAROLINA.

Mr. GRAHAM moved the following resolution; which was adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a mail route from Rutherfordton, by the Ready Patch Gap and Edneyville, to Hendersonville, in North Carolina.

Mr. CUSHING objected to further business of this sort.

The committees were then called on for reports.

Mr. JAMES COOPER, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported a bill for the relief of George C. Johnson: read twice, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. READ, from the Committee on Military Affairs, made sundry adverse reports.

Mr. EVERETT called for the consideration of the bill to repeal the bankrupt act, and expressed the hope that the House would come to a vote to-day.

The SPEAKER said the business of the morning hour was first in order, and the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. GWIN] was entitled to the floor.

GENERAL JACKSON'S FINE.

The House resumed the consideration of the resolution of the gentleman from New York [Mr. BOWNE] directing the Committee of the Whole to report the bill to refund the fine imposed on Gen. Andrew Jackson in 1815, together with an amendment thereto by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BARNARD]

Mr. GWIN, who held the floor from yesterday, addressed the House in favor of the resolution.

Mr. G. said that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. MERIWETHER] had declared his intention to vote for the bill to repay, with interest, the fine imposed on General Jackson at New Orleans, by Judge Hall. The gentleman also invoked action on the bill this session. He (Mr. G) was glad to hear that the gentleman from Georgia would not only vote for the bill, but urge early action upon it. He hoped the gentleman's zeal would not abate under the influence of party drill; for such certainly were not the feelings or intentions of his party associates on this floor. He (Mr. G.) was of opinion that the dominant party in this House intended to give the go-by to the bill; and, for that reason, he had urged the gentleman from New York [Mr. BOWNE] to introduce the resolution now under discussion. It was a resolution of instruction, which could, by a call of the yeas and nays, test the sense of the House whether there should be action on this subject this session or not. His reason for believing that no action would be had on the bill this session, was founded upon the manner in which the go-by was given to it at the last session of Congress. The subject had been referred to the Judiciary Committee at an early period of the session. Before action could be had upon it in committee, a member from Ohio [Mr. MEDILL] had to move instructions, by a resolution similar to the one now under consideration. The resolution was not adopted; but it brought the bill out of committee, and it was referred to the Committee of the Whole. There it was permitted to sleep for three months. At length, after every important public bill had been disposed of, he (Mr. G.) had tried, from day to day, to get this bill up in committee for consideration; but the majority pertinaciously refused to take it up. He at length, to test the sense of the House, moved to make it the special order, and called the yeas and nays. A majority of the members present voted to make it the special order; but not two-thirds, as required by the rule; and his motion was lost. But in five minutes, (the House having resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole,) he was able to catch the chairman's eye, and moved to take up the bill. The majority on yeas and nays, that had existed but a few minutes before, suddenly vanished, when the only test of their sincerity was a vote by tellers; and he failed to get it off the table. Well, sir, how stands the question now? The President has recommended to Congress to pass a bill refunding that money to General Jackson. Instead of referring that portion of the message to the Committee of the Whole, (where the bill of the last session now is,) it was, by a party vote, referred to the Judiciary Committee. What had been the action of the committee on the subject he had no means of knowing. He had inquired of a member of the committee, and learned that it was in the keeping of a member now absent from the city, and there was no telling when the committee would act upon it. Under these circumstances, the subject had been brought before the House in its present form, to ascertain whether it was the wish of a majority to consider the subject this session, or give it the go-by, as was done at the last. From the remarks of the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. MERIWETHER,] he had some hopes that the bill would not only be acted on, but passed. He (Mr. G.) had a few words to say in reply to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. UNDERWOOD.] That gentleman had referred to an anonymous publication that had appeared in a Kentucky paper, over the signature of "A Kentuckian," reviewing the declaration of martial law at New Orleans by General Jackson. The gentleman from Kentucky vouches for the correctness of this publication so far as it refers to Gen. Jackson, and says the writer is a gentleman of high standing and fine talents. The gentleman also referred to a letter, written recently by General Jackson, pronouncing many of the statements of this writer, in regard to his acts and conversations at New Orleans, false. But for the endorsement given by the gentleman from Kentucky to this anonymous writer's statements, and the eulogy he had passed upon him, he would not at this time have alluded to them, being willing to leave the author and his statements where General Jackson had placed them. As the gentleman from Kentucky had introduced the subject into the House, and as these numbers, signed "A Kentuckian," had been published in a pamphlet form, and placed on the table of every member, he (Mr. G.) thought he was justified in referring to it, and showing to the House that the writer was entirely mistaken in some of the facts he had relied on to support his attack upon General Jackson. In the first place, he had asserted that Gen. Jackson "had proclaimed martial law, and caused it to be enforced upon the members of the Legislature, by either thrusting them out, or keeping them out, of their legislative halls by an armed force." This is not true. Nothing of the kind occurred.

Again, he says: "That the order for the arrest, although made on the day of publication, was not executed until the 6th. On the 5th, Judge Hall, of the United States court, acting upon misinformation as to his being then under arrest, issued a writ of habeas corpus to have him brought before the court. Finding, on a renewal of the application next day, that the writ had been prematurely issued, and never acted on, the Judge, for the purpose of saving the trouble of writing a new order, and for no other conceivable motive, altered the date of the order to the 6th, and redelivered it to the officers." Here (said Mr. G) is a tissue of errors—to apply no harsher epithet to them. Louallier was arrested on the 5th of March. The petition for the writ of habeas corpus was made out on that day. It was granted on the same day, the Judge instructing Louallier's attorney to notify General Jackson that he had applied for the writ. The attorney accordingly wrote to the General on the same day, (the 5th,) notifying him of his application for the writ. On the same day, Judge Hall was arrested. After his arrest, General Jackson learned that the Judge had mutilated the record in the case, by altering the date of the petition for the writ made by Louallier's attorney, as well as his own order. He sent for the clerk, and asked him if this was true. The clerk answered in the affirmative, produced the papers which he had in his pocket, and showed the alterations. This was on the 5th of March; and the petition for the writ of habeas corpus, and the order of the Judge granting it, were altered to the 6th; thus showing that it was the intention of Judge Hall to make it appear, from the record, that he was arrested on the 5th for an act not performed until the day after. Let the motive of Judge Hall be judged of leniently or harshly, there is no doubt but he committed forgery in altering the date of the petition, even supposing he had the right to alter the date of his own order.

The writer goes on to say that an order was also issued for the arrest of Judge Lewis and Mr. Dick, the United States attorney; that Dick was arrested, but Lewis, from some unexplained cause, was not. This is, no doubt, an error also. He (Mr. G.) had had occasion to examine the documents connected with this case, with some care; and he never before heard of the arrest of Dick, or the intention to arrest Judge Lewis.

The writer further states, that "on this same 6th of March, General Jackson wrote to the British commander, notifying him that he had received information of the ratification of the treaty of peace." This is not true. General Jackson never wrote such a letter to the British commander, nor did he receive notice of the ratification of the treaty until the 13th of March. He also alludes to a publication made at the time by Judge Hall, and makes quotations from it. Such publication may have been made, but he never heard of it before. He would make no further reference to the errors in fact in this publication. His only motive for alluding to it at all, was to counteract any impression that might be made upon any member of the House from the endorsement of the gentleman from Kentucky, whose high standing in the House for integrity and honor none acknowledged more cheerfully than he (Mr. G.) did.

In conclusion, (Mr. G. said,) he was indifferent as to the disposition the House made of the resolution. The object of the friends of the bill would be accomplished, if it should be speedily brought before the House for its action.

Mr. CUSHING said he had regretted to perceive, in the course of the conversation, rather than the debate, which had taken place on this subject, the least possible indications of any tendency to refer this question to party or personal controversies. He equally regretted to perceive mere technical questions—he meant questions appertaining to legal disputes which had occurred in Louisiana at the time of these incidents—that they should in like manner be deemed material to the question which arose on this bill, or the resolution of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BOWNE] He thought the question invoked the House to regard it under an aspect far more interesting to them, and with reference to considerations which he should hope would preclude division in that House, and lead to unanimity of opinion on the subject of the bill. He could not but recall to mind that they were then on the eve of the anniversary of that victory of New Orleans—one of the greatest events in the history of our country; and which (whatever might be the differences of opinion in regard to personal incidents in the event—whatever questions there might be in regard to the political views of him who was the hero of that day) was an event which covers the name of our country with imperishable laurels; and he would it were possible for that House and for that Congress (if that bill were to be passed, as he hoped it would) to cast aside all the lesser considerations on which he had touched, to take up the bill in Committee of the Whole, to pass it, and to make the anniversary of the victory of New Orleans a day to be sanctified, in the action of this House, by a restoration of the amount of that fine to Andrew Jackson. [Cries of "Good."] And he intended to propose to the House (if they were ready to welcome and act on such a proposition) a method by which the subject might be accomplished; for there were many of them there—it might be a majority of that House—who had had occasion to condemn certain of the administrative acts of that individual. But he had ceased to be the President of the United States—he was no longer the director of the administration of this country—he had passed from the theatre of public action here, to be an historical personage, not only in this country, but in the eyes of the world.

It seemed to him that it became them to regard that man, and to regard this measure, above all things, in relation to an historical personage and to the honor of the country as connected with that great event, and not in regard to the changeful vicissitudes that might embarrass the mind, arouse the passions, or gather around him either the reproach or applause of the transitory party passions of the hour; for there was one thing which was remarkable in that, and another incident in the recent history of our country, that signalized it to the world. Let the House cast its recollections back to the commencement of the twenty-five years' war which burst upon the world with the French Revolution. Look at the history of England during those twenty-five years; pass upon the events of the victorious career of that great power; and remember, whether in the East or in the West—in Asia, in Africa, or in Europe—that the whole career of that great power during the whole of those twenty-five years was one of almost unchecked victory and glory. On the ocean, there were the victories of Trafalgar, and Copenhagen, and the Nile, to show that wherever, in the seas of Europe, a British fleet encountered her enemy, it was to add new splendor and lustre to the cross of St. George. Follow her on land. It was not merely on the plains of India—it was not merely where Wellesley led his countrymen to victory on the field of Hindoo Assaye; but go to Europe, and they would find that, although there might have been trifling reverses—although it might have happened (as in the occupation of the Scheldt) an English enterprise on the continent might have failed—although, as in the retreat of Corunna, it might have happened that English arms met with partial reverses,—yet even there, over the grave of the gallant Sir John Moore, it was not a defeat—it was a retreat, to be sure, of English forces from before the French; but it was a successful retreat. But in France, in India, in the Netherlands, wherever the English met the enemy in battle, it was to triumph. But to this picture of the successes of English arms, there was a class of signal exceptions. There occurred a crisis when the English arms were to encounter American arms, as well on sea as on land; when the Anglo Irish blood—for gentlemen erred in talking so much of Anglo-Saxon blood—it was the Anglo-Irish blood—the mingled stream of Celt, Roman, Saxon, and Norman blood—that changed the picture.

On the coast of the United States, on the Atlantic ocean, when the English ships encountered American ships on equal terms, the lustre of the cross of St. George "paled its ineffectual fire" before the stars and stripes of the Union. And on the land there was, he believed, but one example in the world, during that period, of an English army surrendering to another—of the English army, with its banners and forces, surrendering itself to a foreign foe—and that was, in the battle of the Thames, under the command of the sainted William Henry Harrison. There was another though—not of the surrender of forces as prisoners of war to the enemy; yet a gallant British army, one of the best appointed that ever sailed from Europe for America—the conquerors of Salamanca and Vittoria—met in the lines at New Orleans the militia of Louisiana, and the riflemen of Tennessee and Kentucky; and were crushed, and conquered, and slaughtered, in the face of an American army.

Those were great events in the history of our own country and of the world; that was a splendid era on the pages of our history; and on the approach of the anniversary of the victory of New Orleans, he hoped this House would pay a tribute of respect to the day and to the events; and not merely to the man who commanded, but to the men who fought and conquered on that day, and whose power, and gallantry, and courage were but concentrated and embodied in him who led them on that day to victory. It was with these views, regardless of all the other elements of strife and the technical objections, that he desired this bill to be taken up, in order that, if the Senate concurred, the bill might be passed in anticipation of the 8th of January.

Mr. C. H. WILLIAMS obtained permission to make a single remark, the purport of which did not reach the reporter's desk.

Mr. CUSHING then moved to amend the resolution of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BOWNE,] by striking out all after the word 'resolved,' and inserting a substitute which he had provided, to terminate all debate in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union on bill No. 503, entitled "A bill for the relief of General Andrew Jackson," at 2 o'clock to-morrow, when the committee should act on all the amendments that might be proposed and pending. And, further, he moved the previous question, as there was but little time to be spared ere the termination of the present session.

Mr. ARNOLD hoped the gentleman from Massachusetts would not press this resolution under a gag law.

Mr. CUSHING said if this resolution should prevail, he should move, to-morrow, to go into Committee of the Whole on that bill.

Some conversation ensued, in which Mr. PENDLETON, Mr. CUSHING, Mr. BOTTS, and the SPEAKER took part.

Mr. ADAMS said he hoped, whatever motion his colleague might make in relation to this resolution, he would not accompany it with a motion for the previous question.

The SPEAKER said the gentleman [Mr. CUSHING] could not accompany his amendment with such a motion.

Mr. CUSHING had so understood the Speaker, and had changed his motion accordingly.

Mr. ADAMS said he did not before know that his colleague had fallen in love with "the gag;" nor did he [Mr. ADAMS] feel inclined to have "the gag" on this subject.

He then proceeded to comment on remarks which had been made in relation to this bill not being a party measure, and pointed to the debates and the proceedings in the Senate of the United States, and in State Legislatures, to show that the opposite of that assertion was the truth; particularly referring to the prime mover on this subject in the Legislature of New York, (Maj. Davezac,) who was neither Anglo-Saxon, Anglo-Irish, nor Anglo-Scotch; but a protégé of General Jackson of French origin, who introduced it as a Democratic measure, and as one of the first fruits of the Democratic triumph in the State of New York. He hoped this measure would not be allowed to pass in this House without a thorough discussion, even if it did transcend "the glorious 8th of January," which this year, (his colleague had forgotten to notice) was a day devoted to the worship and service of God; and, therefore, it was one on which this House would not be in session. But God forbid that he should say a word in disparagement of that day, or of the person to be honored and profited by this donation. If, however, a proposition was brought before this House to make a present to Andrew Jackson of $1000, as proposed by the bill which had been reported to that House, with interest on it from the month of March, 1815, there was but one consideration that would induce him to vote against it—and that was, he should not like to set the example of pensioning an ex-President of the United States, for that was the principle on which this bill was to be passed, if passed at all. The real object was to make a present to General Jackson in his latter days. He did not know what his circumstances were, [A voice: "Rich enough;"] but if they were such as to require it, (though he would not grant it as a pension or a gratuity for that service,) he would do what had been done before—he would make up a subscription among the members of Congress to make a present to the old man in his last days. It had been done before, and there was no disgrace in it; and if it were now done, that a donation might be made to General Andrew Jackson, he, for one, would take his share of it.

But he could not consent to employ the public money, in order to testify the approbation of the people of this country of those acts for which the sum of $1,000 was levied on him by the regular officers of the law, which he had violated in its tenderest parts. His colleague had changed entirely the issue upon the question in this bill. It was not to refund the fine imposed on the General for his imprisonment of a judge—for his causing a citizen of the United States to be jeoparded in his liberty and life, and for other acts subversive of law and justice; but for glorifying the battle of New Orleans. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. GWIN] had stated a number of facts in the pamphlet lately published on this subject, which were contradicted by General Jackson. If a bill were to pass, giving General Jackson money upon disputed facts, these facts should be previously cleared up. But he was speaking of the extraordinary circumstances under which this bill could be brought forward. A bill on the same subject was acted on in the Senate at the last session, and, after being amended so as to comprehend clearly the facts of the case, it was rejected by General Jackson's friends, because it did not contain a condemnation of the judge who imposed the fine; and, if he was not mistaken, he had seen a letter from General Jackson himself, in which he says that he would not have received a dollar unless the character of the judge was blasted. Such was the history of that proceeding at the last session of Congress. The bill was actually passed, or would have been passed; but was rejected by the General's friends coinciding with him, insisting that not only his character should be justified, but the character of the judge blasted. It was a very grave and serious question with him, whether the character of the judge should be censured and condemned by the Representatives of the people of this nation, for the purpose of making a donation to General Jackson. Perhaps he might express himself more strongly by saying that the bill ought not to pass; that if we are to give this donation to General Jackson, it was not by casting reproach upon a just and honorable judge, that we should do justice and vindicate the honor and glory of the country. Again: what were the grounds on which his colleague was pressing this bill? Why, the great and glorious victory of New Orleans. Because we whipped the British, that nobody else could whip—because of this great and glorious victory, this bill must be passed. That was the reason given by his colleague, and that was the reason why he wished the bill passed on the anniversary of the victory. That was not the question of justice involved in this grant—this donation. The victory of New Orleans undoubtedly was a great and glorious one, in which he took a just pride; but he could not, on account of that victory, sanction the acts alluded to in the Kentucky pamphlet, and which were there designated as treason. This reminded him of an anecdote he had heard many years ago of General Arnold, a man very celebrated in our revolutionary history. After his exploits here, Arnold went to England; and finding himself generally shunned there, he sought the society of the Americans whom he found in that country. Being in company with one of them whom he had known in this country, he asked him what the Americans would have done with him, had they caught him instead of Andre. The American answered him by saying, "We would have buried with the honors of war the leg that was mutilated in our service, and then we would have hung the remainder of your body." He should think that this sort of justice would be rather more complete than that of his colleague, who was for rewarding General Jackson for the battle of New Orleans, at the expense of law and justice. He wished to have this matter fully discussed when it came up, and deliberated on without any of your gag-laws, to stop the investigation of the principles involved in it.

If you pass this bill (said Mr. A.) it will not be for the honor and glory of the battle of New Orleans, but for the honor and glory of the exercise of despotic power over your own citizens; it would be for the exercise of the extreme of martial law, when there was no necessity for it. Mr. A. wished the subject discussed, because of this very pamphlet, to which their attention had been called by more than one of the members from Kentucky, and who stated the author to be a distinguished judge of high legal attainments, whose opinions were entitled to respect. In that pamphlet, he was charged with having given an opinion in relation to the power of a commanding general to declare martial law, that was utterly at variance with freedom and with the laws of nations; and he wished to have an opportunity of answering that charge. He wished to have an opportunity to explain and defend the opinions he had given, and to show what were his views of the laws of nations in regard to the power of a commanding general to declare martial law in time of an invasion.

The morning hour having expired, Mr. A. was cut short in his remarks, when he announced his intention of pursuing the subject further at the next opportunity.

Mr. CUSHING then offered a resolution that all debate on the bill in Committee of the Whole should cease at two o'clock to-morrow; and that the said committee should then proceed to act and vote on it, and upon all amendments that might be pending, and report the same to the House.

Mr. C. J. INGERSOLL offered an amendment, that the House should now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole, for the purpose of taking up the bill to refund the fine imposed on General Jackson.

Mr. CUSHING suggested to the gentleman that he could, at any time after taking the question on his (Mr. C.'s) motion, move to go into Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER suggested to the gentleman from Massachusetts that, as the bill had not yet been discussed in Committee of the Whole, his resolution was not in order. The gentleman could move to go into the Committee of the Whole, and then move to take up the bill, as the majority of the House could determine the order of business. The motion to go into Committee of the Whole, for the purpose of taking up a particular bill, would require a vote of two-thirds.

Mr. CUSHING then withdrew his motion, and moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and resulted in deciding the question in the negative—yeas 100, nays 106, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Arrington, Beeson, Bidlack, Black, Bowne, Boyd, Brewster, Aaron V. Brown, Milton Brown, Charles Brown, Burke, Patrick C. Mr. BIDLACK asked leave to present a resolution; but objection was made.

THE BANKRUPT ACT.

Mr. EVERETT called up the bill to repeal the bankrupt law, and expressed a hope that it would be carried through to its passage to day.

Mr. GORDON was entitled to the floor. He said it was quite common—nay, he might say, fashionable—in these days to define one's position. An undefined politician was an uncertain thing, [laughter,] and more like a ghost than anything human. He did not rise to define his position. A Democrat of the Jeffersonian school, dyed in the wool, needed no such clew to where he stood on the political chessboard. The people always knew where to find him. He would assist his colleague [Mr. BOWNE] to define his position; and, before he concluded, he should attempt to define the positions of some others on the floor, and of some public functionaries high in the confidence of this Administration.

His colleague stated: "we were told—and he also had it from some of his (Mr. B.'s) political friends on this floor—that the Administration of John Tyler was such, that no Democrat could accept an office under it."

It seemed, then, that his colleague had been talking about accepting office under this Administration, [laughter]—had been talking with his political friends on this floor about the acceptance of office from John Tyler. He should like to know if, at the expiration of the present Congress, he expected to receive an office? And this remark was to be considered as a feeler—put forth to see how such a thing would take here, and then how it would take among the people of his county. Again: his colleague said, "Some of the leading organs of the Democratic party held the same language; and, strange to say, in juxtaposition to a paragraph declaring that no Democrat could hold office under John Tyler, would be found another, declaring that the party could not support his Administration because it was surrounded by such men as Daniel Webster and John C. Spencer."

It was, then, very strange to his colleague that some of the Democratic organs should declare that the Democratic party could not support this Administration, because it was surrounded by such men as Webster and Spencer! It was not strange to him, (Mr. G.,) because the great Democratic party never held such opinions as those avowed by that man who recently declared in Faneuil Hall that he had not changed, but was a Massachusetts Whig, a Faneuil Hall Whig, and always meant to be. Here, then, was Daniel Webster unrenounced and unrenouncing, adhering to all the opinions he had ever advocated and avowed. A large portion of the people suspected Daniel Webster of holding opinions which sympathized with British interests. These suspicions were entertained during the last war, when General Jackson with his cannon was thundering at the gates of New Orleans, and when there were times that tried men's souls, and tested the energies of this Government. Yes, as long ago as these memorable times, Daniel Webster was suspected to be British at heart; and, by his own declaration, he had renounced none of his sentiments. Mr. Webster was now at the head of this Administration; and his colleague [Mr. BOWNE] avowed astonishment that certain organs of the Democratic party should declare that the Democratic party could not support this Administration! Since the return of Mr. Webster from England, the people had seen nothing in his course to make them believe he had changed his opinions.

Here Mr. BOWNE rose, and stated that he desired to make a correction of some of the remarks of his colleague.

The SPEAKER inquired whether the gentleman [Mr. GORDON] yielded the floor.

Mr. GORDON. No, sir. [Laughter, uproar, and confusion.]

Mr. BOWNE, as he took his seat, made a remark which could not be heard above the noise which prevailed.

Mr. GORDON resumed. As he was going on to say, since Mr. Webster's return from Europe the Democratic party had seen nothing to give them reason to believe that he had changed his opinions in any particular. In his course in relation to the affair of the burning of the Caroline, the remedial justice bill, the bankrupt law, the negotiation of the treaty with England—and, indeed, in all his acts, he had shown that the declaration made at Faneuil Hall was true to the letter.

Again: his colleague [Mr. BOWNE] said: "He yielded to none in his attachment to the principles of his party; yet, if attachment or non-attachment to men was necessary to secure the esteem of his fellows, he feared he should be thrown overboard." From this remark he (Mr. G.) understood that his colleague declared to his constituents, that if his non-attachment to Mr. Webster was to be the price of their esteem, he was willing to be thrown overboard! Such was a fair construction of his colleague's language. Now he would assure his colleague, that should he take Mr. Webster, changed or unchanged, and show a willingness to be attached to him, his constituents would most assuredly throw him overboard, with a millstone around his neck, that would sink him eternally; and the Democracy of the Union would look on and cry "Amen!" [Laughter, and cries of "Good."] But to quote his colleague again: "What, he asked, did the people care who was the President? What did the masses care about the man at the head of affairs, so that the Government was well administered?"

If this meant that the Democratic party were really to take Mr. Webster, provided he promised to administer the Government well, to navigate the ship of State as she ought to be—if it meant that, old as Daniel Webster was in political sin, his colleague was willing to take him as his candidate,—he would say that the people did care who was their President. They wished to know a man beforehand, when he aspired to that office. They wished to know everything about his public and private history—yes, his private history—before they would allow him to be brought on the course. No beardless boy could reach that high and responsible post by the suffrages of the people. It must be filled by men of high character and fixed principles—men known to the nation as such. The Democratic party never had taken up a Federalist and placed him in the Presidency, and he trusted they never would. When they did so, they would cease to be Democrats.

But his colleague said he cared not who was President; that he was bred a Federalist; that he was a Federalist after he had attained his majority; that he did not enter into political life until he was twenty-four years of age, when he began to think for himself, and renounced his Federalism. How many months elapsed before this result took place he did not know, but he came out a bright and shining Democrat!

Now he (Mr. G.) never had doubted that a man's first love was the strongest. "The dog will return to his vomit, and the sow to her wallow." [Laughter.] Old Federalists were not to be trusted in the highest and most responsible stations. But gentlemen said that the Democratic party admitted all who came into their fold. True; he admitted that the Democratic church was catholic, and that it asked all to come up to the polls and vote. It preached its doctrine to all the world. It excluded none from within its pale. It invited all to come forward and partake. But no man who had not received the laying on of hands by the bishop, was allowed to serve at its altar. [Laughter.] And least of all would it permit an old priest, toward the end of his days, to come out, doff his settled opinions, renounce his Presbyterianism, and assume its mitres and consecrated robes. [Laughter.]

Yes, the gentleman said he had more feeling on this subject than men in general, because he was bred up in a Federal school. He, however, became a Democrat when he attained his majority; but his sympathies were with the old Federalists, and he would not care who was the President of the United States. He believed he had enabled his colleague most satisfactorily to define his position, though he believed it was an isolated position in which he could neither get Democrat nor Whig to join with him.

Some member suggested "the guard."

Mr. GORDON said he had nothing to do with the guard. God forbid he should have anything to do with it, or with "the Captain" either. He meant that he should never join the guard; but as it took two to play at foils, whenever the guard resorted to a game of that sort, he should not be backward. He (Mr. G.) was a plain man, and when he spoke, he spoke his plain honest sentiments, whether they pleased or displeased the guard or anybody else.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CUSHING] declared in his speech—and gentlemen would know who he meant when he read it—that it would not be for the political interests of any party to carry on a ferocious war against the Administration and its friends. Well, one of the friends of the Administration was Daniel Webster, and he hoped there were but few Democrats on that floor or elsewhere that would cease to wage war against Daniel Webster so long as he remained in his present high and dangerous position—a position that was dangerous to the principles of Democracy. He hoped there would be few traitors or cowards found in their ranks, who would ground their arms to him. But what was waging war against the Administration? Did it mean opposition to the exchequer? Was that the meaning of it? Was it voting against a bill that might be brought up there, with a recommendation from the White House? And were they to be denounced for voting against a bill which had neither their nor their constituents' confidence? Was the voting against such a bill a waging war against the Administration? He should like to know what waging war against the Administration meant, if it did not mean that. And if that was a warring against the Administration, if he did not mistake the signs of the times, they would have war; a war to the knife, and the knife to the hilt; for he did not believe that a Government bank, or any exchequer plan with power to issue Government paper as the currency of the country, would any more meet with their approbation and their friendship, than if they had brought in a bill to re-incorporate the old United States Bank; for a Government bank was far more dangerous than an incorporation of individuals—for they had there the purse and the sword united—the money power and the political power, and "the fixed fact" of the Constitution combined. The "fixed fact" would be formidable indeed, if Congress should pass a Government bank to transact not only the concerns of the Government of this growing people but the concerns of the people themselves. He understood from the speech of Mr. Webster, delivered at Faneuil Hall, that he approbated this exchequer plan—that he was in favor of it, if he were not its author; and here, then, they saw the danger of such men as that being in the Cabinet, getting the ear of the President, and dispensing the stars and garters. It was an all-important fact, that he who recommended the exchequer plan to the President as a Government bank—that a functionary who through his whole life had advocated a strong consolidated Government—who had even been British in his notions of a Government—who, when he could not get a national bank, which was ten fold more dangerous to the liberties of the people and of the country, for it was a much stronger instrument in his hand—was the prime minister to carry out his plans of a consolidated Government. Why, when the sub-treasury was first brought forward, it was expressly charged that it was a Government bank in disguise; they put the administration then in power on the defensive on that subject, and it gave them great trouble to get rid of the charge, and to convince the people that it was not a Government bank in disguise. The Democrats denied that it was; and they struck out everything which could furnish a pretence for such an accusation. But now, when this prime minister was warm in his seat, and recommended this plan to Congress, if they were not to pass it, they would be "warring with the Administration," and would come in collision with "the fixed fact." When such threats were made, and such consequences were to follow, it was time that every Democrat should take his stand, and define his position, if any doubt hung over him. The design was formed to overthrow the Democratic party by divisions—he cared not where the project came from; but the Democrats would soon hold their national convention—when they would select, from the two prominent men now before the nation, one to be their candidate: and the Democratic party would not then be either terrified or cajoled—they would stand up to the rack, fodder or no fodder. Post offices over the country were to be used to buy up the Democracy, and to scatter the apple of discord amongst the party, to break it to pieces; but they who thus calculated to corrupt the people, must be steeped to the lips in corruption themselves.

Now, over President Tyler himself there rested a very strong suspicion. He was bred up a Democrat; he was nurtured in the true faith, to which he (Mr. G.) doubted not he would return before he died. He (Mr. G.) hoped, before he went out of power, he would return to his first love. But he was under strong suspicion; and it would take a great deal of whitewashing, and a great deal of repentance, and a great many good deeds, to recommend him to the Democrats, so that he could not only enter the broad door of their church, walk down its aisle, and take his position in their pulpit. [Laughter.] He might come to hear their preaching; but, before he could be allowed to preach himself, he had got to atone for all his political errors. When first they found him, he was running on the Coon ticket as Vice President; and he could tell them the Democracy did not like that very well, for many reasons. They did not like him, because he had such a man as Daniel Webster for his prime minister—a man who came out, and declared on Long Island, at a clambake, and in Virginia, beneath an October sun, and in the face of Virginians, that he was a Jeffersonian Democrat—which the people of the North did not believe, if the Virginians did. And what next? Why, when by authority of the Constitution he came to the executive chair, he found Daniel Webster his prime minister, appointed by his immediate predecessor; and he retained that man in power, and has done so ever since—a man who had been the means of recommending measures to this Congress that the Democrats never did nor could approve of. There were many other things that he must account for, and atone for, too, before he could expect to be the candidate of the Democracy. But there was the "fixed fact," and intimations were thrown out that he was to be the candidate, nolens volens. But how was that to be done? Why, an outcry was got up against party. The organs of the Administration out of doors, and the new-fledged friends and followers of the Administration on that floor, had been crying out against party, and deprecating party spirit. And why this outcry against party? Was it not because the Administration party was not very respectable in point of numerical strength, and that, by crying out against party, they hoped to break down both parties, that of the disjointed materials they might make up a party for the Administration? But what would be the consequence attendant on success? Would not the outs wage war against the ins? The country would again be divided between two great parties, and measures would be made a test between them, whatever those measures might be—whether strong government or representative government, consolidated government or confederated government. To this it would come in the end. He could regard this outcry against party only as evidence of a design to break down all parties, and to remodel a new one. He had understood that this Administration took great credit for the overthrow of the Whig party in the contest of 1842; but he was not willing to give the Administration all the credit they ask on this head. He knew the Secretary of War wrote a celebrated letter to somebody in the State of New York, just on the eve of the election. He knew, also, that that man [Mr. Spencer] was not without sagacity. The Secretary saw that the Democracy of the Empire State were aroused; that they had returned to their "sober second thought;" and that Whigery, in the States where the elections had then been held, was swept where his colleague wanted to go—"overboard;" [laughter;] and to acquire the credit of that mighty triumph, and drag the Democracy in the tail of this Administration, the victory was claimed as theirs. But let him tell that House that, instead of doing them good, it was a positive injury to the Democratic party; for it had lost them two Representatives in the Congress of the United States. That letter produced a prodigious action in the State of New York; and it awoke the Whigs somewhat from their apathy and slumber; and he (Mr. G.) declared in his place before that House, as the conviction of his judgment, that that letter did them no good, but, on the contrary, a positive injury; and that the Whigs were under some obligation and a debt of gratitude to Mr. Spencer for writing and publishing it; for they had obtained two Representatives more in the next Congress than they would have had without it. And it was very natural that it should be so. So sudden was the change, and so unexpected to them—after he wrote the call for the Whig convention at Syracuse to denounce Captain Tyler—was his acceptance of office under that Administration, that, when he wrote and published his letter in defence of that Administration, a tremendous excitement was produced, and energetic action on the part of the Whigs; and, as a consequence, they gained two members more than they would otherwise have had in the next Congress.

He (Mr. GORDON) deemed it his duty to the Democracy thus to undeceive the public mind respecting the supposed effect of that letter. With regard to the ability of Mr. Spencer to transact the duties of his office as Secretary of War, he had no doubt. He did not believe there was another man to be found within the borders of the United States that was better able to despatch business than he was; and if they would only chalk out the business for him to do, he would labor day and night to accomplish it; but, as a political leader, he was without sagacity, and he cared not for the world, provided he could gratify his ambition. He had been long in office in the State of New York, where he had belonged to one party, but now he belonged to another—the Webster party at the seat of the General Government.

But to return. The President was a queer character. He had a Secretary of the Navy who was the true personification of a Virginia abstraction, and who, when he came into office, had no sort of qualification for the office into which he came.

He had no doubt but that, in time, observation and experience would qualify him to make a very good Secretary of the Navy, provided he could get some of these large ideas of a grand and magnificent navy out of his head, and come down to what a Democratic navy should be. When we shall become the depredator upon other nations, and when we should require a large naval force to carry on our schemes of conquest and plunder, then Mr. Upsher would become a very good Secretary of the Navy, because he would be the most ultra in his notions, and would lead on our conquering squadrons in great style. But we are not yet prepared to become a conquering nation—not yet prepared to aggrandize ourselves by plunder and bloodshed; and till then we do not want a navy to the extent of Mr. Upsher's desires. There was a time when Mr. Tyler might have been almost, if not quite, a leader of the Democratic party. If, when he first came into power, he had atoned for running on the Whig ticket, by dismissing his cabinet, instead of retaining the worst of them, and had brought round him Democrats of tried worth and experience; if he had recommended Democratic measures to Congress, and used the veto a little more, denouncing distribution, and some other things,—then he would have plagued some of the Democratic candidates exceedingly. The people were almost prepared to take him up by acclamation, and put him into the Democratic pulpit as their preacher and leader. But he was not himself prepared to go altogether with the Democratic party; he was pretty much in the predicament of his (Mr. G's) colleague [Mr. BOWNE,]—that is, in what General Root once called "a state of betweenity." Almost everybody kept away from the White House; but if he had listened to the admonitions of the Democratic party, and dismissed that minister, in whom the Democracy never can confide, there would have been some chance of his being supported by them. But, instead of being dismissed, there that obnoxious minister sat, poisoning the ear of that honest man who had not the firmness and the courage to dismiss him, and come out what he originally was, and what he [Mr. G.] had no doubt he would now be glad to be.

The Democratic party, in their triumphs of 1842, owed none of their success to this Administration and their letter-writers. The people triumphed in their might. They had seen what was the course of the Whig party while in the ascendant—they had seen how little their practice accorded with their professions, and how ill calculated their measures were to promote the interests and prosperity of the country. A portion of the Democratic party, too, had been deceived; and they, coming back, contributed to their party's success.

He had a little more to say in regard to the speech of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CUSHING.] The gentleman said that he considered it as "very material that there should be a frank understanding on those matters;" that "there were men in the Administration, or connected with the Administration, who, at a proper time, might have a word to say. He did not, to be sure, know whether their opinion would be potential; but this he knew—that, of all the elements now in tumultuous and conflicting motion in the national caldron, in the grand political seething-pot, the most potential of all was the Federal Government."

The Federal Government was then in the grand political seething-pot. Who put it there? The framers of the Constitution never intended that the Federal Government should be put there. Who, then, put the Federal Government in this grand caldron—this grand political seething-pot, but those connected with this Administration? Yes, it was put in this grand caldron by those who, when the time comes round, will have a word to say; and he now saw that those connected with the Administration had something to do, as well as to say. An editor in New York, (said Mr. G.,) who has the public printing, comes out and declares John Tyler to be the candidate of the Democratic party for President, and William C. Bouck the candidate for Vice President, subject to the nomination of a national convention. Well, sir, (said Mr. G.,) they have come into our sect, and set up to be the high priests of our church; but if they wait for the nomination of a Democratic national convention to declare that John Tyler and William C. Bouck are the candidates of the Democratic party, they will have to wait a long time. Now, the paper in which this nomination was made, was the official organ; and, he took it, that what it did was by authority; so it would seem that those around this Administration have something to do, as well as to say. So far as Wm. C. Bouck was concerned, it was a foul calumny to say that he had assented to this nomination. Mr. Bouck would soon go with his [Mr. G.'s] colleague overboard, if he assented to it, for it would sink him to eternity. It was, however, doing Mr. Bouck great injustice to suppose that this nomination was made with his concurrence. It was glory enough for him to have the administration of the affairs of the great State of New York for two years to come; and he did not believe that he would give up the bird he had in hand for two in the bushes. The glory of being the choice of the people for the high office he fills, is superior to the glory of running on the same ticket as Vice President with John Tyler. He knew that, in speaking as boldly and frankly as he had done, he should tread on the corns of some of his friends who may have the appointments of postmasters to attend to in their districts. He, himself, had no influence with this Administration; and when applications were made to him for his aid in getting the appointments of postmasters in his district, he turned them over to his colleague from the Oswego district, who had more influence than he had. His colleague had long since superseded him in the office of getting such appointments in his district. He hoped that he would continue in the good work, and, when he had done, that he would return again to the Democratic ranks, and say to President Tyler that he gave him small thanks for the favors he had done him. The gentleman said that some serious collisions had taken place between the Executive and Congress, which he hoped never would occur again. He, on the contrary, hoped that they would occur again, and that they would always occur whenever an unconstitutional bill should be presented to the Executive for his signature. He hoped that every succeeding President would veto and ditto every bank bill that should be sent to him. He hoped that he would go a little further, and veto distribution bills also. If this, however, was intended for effect—if we (said Mr. G.) must vote for the exchequer—if we pass the sub-treasury, it is to be met by this "fixed fact," the threat fell powerless before the feet of the Democracy. He had supposed that the powers and the duties of the Executive were specified and limited by the Constitution.

Here Mr. G. was interrupted by the SPEAKER, and informed that his hour had expired.]

He never believed (continuing the sentence) that it was in the power of the Executive to put the Federal Government in the political seething-pot.

Mr. McKEON then obtained the floor; but yielded it to Mr. BOWNE, for the purpose of enabling him to make an explanation in reply to his colleague [Mr. GORDON.]

Mr. BOWNE observed that he was perfectly well aware that any gentleman on that floor who would attempt to answer such a tirade of personal matter as had fallen from his colleague, must, for the time at least, lay aside all self-respect; and he now presented himself to the House in that attitude, for a moment. He was thankful—knowing, as he did, the Democracy of the Empire State, and the Democracy of the district his colleague represented—that he was not their high priest, and had not the power to put up and put down at his sovereign pleasure. He knew the constituents of the gentleman; and it was through them that he had learned a fact, that accounted for his extraordinary zeal in the cause of Democracy; and he invoked the attention of his colleague while he stated it. Did his colleague remember that he once entertained the design—not carried into execution—of abandoning his party? Did he remember that, in 1840, when he was canvassing with the Democratic party for a seat in Congress, and when his prospects were dim, that his political principles sat so loosely about him that he made overtures to the Whig leaders of his district to desert the Democratic party if he failed in getting the nomination, and become their candidate? This fact (Mr. B. said) he had vouched for by the affidavits of several of the most respectable gentlemen in his colleague's district. Was such a man to lecture him, or other gentlemen, upon their consistency and Democracy? Heaven save the mark! No, sir; I will despair when my Democracy is to be judged by his judgment. I have been too long known to my constituents to fear what he can say; and will let my remarks of yesterday, together with the wilful perversion of them by my colleague, go to them, for their judgment upon them. Let them go to them together; and let them say whether I am to be thrown overboard or not. Sir, I did not yesterday, and never did, say a single word that compromised the principles of Democracy. What I then said, I repeat now; and that is, that if my attachment to Democratic principles is to be measured by my attachment to men, then I must despair of finding favor; for it is one of the cardinal principles of the Democratic party, that principles must be adhered to, rather than men. Principles, not men, is their motto; and it is one that I held to yesterday, and still hold to to-day.

Mr. GORDON rose to reply to the remarks just fallen from his colleague. [Cries of "Go on."]

Mr. McKEON declined yielding the floor, inasmuch as he had but one hour. ["Yield to him."]

Mr. GORDON said he would demand the floor. He made a point of order. He claimed the right to reply to the remarks of his colleague as a privileged question. [Laughter; and many voices "Let him proceed by universal consent."]

After some uproar, Mr. McKEON yielded the floor.

Mr. GORDON remarked, that the speech of his colleague [Mr. BOWNE] was delivered in public, made public in the newspapers, and he supposed was public property; and, as such, he (Mr. G.) had a right to comment upon it, as upon other speeches delivered in that body. He regretted that his colleague should have made such a speech, as much as he had no doubt his colleague now regretted it himself, [laughter;] but, connected as he was with the Democratic party, with whom he had ever acted, he had thought it to be due to them, at least so far as his constituents were concerned, to cut off all connexion between them and the speech of his colleague on yesterday.

With regard to what his colleague had said about him, although he (Mr. G.) hated to speak about himself, it was but fair that he should say that he was brought up a Democrat from his youth. His father had fought the battles of his country in the revolutionary war, and never came here to Congress to beg for a pension in consideration of his services.

He repeated, he was brought up a Democrat, and never had given any vote whatever which did not, in his opinion, and according to the best of his judgment, accord with the principles of genuine Democracy. As regards the statement that he had proposed to become the leader of the Whig party in his district, he would say that he never had aspired to become the leader of any party, but only a faithful follower in the right path. (A voice: "Candidate.") As to his alleged desire to become the candidate of the Whigs, on which his colleague had remarked, he would say that his colleague spoke of that about which he knew nothing, and which, in all its parts, was false. His colleague, it seemed, had gone among the Federalists of his district to pick up scandal against him. He supposed his colleague had long contemplated making use of it. It must have been some time since his colleague took up the idea of going "overboard," and knowing his (Mr. G.'s) unflinching Democracy, anticipated a broadside from him, and had prepared himself to bring it out upon the proper occasion. [Roars of laughter and shouts.]

Mr. McKEON then took the floor; but his first remarks were very imperfectly heard above the loud conversation which was carried on in every part of the hall. He held it to be necessary to meet every question openly and fairly. The true principles involved in the contest now going on were not yet developed. It was not a mere strife between parties; but one which might make an indelible impression upon the structure of the Government. The country had seen the Vice President called to the executive chair by the death of the President, who came into power possessed with all the emoluments and honors of office. The party which elected him said he was pledged to support certain measures and principles. He thought otherwise; and was compelled to use the veto power upon measures introduced and carried through Congress by those who brought about his election. Stripped of all adventitious circumstances, it would hereafter be represented to the world, on the page of history, by the majority, that they were compelled to separate from the man of their choice.

The next step to be taken was on the part of the minority. They had to determine whether they would accept the patronage, and assume the responsibility, of the present Executive—unless he gave them the measures, and carried out the principles, for which they had been contending ever since the organization of the Government. The majority here said they had left power and patronage because they could not sustain the President in the principles which he was carrying out. The question for the other party to determine was, whether they were ready to go into power with the responsibility of this Administration upon their shoulders. For one, judging from the conduct of this Administration, and speaking in the spirit of frankness, he was unable to see, either in its recommendations to Congress, or in its dispensation of power and patronage, or in its editorial department, (if that was to be taken into account as being by authority,) on what principle the Democratic party was called upon to sustain it.

But it was said, Would you wage a furious war against this Administration? He answered, No, certainly not; but the Democratic party had no favors to grant to the Executive. The President could command their support whenever he was right in his conduct. When the bank bills were vetoed, and the distribution bill defeated, in effect, by a quasi veto, they came up faithfully to the support of the principle, and not of the man by whom it was carried out. He asked, Where was the evidence of a furious opposition carried on against this Administration by the minority here in Congress? As to what had been said about ultras, it reminded him of a remark in relation to the zones. The Democratic and Whig parties were declared to be in the torrid and frigid zones, whilst the Administration was the only temperate zone There were two principles at work in the world; one was sustained by the onward movement party, which held that Government admitted of changes, reforms, and purifications; the other was advocated by a party who were for standing where they had always stood, and admitting no improvement or alteration whatever into the Government or its policy. Halfway between those two parties, the Administration desired to place itself.

Here Mr. McK. was interrupted by loud cries of "adjourn;" and yielded to a motion made to that effect.

Mr. EVERETT asked for the yeas and nays on the motion; but the call was not sustained—only 17 gentlemen rising.

The House then adjourned at 5 minutes past 3 o'clock.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, January 6, 1843.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. laid before the Senate a communication from the Treasury Department, transmitting a report from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, in answer to a resolution of the Senate passed in 1841, showing what amount of money has been refunded to the purchasers of land in the Greensborough (late St. Helena) land district: ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Also, laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, asking for an appropriation to carry into effect the law passed at the last session, authorizing an ascertainment of the damages done the property of Daniel M. Hughes and others, by certain emigrating Creek Indians; which, on motion of Mr. EVANS, was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented a memorial from a large number of citizens of Franklin county, Pa., asking Congress to repeal the bankrupt law; which was referred to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. TALLMADGE presented a petition from Brooklyn, and one from the city of New York, asking Congress to adopt the exchequer plan recommended by the Executive; which was ordered to lie on the table, where the bill on that subject now lies.

Mr. McROBERTS presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of Illinois, instructing the Senators and requesting the Representatives from that State to vote for a bill refunding to General Jackson the fine and costs imposed on him by Judge Hall, with interest thereon: ordered to be printed and referred to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. WRIGHT presented a memorial from inhabitants of Cayuga county, New York, praying that the law which authorized the issuing of bounty lands to the widows of officers and soldiers of the late war, and which expired in 1839, may be renewed and extended in such manner as Congress thinks proper: referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CHOATE presented a petition from B. Adams & Co., importing merchants of the city of Boston, asking the refunding of duties which were overpaid by them on goods imported under the act of 1833: referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. WILLIAMS presented a petition from Wm. McPherson, who was a seaman in the naval service of the United States, asking a pension for certain injuries received in such service: referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE presented a memorial from the commissioners of internal improvement of the State of Michigan, praying an extension of the time allowed by law for laying down certain railroad iron imported for the use of the railroads in that State free of duty: referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BAYARD presented a memorial from Mary Anne Boyd, widow of an officer who died in the service of the United States, asking the continuance of the pension which she heretofore received under the naval pension law repealed at the last session; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. BATES, from the Committee on Pensions, made an adverse report on the petition of Mary Furber, the widow of Pierce Power, for a pension; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. B. also reported, from the same committee, a bill for the relief of Samuel Dicy; which was read, and ordered to a second reading; and the report accompanying it to be printed.

Mr. FULTON presented a petition from James S. Conway, of Arkansas, praying to be released from a certain judgment obtained against him by the United States for the recovery of a balance of money intrusted to him for disbursement, on his paying what he alleges justly to be due: referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. EVANS, from the Committee on Finance, to which had been referred the bill from the House for the relief of the vestry and churchwardens of the Protestant Episcopal Church of the parish of St. Philip, in Charleston, South Carolina, made a report adverse to its passage; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. BERRIEN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back, without amendment, and with a recommendation that it do pass, the House bill entitled "An act for the relief of the legal representatives of Alexander Macomb, Robert Jennings, and the heirs and legal representatives of James Roddy, as sureties of Samuel Champlin, deceased, a paymaster in the army of the United States."

Also, reported back, without amendment, and with a recommendation that it do pass, the bill from the House for the relief of John P. Skinner.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE, from the Committee on the Library, reported a joint resolution for the distribution of certain copies of the census return and compendiums of the sixth census; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

On motion by Mr. RIVES, the petition of John Good, of Ohio county, Va., praying the payment to him of certain damages sustained by the location of the Cumberland road, was ordered to be taken from the files, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE, on leave, introduced a joint resolution, authorizing the Postmaster General to correct an error in the proposals, and to contract anew for carrying the mail from Chicago to St. Joseph's; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. BAYARD, on leave, introduced a bill to regulate enlistments in the army, navy, and marine corps; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. BERRIEN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back, without amendment, and with a recommendation that it do pass, the House bill to amend the act establishing a district court of the United States at Wheeling, Va.

Mr. B. remarked that as a court was soon to be held in Wheeling, it was desirable that the bill should receive the sanction of the Senate forthwith. He asked that it might be considered then. There being no objection, the bill was taken up, as in committee of the whole; and, after a few conversational remarks by Messrs. KING, CRITTENDEN, BERRIEN, and ARCHER, was reported to the Senate, read the third time, and passed.

The following resolution, introduced heretofore by Mr. HUNTINGTON, was taken up for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of so modifying the existing laws, as that each Assistant Postmaster General shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

Also, whether it be expedient to repeal or modify the law which prohibits contractors for the conveyance of the mail from carrying, without the consent of the Postmaster General, newspapers other than those carried in the mail.

Mr. H. remarked, that the Assistant Postmasters General were formerly designated by law as clerks and assistants to the Postmaster General, and subject to appointment of the Postmaster General; but by a subsequent law, they were designated Assistant Postmasters General, and made important officers. Still, the power to appoint those officers was left with the Postmaster General. He maintained that there was no good reason why these assistants, who had become, by law, important officers, and exercised the power of dispensing the patronage of office—who were, by law, authorized to exercise all the powers pertaining to the office of the Postmaster General himself, in case of the death or resignation of that officer,—should be exempt from the usual routine of appointment, (that is, of nomination by the President, and confirmation by the Senate;) especially so, as unimportant deputy postmasters, whose salaries exceed $1,000, are subjected to that mode of appointment. He then dwelt at great length on the second branch of the resolution, touching the subject of carrying newspapers out of the mails in the usual mail conveyances. He impressed on the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads the importance of the inquiry, whether it was right that the inhabitants of cities, and those living on rapid mail routes, should enjoy the privilege of receiving papers without postage, when the same privilege was not extended to those living in the interior of the country, and could not be from the necessity of the case—the same facility for thus carrying the papers not existing. He was aware that the Postmaster General had the power to grant the privilege to a contractor, at the time of making the contract for carrying the mail, to carry papers out of the mail, provided no preference was given thereby to the proprietor of one newspaper over another in the same place. But such a discretion and power was not in accordance and consonance with our institutions. It ought to be repealed; not because it was abused, but because it was liable to abuse. It gave the Postmaster General a great power over the public press, because it gave him the means of giving preference of one newspaper over another; and the time might come, when it would be used to subserve the purposes of party, and to promote its ends. The public interest, he said, did not demand that he should have the power; it was anti-republican, liable to abuse, and ought to be repealed.

The question was then put on the resolution, and it was adopted.

The Senate bill (No. 40) for the relief of persons heretofore residing within the supposed limits of Arkansas and Louisiana, but by the late settlement of the boundary lines thrown into the territory of Texas, was taken up, as in committee of the whole, for consideration.

Mr. BERRIEN, chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, by whom the bill had been reported to the Senate, explained that it was a bill of last session, which did not reach the House of Representatives in time to be acted upon. It provides relief for a class of persons who wish to remove into the United States with their property, preferring to remain citizens of the United States.

Mr. CRITTENDEN did not suppose any doubt could exist of the right of such persons to remove into the United States. They were citizens of the United States, and had an undoubted right to do so without any new law on the subject.

Mr. McROBERTS concurred with the Senator from Kentucky; and cited a case in point, which happened once between Virginia and Pennsylvania, when Virginia exercised territorial government over the town of Washington, near Wheeling, though it was subsequently found that the location fell within the territory of Pennsylvania. An issue was tried on the point, whether slaves held by citizens of Virginia in that town were entitled to their freedom in consequence of long residence in it. And the supreme court of Kentucky, before which the trial took place, decided that, although the town was virtually in the State of Pennsylvania, yet Virginia having exercised territorial government over it without interruption from Pennsylvania, the slaves were the property of their masters, and were not entitled to their freedom; that, in fact, the masters were citizens of Virginia, and entitled to all their privileges as such. He (Mr. McR.) therefore thought this law unnecessary, as the persons who resided within the supposed limits of Arkansas and Louisiana, while under the territorial government of those States, are actual citizens of the United States, and have a right to remove into the limits of the States with their property, just the same as they would have if the boundary line of Texas had been placed beyond them.

Mr. FULTON explained that, however undoubted their right might be, they might be subjected to great annoyances and expenses in trying that right; all of which could be avoided by passing this act, the object of which was to remove all pretexts for difficulty.

Mr. CONRAD thought there ought to be a slight amendment. The bill authorizes those persons to bring into the United States all their property. Now, much of this property may have been acquired since the boundary line was determined. It may consist of cotton and slaves since purchased, and not entitled to be brought into the States by any other citizens. He thought there should be a limitation to such property as they possessed at the time the boundary line was determined.

Mr. SEVIER pointed out how injuriously and unequally such a limitation would act. Female slaves, having children immediately after the settlement of the boundary, or subsequently, would be compelled to leave them in Texas, though brought into the United States themselves. Property transferred from one citizen to another since that period, or received as inheritance, might be excluded.

Mr. CONRAD had not thought of those difficulties; his mind was more immediately directed to the introduction of cotton, the produce of Texas. But if the friends of the bill thought no danger of abuse would arise, he should not press his amendment.

Mr. BERRIEN assured the Senate that the bill was very carefully considered by the Committee on the Judiciary, and that it was sufficiently guarded and confined to the objects and purposes for which it was required.

Mr. ALLEN thought some amendment was necessary to avoid an inference, which might be drawn from the wording of the bill, that those persons had ceased to be citizens by the act of this Government, and that Congress was, in this law, restoring their citizenship. He denied the power of this Government to take away the right of citizenship; and would not, therefore, sanction anything which might seem to imply that the citizenship of these persons was in the slightest degree impaired or rendered doubtful by their being thrown within the limits of Texas. To avoid any construction of this nature, he proposed an amendment, the necessity for which he explained at considerable length.

A long discussion ensued as to the necessity for any amendment; in which Messrs. ALLEN, BERRIEN, CRITTENDEN, KING, MOREHEAD, McROBERTS, WOODBURY, and BAYARD, took part; all concurring that the change of the boundary line did not impair the citizenship of those persons, and that, therefore, without any new law, they might return into any part of the United States, fully entitled to the exercise of their citizenship; but some believing that the same immunity did not extend to their property.

Mr. BAYARD suggested that, by changing a word, the difficulty might be removed. It might be expressed that those persons "returning" into the United States might bring in their property, &c.

Mr. ALLEN accepted this modification, and made his amendment comform to the suggestion. He called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

The question on the amendment was then taken, and decided in the negative—yeas 13, nays 25.

Mr. BERRIEN explained that the bill, without any amendment, provided for the return of those persons, with all their property, into the United States, upon taking the course pointed out by it, of applying to the proper court for the necessary authority to remove the property in conformity to law.

The bill was then reported back to the Senate without amendment; and was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

On motion of Mr. BERRIEN, it was agreed that when the Senate adjourn, it should be to Monday next.

On motion of Mr. CRITTENDEN, leave was granted to withdraw from the files the memorial and papers of Wm. Duvall.

A bill for the relief of the claimants of slaves lost in the Comet and Encomium, at Nassau, New Providence, and paid for by the British Government, was then taken up, as in committee of the whole.

Inquiry being made as to the nature of the bill, by Messrs. CALHOUN and KING, it was explained by Mr. GRAHAM that a balance of the indemnity paid by the British Government remained in the treasury of the United States; and that, of right, it belonged to the claimants; but, owing to the manner in which it had been kept back, (which was done to see whether any claims for insurance, &c., might spring up,) the money could not be paid out without a special law for the purpose. This act was at the instance of the department; and merely gave to the owners of the money the $7,965 which remained of the indemnity paid into the treasury for the claimants by Great Britain.

This explanation proving satisfactory, the bill was ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time.

The Senate (bill No. 38) reported from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, for the relief of George P. Hill, postmaster of New Orleans, was taken up, as in committee of the whole, and explained by Mr. CONRAD. It appeared by his statement, that in 1841, in consequence of the new regulations limiting the emoluments of postmasters to $5,000 per annum, and in consequence of greater expense to the postmaster at New Orleans than other postmasters were subject to, an allowance of $800 was made to him by the department to meet the excess of expense. But the rent from boxes and commission did not pay him the full salary and allowance—falling short about $650. This bill was to authorize him to refund himself that amount out of the box rents of the office.

Messrs. TAPPAN and KING opposed the bill; and before any question was taken on it.

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, January 6, 1843.

Mr. BIDLACK presented the petition of citizens of north ern Pennsylvania, for the repeal of the bankrupt law.

Mr. READ presented the petition of 384 citizens of Bradford county, Pennsylvania, praying for the establishment of a mail route from Troy to Athens, in said county.

Also, the petition of sundry citizens of Bradford and Susquehanna counties, praying for a mail route from Montrose, in Susquehanna county, to Athens, in Bradford county.

Mr. BIDLACK presented the following resolution; which was considered and adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions be instructed to inquire into the expediency of allowing a pension to Catharine Good, widow of Jacob Good, of Pennsylvania.

Mr. WHITE of Indiana presented the memorial of sundry shipwrights of New York, in favor of the erection of a dry dock at that place: referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

STEAM NAVIGATION.

Mr. TRIPLETT submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury communicate to this House, as early as possible, the number of steamboats, and their tonnage, employed on the Mississippi river, from January 1, 1841, to January 1, 1843, and their probable cost or value, and the value of the cargoes transported in them; the number of persons annually employed in navigating them, and the number of persons conveyed as passengers in them for the years aforesaid; the number and value of the steamboats lost or materially damaged in each of the said years, and the cause of such loss or material injury, and the loss sustained by the destruction or damage of the cargoes of such boats, with an aggregate of the loss and damage of boats and cargoes, distinguishing between those lost by the boats running on snags, bars, and rocks, and those lost from other causes; also, the number of lives lost during the said time, making the same distinction.

Mr. FILLMORE requested Mr. T. to modify his resolution, so as to include steamboats navigating the lakes; which being assented to, the resolution was adopted.

Mr. TALIAFERRO called for the orders of the day; when

The SPEAKER announced that the regular order of business would be the calling for the reports of the standing committees.

The committees being called on, the following reports were severally made.

WAR OFFICE.

Mr. STANLY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred so much of the President's message and accompanying documents as relates to the army, reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Buildings be instructed to report to the House of Representatives what amount of appropriation is necessary for the erection of an additional building for the War Department, with a plan of said building.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. CALHOUN, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported a bill for the relief of William Faber; which was read twice, and, after being ordered to be engrossed, read the third time, and passed.

PENSION AGENTS.

Mr. TALIAFERRO, from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, reported, without amendment, the bill from the Senate making compensation to pension agents; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House, and ordered to be printed.

COMMISSIONER OF PENSIONS.

Mr. TALIAFERRO, from the same committee, to which had been referred the bill from the Senate to continue the office of Commissioner of Pensions, reported the same without amendment.

On motion by Mr. TALIAFERRO, the bill was then carried through its different stages, and passed.

Mr. FORNANCE, from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, reported a bill granting pensions to certain widows of revolutionary soldiers; which was read twice, and referred.

Mr. MORRIS, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of James Gray; which was read twice, and referred.

Mr. JAS. COOPER asked leave to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the postmaster of the House be, and he is hereby, instructed to furnish to the reporters of the debates in this House such a quantity of stationery as may be required by them in reporting said debates, of which an account shall be kept.

Objection being made—

Mr. C. observed, that he understood, for the first time this morning, that the reporters had been furnishing their own stationery; and, as their reports were necessary for the information of the public, he thought the expense of their stationery at least should be borne by the House. He, accordingly, moved a suspension of the rules for the purpose of receiving the resolution.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON called for the yeas and nays, but they were not ordered; and,

On taking the question, the motion was rejected.

Mr. GILMER gave notice that he would, on to-morrow, ask leave to introduce a bill to abolish certain subordinate offices in the General Land Office.

GENERAL JACKSON'S FINE.

The SPEAKER announced that the next business in order would be the unfinished business of yesterday, which was the resolution of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BOWNE,] directing the Committee on the Judiciary to report a bill to refund the fine imposed on General Jackson at New Orleans in 1815, by Judge Hall—the question pending being upon the motion of Mr. ARNOLD to commit the whole subject to the Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. ADAMS, who was entitled to the floor, and as a preface to the remarks he was about to make, submitted the following amendment:

"Strike out all after the word 'resolved,' and insert—

"That the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom has been referred that part of the message of the President of the United States at the commencement of the session, which recommends the reimbursement of the fine imposed on General Jackson by the district court of the United States at New Orleans, in March, 1815, be instructed to report within —— days an amendment to be proposed to the bill No. 503, now in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, which shall make the bill conformable to the recommendation of the President, 'without designing any reflection on the judicial tribunal which imposed the fine.'

"And that the said committee do further report their opinion, whether the declaration of martial law by General Jackson, at New Orleans, was within the competency of his official powers, by the laws of war, without violation of the Constitution of the United States; and, if so, whether his imprisonment of Dominick A. Hall, judge of the district court of the United States, and his arrest and subjection of Louis Louallier, a member of the Legislature of the State of Louisiana, to a trial by a court martial, appointed by General Jackson himself, were justifiable acts of martial law, and not an abusive exercise of despotic and arbitrary power.

"And also their opinion whether, by the passage of this act, according to the recommendation in the message of the President, the sanction of Congress will be given to the principle that those acts of General Jackson belong to that class of cases in which punishment may well be restrained within that limit which 'asserts and maintains the authority of the law, and the subjection of the military to the civil power.'"

The SPEAKER decided that the amendment was out of order, unless the gentleman from Ten-

CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

PUBLISHED BY BLAIR AND RIVES, AT ONE DOLLAR PER SESSION, IN ADVANCE.

27TH CONG.....3D SESS. FRIDAY, JANUARY 13, 1843. VOLUME 12....No. 9.

nessee [Mr. ARNOLD] would withdraw his motion to commit.

Mr. ARNOLD withdrew his motion; and the amendment was received.

Mr. ADAMS said he had offered the amendment, in order that the bill, if passed at all, should be passed in the precise manner recommended by the President. In order to show this, he would call attention to the paragraph in the message of the President:

"I recommend to Congress to take into consideration the propriety of reimbursing a fine imposed on General Jackson at New Orleans, at the time of the attack and defence of that city, and paid by him. Without designing any reflection on the judicial tribunal which imposed the fine, the remission, at this day, may be regarded as not unjust or inexpedient."

His amendment would have the effect of returning the fine without reflecting upon the judicial tribunal by which it was imposed. The President went further, in the same spirit, and recommended the remission of the fine on the principle that the Judge was executing faithfully the duties of his office; that the treatment of him, and the trial of Louallier by a court-martial appointed by Gen. Jackson, were violations of law; and the remission of the fine was a mere act of oblivion, without impairing, but, on the contrary, confirming the propriety of the action of the Judge. The President said: "Without designing any reflection on the judicial tribunal which imposed the fine, the remission, at this day, may be regarded as not unjust or inexpedient." He hoped the House would observe the cautious phraseology of this passage. The President did not say that the remission would not be unjust or inexpedient, but that "it may be so regarded."

Again, the President says: "The voice of the civil authority was heard amidst the glitter of arms, and obeyed by those who held the sword; thereby giving additional lustre to a memorable military achievement." What was the meaning of this? The voice of the civil authority was heard and obeyed. What was that but an acknowledgment of the justice of the act? It was assigned by the President, as a motive for passing the bill, that General Jackson obeyed the judgment of the court. Farther, the President said: "It can hardbe doubted that it would be gratifying to the war-worn veteran, now in retirement and in the winter of his days, to be relieved from the circumstances in which that judgment placed him." Certainly, so far as the payment of money was concerned, he had no doubt that the remission would be very gratifying; but whether the "war-worn veteran" was willing to accept a donation on that principle, was another question.

The President next proceeded to lay down a principle of extraordinary importance; and the more so, because the President had recommended the passage of this bill in discharge of what he conceived to be his duty. What did he say? "There are cases in which public functionaries may be called on to weigh the public interest against their own personal hazards; and if the civil law be violated from praiseworthy motives, or an overruling sense of public danger and public necessity, punishment may well be restrained within that limit which asserts and maintains the authority of the law, and the subjection of the military to the civil power." Punishment—that was the word. Gen. Jackson was to be relieved from the punishment inflicted upon him for a violation of the Constitution and laws. The punishment was to be remitted. Again: "The defence of New Orleans, while it saved a city from the hands of the enemy, placed the name of General Jackson among those of the greatest captains of the age, and illustrated one of the brightest pages of our history." It was, then, the defence of New Orleans, the brilliant victory then achieved, and not the imprisonment of Judge Hall—not the subjection of Louallier to trial by a court martial, appointed by Jackson, which gave a claim to the remission of the fine. The question was, whether, in consideration of these services, General Jackson ought not to be relieved from the circumstances which this righteous judgment had inflicted upon him.

The President thus concluded the paragraph to which he referred: "Now that the causes of excitement existing at the time have ceased to operate, it is believed that the remission of this fine, and whatever of gratification that remission might cause the eminent man who incurred and paid it, would be in accordance with the general feeling and wishes of the American people." Now, he would not deny that the American people wished this fine to be paid back. It might be so. At least a portion of them wished it—a portion commonly called "the Democratic party." He would remark that the party which pushed this measure with such solicitude in the State Legislatures and in this body—where, from their extreme anxiety to avoid discussion, they wished to call the previous question—had an additional motive, besides that of relieving the "war-worn veteran" from the circumstances under which this righteous judgment placed him. Much had been recently said about setting up the Presidency at auction, as the prætorian guards once did in the Roman empire. He must say, if auctioneering was to elect the next President, that this measure—not of Anglo-Saxon, Anglo-Irish, or Anglo-Scotch, but of French origin, operating first on the Legislature of New York—was one of the best auction schemes that had entered into the campaign. All this desire of the people to have General Jackson's fine remitted, was but a species of auctioneering for the Presidency. The good-will of General Jackson was courted by all the divisions of the Democratic party. From the first proposition of the measure in the Legislature of New York, to its late sanction in the Legislature of South Carolina—the land of the bloody bill—every effort made in its behalf was traceable to auctioneering for the Presidency.

Rumors were afloat—he could not, of course, vouch for their truth—that the great presidential question between the various divisions of the Democratic party, was to be ultimately decided by Gen. Jackson himself. It seemed to be given out that he was to be the president of the national Democratic convention; and who knew what the result would be? Such were the rumors which were afloat. From what the House had seen, it was clear that all the divisions of the party were humble suitors for the good-will or neutrality of Gen. Jackson. He did not expressly assign the paragraph in the message of the President to that purpose. The President alone knew what were his motives; and, therefore, he (Mr. A.) would not say that this was a bid in the great auction. If it was, however, a bid, he would say that it was not a very good one. He thought the "war-worn veteran" would say that such a bid won't do. At any rate, he wished to have the trial made, by putting the bill in precisely the same terms recommended by the President, in order to see whether the "war-worn veteran" would take it.

He then called for the reading of the concluding portion of his resolution; and it was read. The House would perceive, from this, that he proposed to instruct the committee to inquire and report whether this would come under that class of cases to which the President referred as justifying a violation of the civil law. He wished the fact to be reported to the House. Should the bill pass in the form asked for by General Jackson, it would, in effect, become the law of the land in all future time. Should it be passed, it would be recognising the right of a commander of the army to declare martial law, and prostrate every right of the citizen. There was no alternative left. The bill must either be passed in the form recommended by the President, or it would recognise a violation of the laws. One thing or the other must be done. The question was, whether the House would consent to pass the bill in such a shape as to sanction the principle that the commander of the army has the power to declare martial law by his own authority, and without instructions from the Government, and thus take away the privileges, property, and lives of citizens at his pleasure. Sanction this, and your children to the latest day will be subject to martial law at the fiat not only of the President, but of a commander of an army. You must remit the fine, and at the same time recognise the punishment, or do as General Jackson demands—stigmatize the character of a dead man who had the courage and the nerve to discharge his duty. This, too, must be done when the judge has been dead twenty or twenty-five years, and no friend here to vindicate his acts.

After some further remarks from Mr. A., the Speaker announced the expiration of that portion of his hour that remained over from yesterday.

Mr. C. J. INGERSOLL said he thought the gentleman's hour was up.

Mr. EVERETT said the question was a new one, an amendment having been offered, and the gentleman was entitled to his hour.

Mr. C. J. INGERSOLL replied that if a gentleman might thus renew questions, he might go on to speak forever.

The SPEAKER decided that the gentleman from Pennsylvania had the floor.

Mr. C. J. INGERSOLL said that he designed not to enter entirely into the discussion on this subject, but to address himself to——

Mr. ADAMS rose, amidst a confused noise of voices, and addressed the Chair.

Mr. C. J. INGERSOLL said he had the floor.

Mr. ADAMS said he claimed the benefit of the rules, according to previous practice.

Mr. C. J. INGERSOLL said, unless there was an appeal, he should not yield the floor.

Mr. ADAMS retorted that the gentleman was not entitled to the floor, and he (Mr. A.) claimed it, according to the practice of the extra session, at which one gentleman made a speech of two hours' length by simply changing the question at the expiration of his first hour.

Mr. WISE begged leave to state a fact in justification of the Chair.

The SPEAKER, however, went on to explain the case to which allusion had been made; and he was understood to say that there was not a two hours' speech made, as the gentleman from Massachusetts had averred; but when the gentleman who had the floor got through his hour, a new question was made, and the same gentleman got the floor on that new question. There was not a continuance of a speech by a change of the question by the gentleman on the floor; and if it were allowed, it must be obvious to the House that it would operate as a repeal of the hour rule, and a gentleman might, in that way, speak a week.

Mr. WISE reminded the Chair that, at the extra session, he attempted to do what the gentleman from Massachusetts now wished to do; but the Speaker overruled him, and the Chair was sustained by the House.

Mr. WINTHROP inquired if, during the discussion on the bankrupt law, this rule had not been dispensed with. He was understood to refer to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. GORDON,] who spoke some days ago, and again yesterday, on that bill. [A member was heard to say that the question was then in a different shape.] To bring the question before the House, he appealed from the decision of the Chair.

The SPEAKER explained, that when the gentleman from New York [Mr. GORDON] spoke some days ago, the question was in a different shape; and that, it having been changed, he again got the floor yesterday, which was not inconsistent with the rule.

Mr. WINTHROP said the gentleman from Massachusetts spoke this morning under a new motion; and it was not a case of a gentleman who made a motion, to lengthen his time to speak.

The SPEAKER replied that the gentleman from Massachusetts occupied half an hour yesterday, and he had the floor this morning, to occupy the residue of his time; and therefore he was not entitled to further time, because, in the course of his speech, he submitted an amendment.

Mr. WINTHROP withdrew his appeal.

Mr. C. J. INGERSOLL then resumed his speech, but for some time he was scarcely audible above the hum of conversation which prevailed through the hall. He was, however, understood to say that he should confine himself to an answer to the speech of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS,] reserving himself for a future opportunity to discuss the matter at large, when he should come fully and fairly before the House and the country; and he could assure the gentleman from Massachusetts that he should treat him with all proper courtesy and respect. But he might now congratulate him and the House, that, after a month's inexplicable silence, he had at length recovered his speech; and, in addition to that, he congratulated the gentleman from Massachusetts on his return—he would not say to the prætorian guard, or to any other guard; for, if his reading was correct, the prætorian guard not only put up at auction the Roman empire, but they sold it to a negro—but he congratulated him on his return to presidential support. He, (Mr. I.,) however, would say that the presidential message had not prompted his action. And this he would say, that, as he was the only member of this House who stood upon that floor on the 6th February, 1815, when the news of the victory of New Orleans arrived—and never could he forget it—so he was the author of the modest bill on the table, exculpating the judge, and removing the stain from one individual, without communicating any tarnish to the other.

As he was here in 1815, and was here now, with a heart full of gratitude to Andrew Jackson—though, as he was reminded on a former occasion, General Jackson thrust him from office, [laughter;] and therefore he (Mr. I.) was under no obligation to him—he acted here with respect certainly for the President, but without caring what the President had recommended. He acted because his immediate constituents had sent here many petitions, and urged him at the last session to bring the matter to the consideration of Congress. In that he had motive for action; and the House would do him the justice to observe that, having, by great good fortune, navigated a little bill through the perilous difficulties of a committee, in which the Speaker knew he was in a very humble minority—and having presented a report there, through the kindness of his associates on that committee, (with whom he had enjoyed the most pleasant personal intercourse, as he hoped he should continue to do,) and a gentleman from Georgia, who was not here this session, but who at the last session gave him his countenance and support,—he repeated, he hoped the House would do him the justice to observe that he had waited for no recommendation from a gentleman sometimes called John Tyler, sometimes Captain Tyler, and sometimes the President of the United States, signifying that it should be done; but he had acted upon those things of which the gentleman from Massachusetts was the special champion—the petitions of the people—particularly his own constituents. He had not even wanted the promptings of Maj. Davezac or Captain Anybody; but he had acted on that for which he hoped he should have credit, and that he should not be included in the cruel imputations and the unsparing disparagement with which the gentleman from Massachusetts had this morning assailed the motives of every gentleman who had taken part in this debate. Under all the circumstances, in what he had said and done, he hoped his motives might not be supposed to be what they were not. He had, however, risen for the purpose—

The SPEAKER here, by the falling of his mallet, announced to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the morning hour had expired.

Mr. C. J. INGERSOLL said he was called by some extraordinary circumstances to go home to-morrow; and, if he might be allowed to go on to-day, he would be glad to do so. [Cries of "Let him go on."]

The SPEAKER was about to put the question whether the gentleman from Pennsylvania should be allowed to proceed? when

Mr. EVERETT objected.

Mr. C. J. INGERSOLL moved a suspension of the rules, that he might be allowed to proceed.

The SPEAKER put the question on that motion; on which, there were 97 in the affirmative, and 70 in the negative. The motion was lost—two-thirds not voting in the affirmative.

Mr. C. J. INGERSOLL afterwards said he would remain until to-morrow, for the purpose of finishing his remarks.

Mr. GIDDINGS called for the orders of the day, viz: private bills.

Mr. EVERETT moved that the House resume the consideration of the bill for the repeal of the bankrupt law; and he expressed a hope that the question might be taken to-day.

The SPEAKER said the motion of the gentleman from Vermont would require a suspension of the rules.

Mr. EVERETT moved a suspension of the rules.

Mr. HOPKINS called for the yeas and nays: and they were ordered, and resulted thus—yeas 113, nays 90; which was less than a majority of two-thirds, and, therefore, the motion did not prevail.

On motion of Mr. COWEN, the House then resolved itself into Committee of the Whole; and the following bills, to which no objections were made, were severally considered and laid aside to be reported to the House:

A bill for the relief of Asahel Lee, Harvey Lee, and Samuel Lee.

A bill for the relief of John Coxe.

A bill for the relief of Samuel B. Tuck.

A bill for the relief of Thomas D. Gilson.

A bill for the relief of Joseph R. Chandler.

A bill for the relief of the heirs or the assignees of the heirs of Isaac Todd and James McGill.

A bill for the relief of Jonathan Britton.

A bill for the relief of Daniel Dunham.

A bill for the relief of David Allspach.

A bill for the relief of James E. Hunt and others.

A bill for the relief of Conrad House.

A bill for the relief of Boyd Reilly.

A bill for the relief of George Randall, John C. Haskell, and E. H. Holmes.

A bill for the relief of Robert G. Ford.

A bill for the relief of William D. Smith.

A bill for the relief of Catherine Wilson; and

A bill for the relief of the heirs and legal representatives of Major General the Baron de Kalb, deceased.

Mr. FILLMORE wished to have taken up a bill to refund a certain sum of money which had been deposited in the treasury, and which could not be drawn therefrom without authority of law—(understood to have been deposited there by Mr. Forsyth.)

After some conversation, in which Messrs. GIDDINGS, COWEN, and UNDERWOOD participated, objection was made.

On motion of Mr. COWEN, the committee then rose, and reported a number of bills to the House.

The following bills were then ordered to be engrossed, and afterwards read a third time, and passed:

An act for the relief of Baron De Kalb.

An act for the relief of Asahel Lee, Henry Lee, and Samuel Lee.

An act for the relief of Samuel D. Tuck.

An act for the relief of John Coxe.

An act for the relief of Thomas D Gilson.

An act for the relief of Joseph R. Chandler.

An act for the relief of the heirs or the assignees of the heirs of Isaac Todd and James McGill.

An act for the relief of Jonathan Britton.

An act for the relief Daniel Dunham.

An act for the relief of David Allspach.

An act for the relief of James E. Hunt and others.

An act for the relief of Conrad House.

An act for the relief of George Randall, J. C. Haskell, and E. H. Holmes,

An act for the relief of Robert G. Ford.

An act for the relief of Catherine Wilson.

An act for the relief of Boyd Reilly.

The question then came up on the motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill for the relief of the heirs of Philip Renault was passed.

Mr. YOUNG addressed the House at some length; and then,

On motion of Mr. FESSENDEN,

The House adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, January 7, 1843.

Mr. GUSTINE presented the petition of George A. O'Brien, for indemnification for losses sustained by his father, Richard O'Brien, Consul General of the Barbary powers previous to 1800.

Mr. READ presented the petition of sundry citizens of Tioga county, Penn., praying for a new post-route in said county, from Elkland to Middleburg; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. DODGE of Wisconsin presented the petition of inhabitants of the town of Southport, Territory of Wisconsin, numerously signed, asking Congress for an appropriation for a light-house at that town, on the western shore of Lake Michigan.

Mr. SOLLERS introduced the Hon. CHARLES S. SEWELL, the successor of the Hon. JAMES W. WILLIAMS, deceased, who took the oath and his seat.

Mr. BOARDMAN presented a petition of a portion of his constituents, praying for a reduction of the rate of postage on letters, and the adoption of the penny-postage system.

Mr. HUNT offered the following resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads inquire into the expediency of establishing, by law, a mail route between the village of Lansingburgh and Scaghticoke Point (in the county of Rensselaer and State of New York) on the Scaghticoke and Lansingburgh turnpike road.

Mr. UNDERWOOD asked the House to discharge the Committee of the Whole from a small bill to establish a new judicial district in Kentucky, so that it might be passed.

Objections were made, and the committee was not discharged.

Mr. ARNOLD moved that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union be discharged from House bill No. 548, being a bill to reduce the compensation of members of the Senate and House of Representatives, and the Delegates from the Territories, and to repeal all other laws on that subject; and that the same be made the special order of the day for Monday next.

Objections were made.

Mr. ARNOLD moved a suspension of the rule, and on that motion he called for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HOPKINS inquired if that subject had been considered in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER's reply was not distinctly heard; but, after a few words from Mr. CUSHING, the question was put on ordering the yeas and nays, but it was not carried.

Mr. ARNOLD called for tellers; but only nineteen rose in support of that call, and tellers were not ordered.

The question was then taken on the motion to suspend the rules, and it was negatived.

On the motion of Mr. H. DODGE, it was

Resolved, That the Committee on the Territories be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the election by the people of the Territory of Wisconsin of sheriffs, judges of probate, justices of the peace, and of all other officers now elected by the people of the Territory of Iowa.

On the motion of Mr. COLES, it was

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be directed to report to this House whether the officers of the exploring expedition have received extra pay for their services; and, if so, to report specially as to the propriety of sanctioning such payments, or of enforcing their repayment.

On the motion of Mr. HENRY, it was Resolved, That the Committee on Private Land Claims be instructed to inquire into the propriety of granting 160 acres of bounty land to John McGinnis, of Mercer county, Pa., a soldier in the late war, who enlisted the 1st day of March, 1813, for the period of during the war, served in the corps of artillery, and was discharged the 17th March, 1815; and that said committee report by bill or otherwise.

On the motion of Mr. McKEON, it was

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to communicate to this House the names of the parties entitled, and the amounts respectively due, of the old funded and unfunded debt payable on presentation.

On the motion of Mr. FILLMORE, it was

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to communicate to this House any reports in relation to the lake harbors which may have been received since his annual report.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON objected to any other business that would interfere with the regular morning business.

The SPEAKER then called for reports from committees.

Mr. C. J. INGERSOLL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill supplemental to an act of the 24th of May, 1828, to continue a copyright to John Rowlett; which was read twice, and committed.

Mr. BURNELL, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the petition of certain persons composing the guard of marines of the late exploring expedition, under Lieut. Wilkes, moved that the committee be discharged from the consideration thereof, and that the said petition do lie on the table.

He went on to make some observations on his motion, amidst frequent interruptions.

After some further remarks from Mr. BURNELL,

Mr. FESSENDEN moved to lay the motion upon the table.

Mr. BURNELL called for the yeas and nays, but they were not ordered; and, on taking the question, the motion was agreed to.

GORDON'S DIGEST.

Mr. TILLINGHAST, from the Committee on the Library, reported a joint resolution providing for a subscription for a certain number of Gordon's Digest; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

RETRENCHMENT.

Mr. GILMER, in pursuance of notice given, introduced a bill, on leave, to abolish the offices of Recorder and Solicitor of the General Land Office; which was twice read, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House.

GENERAL JACKSON'S FINE.

The House then resumed the consideration of the resolution submitted by Mr. BOWNE, in relation to the fine imposed on General Jackson at New Orleans, by Judge Hall; the question being upon the amendment offered yesterday by Mr. ADAMS, to refer the subject to the Committee on the Judiciary, with certain instructions.

Mr. C. J. INGERSOLL, who had the floor, continued his remarks commenced yesterday, and noticed, in the first place, an incorrect report of what he then said, which he found in two daily papers of this city. From these reports it would appear that he disclaimed the weight and influence of the Executive recommendation on this subject; which was incorrect. On the contrary, he felt obliged to the President for bringing it to the notice of Congress. All that he meant to say was, that his course had been taken out of respect for his own constituents, and in consequence of petitions on the subject presented by them; and that he did not need Executive influence to induce him to persevere.

He desired to address himself, as he said yesterday, to what he considered a great and important principle in the American Government; and to notice, also, the views that had been taken in relation to this matter by the honorable and venerable gentleman from Massachusetts, whose weight of character attached importance to his argument, and the method and manner in which he had thought proper to state those views to the House. He would rather, however, in the first place, submit his own views of the subject, (though he might thereby lose what he desired to say in reply to the honorable gentleman,) and return to him after he had done with that part of the subject.

The report that he had the honor to submit to the House, and the bill accompanying it, carefully exonerated the judge who imposed the fine from all censure; and he endeavored to comply with what appeared to him a sense of justice as well as of propriety in presenting the facts of the case, without casting the slightest doubt upon what was admitted by all—and that was, the supremacy of the laws. There could be no liberty without law; and he wished to be distinctly understood as disclaiming everything like the remotest intention of, in any manner, impairing the obligations of law. With these views he would, therefore, distinctly say, (without designing to impugn the motives of the judge,) now that the matter had been forced on him by the arguments of the venerable gentleman from Massachusetts—and enforced, too, in a strain of contumely and obloquy on the commanding general who was the subject of this debate—that the fine he sought to have refunded was not imposed by the authority of law. He desired to meet the issue tendered by the gentleman before the American people; and, as a lawyer, he took his stand on the principle that, if they did not refund this money, the Congress of the United States would sanction a judicial usurpation infinitely more dangerous than martial law in all its most odious circumstances. We have (said Mr. I.) a pamphlet put into our hands, entitled "Martial Law, by a Kentuckian;" the author of which he did not know, and of whom he did not wish to speak in terms of disrespect, but who, it seemed to him, did not understand the subject upon which he wrote. It appeared to him that the argument in that pamphlet was fallacious, the positions unsound, and the assumptions extremely dangerous. He would read, from the third or fourth column, the following sentence:

"The General was arraigned before the court without the intervention of a jury, but according to law and universal usage of all courts of justice, and ordered to pay a fine," &c.

Sir, (said Mr. I.) I deny the truth of the principle there laid down, and consider it as infinitely more dangerous than martial law, of which we have heard so much. There is no such law, and I undertake to convince this country of the truth of my assertion. He knew, (Mr. I. continued,) what the fate of this bill was to be—that it would fail; but if it did fail on the principles advanced by the gentleman from Massachusetts, that the imposition of the fine on General Jackson was a righteous judgment—if it failed on the principle advanced in the Kentucky pamphlet which he had just referred to—then he would say that it failed on no principle of law, but on principles infinitely more to be dreaded than the exercise of authority under martial law. He repeated that he disclaimed any intention of casting imputations on the motives of the Judge. He would cast that aside. Nay, he would cast aside the General himself; strip him of his triumphs and the laurels he had gained, and let him be taken as the vilest malefactor, and liable to punishment. But what right had any judge in this country to take a man by his mandate, and, dispensing with the trial by jury, to put him to torture to compel him to answer, (for that was torture;) and if he did not, to inflict on him a fine ad libitum? If he could do that, he might imprison him as well as fine; and, sir, why not torture him? Why not torture him to death? Why not question him upon the rack? It was all comprised in this judicial discretion which the Kentucky pamphlet talked of. He challenged all the lawyers in the House to that issue. He meant to go before the country with the issue, that if they did not give back this money to the General, which was thus unlawfully taken from him, though he might have been a thief, a murderer—nay, the vilest criminal in existence—they sanctioned the grossest judicial usurpation. The Judge proceeded in what Mr. Burke called the best and most authentic absurdity of form to administer the English common law of contempts. But was English common law the law of Louisiana? Was English common law the law of the United States? Would any lawyer pretend that it was? The Supreme Court, in two cases, which Mr. I. quoted, had decided that the common law is not the law of the United States. Sir, (said Mr. I.,) there was no law whatever for this, which was called by the gentleman from Massachusetts a righteous judgment. For this there was no law whatever, but the monstrous principle that it was good for a judge to enlarge his authority, and to protect his power.

If there was no English law, then, and no statute law for this judgment, are we (said Mr. I.) to be thrown upon the civil law? Are we to be thrown upon that mixture of the law of Louisiana, which is English, and Spanish, and French? What would be the consequence? Why, martial law was part of the civil law; we take leave of that of England; we are no longer in Saxondom, but we are in the countries of Roman, Spanish, and French jurisprudence—countries of the auto da fé and of military power; and the Judge acted under the very law which the General was censured for declaring. He desired (Mr. I. said) to be told what authority this Judge had for this righteous judgment. He knew that it was very easy for a brother judge, or a bigoted lawyer, to make out a justification for him; and, as applicable to the readiness with which some of the legal profession would sanction such abuses of judicial power, he begged leave to quote a passage or two from Mr. Hallam, the best writer on constitutional law that he knew. Mr. I. then read the following:

"Time changes anomaly into system, and injury into right; example begets custom, and custom ripens into law; and the doubtful precedent of one generation, becomes the fundamental maxim of another.

"With the usual bigotry of lawyers defending every pretension or abuse to which their received standards of authority give a sanction."

Yes, sir, (said Mr. I.,) that is what emboldened the Kentucky pamphleteer to say that "the General was arraigned before the court, without the intervention of a jury, but according to the universal usage of courts of justice, and ordered to pay a fine." He knew that he was speaking here in the presence of a great majority of the profession of which he was an humble member, of which he desired to speak without disparagement; but guarding against the bigotry of a profession defending every pretension or abuse to which their received standards of authority gave sanction.

Sir, (said Mr. I.,) the moment we come to the principles and elements of justice, without what Mr. Jefferson called "lubberly law books," there is no foundation of this righteous judgment? Would it be endured in any State in the Union? Every gentleman knew that, in 1831, an act of Congress was passed limiting the powers of the courts in cases of contempts, and restricting the exercise of their authority in such cases to their own officers, attorneys, and witnesses, or to direct obstruction of their administration. Why, when this Judge returned to New Orleans, did he not bring his action of trespass against the commanding general? Why did he make the law in his own case, administer the law, and execute the law? Are we, (said Mr. I.,) the Congress of the United States at this time, to keep in our possession a fund extorted in this way? He wished to avoid this question; but it had been forced on him by the arguments of the venerable gentleman from Massachusetts; and he met it, therefore, without hesitation. He denied that there was any law to sustain the Judge in his arbitrary proceedings. He denied that any judge had the right to proceed in this way. He denied that there was any statute or any common law to justify him. He denied that there was any law whatever, unless they fell into those codes of which martial law was a portion. Mr. I. then referred to the bills passed refunding the fines imposed on Holt and Lyon, under the alien and sedition laws, in consequence of the prevailing opinion that those laws were unjust and tyrannical. Mr. I., after a few more observations on this branch of the subject, explained what he considered martial law to be; premising that he dissented from Mr. Kendall's article in the Democratic Review, (which had been put into his hands since he began to address the House,) as well as the opinions of the gentleman from Massachusetts on this subject. He also explained the distinction between martial and military law. Martial law, according to his ideas, was nothing more than extreme necessity. A declaration of war authorizes every species and contrivance of destruction, as the inevitable means of ulterior good. It is the law of mere and sheer necessity, substituted for all common, enacted, or judicial law—analogous to the cases of self-protection from personal violence, when life may be taken in self-defence, relying on future justification by due course of law. General Jackson found himself with an undisciplined and inferior force before a large army, composed of well-disciplined veterans, stimulated by the promise of "beauty and booty," from whom it was indispensably necessary, and his duty, to save the city and inhabitants committed to his charge; and he was, by the same principle, constituted the best, if not the only, judge of what was indispensably necessary. Under these circumstances, he proclaimed martial law, assuming the responsibility, throwing himself upon the justice of his country for his justification. Martial law, then, was the law of extreme necessity—such as would authorize any individual to arrest, without waiting for the process of a magistrate, a man who was about to commit a murder, or fire a house.

Mr. I. said, that in Blackstone's Commentaries, and in Hale, these principles would be found philosophically and satisfactorily explained. He disavowed Mr. ADAMS's doctrine, that martial law is the constant attendant of war; and Mr. Kendall's position, that martial law is always the law of a camp in time of war. He agreed in the principle asserted by Mr. Livingston, as his opinion was given in Mr. Kendall's view of this subject—that martial law, distinguishable from military law, is the occasional and temporary application of extreme force to the furtherance of a great belligerent purpose. General Jackson's proclamation of martial law was nothing more than notice that the state of things in New Orleans required the application of that absolute power which dispensed with all the ordinary course of law, and that he assumed the responsibility of making such application.

The morning hour having expired, Mr. I. asked a few minutes longer, to enable him to finish what he had to say.

Objections being made, with cries of "Go on; go on"—

Mr. CLIFFORD moved to suspend the rules; which motion prevailing—

Mr. INGERSOLL continued; and, after further commenting on martial law, and explaining the distinction between it and the ordinary laws of war, he proceeded to express his regrets at the manner and tendency of the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts on this subject, very different from the manner in which one past President should speak of another, and contrary to what Gen. Jackson would do under like circumstances as to Mr. ADAMS. He hoped that he, upon reflection, would regret many things that he had said, and would think that many parts of his speech had better have been left unsaid. He [Mr. ADAMS] had characterized the refunded fine as a pension to a past President; which was not a candid view of it. But suppose it was: had not the gentleman from Massachusetts lately voted a much larger pension to the widow of another past President? which surely was a much stronger case. Mr. I. had voted with him on that occasion, and felt no regret at having done so, as he believed it was right, as he had heard the late Wm. Lowndes say that pensions, when individuated by act of Congress, are not inconsistent with our republican Government. The venerable gentleman from Massachusetts himself is in fact a pensioned past President, for he enjoys, by virtue of that office, the franking privilege, which, though small in amount, is the same thing in principle. After thus, with an ungenerous fling, denouncing an act of justice as a pension, the gentleman from Massachusetts next proceeded to speak contemptuously of it as a donation, which he (Mr. I.) also emphatically denied it to be.

Sir, (said Mr. I.) I envy the gentleman from Massachusetts his large instrumentality, first as Secretary of State, and afterwards as President of the United States, in that most munificent of republican donations, the grant to Lafayette; and I trust that that venerable gentleman would not rather bestow on a French foreigner than his own immediate countryman such donations as the rewards of inestimable public service.

Lastly, and worse than all, the gentleman spoke of it as a charity, after a night's reflection on the subject; and contumeliously said that he would give a farthing of alms to the war-worn veteran—"Date obolum Belisario." If this sarcastic charity had been even charitably mentioned, there might be some excuse for it; but as it fell from the venerable member, I submit to his own sense of charity, that it was an uncharitable sarcasm. General Jackson needs no charity—no pecuniary help; all he desires is, that Congress should wipe a stain from his renown—should not suffer him to go to posterity, and be tarnished in history as a violator of law and usurper of despotic power. Mr. I. regretted, for the honor of the country, that one ex-President should speak in such terms of contumely of another.

Mr. I. next referred to Mr. ADAMS's admirable vindication of General Jackson for his invasion of Florida, and his course with regard to Arbuthnot and Ambrister, which he said was so powerful and luminous an argument on the necessity of the case, that the British Government was satisfied, and convinced that, if we had not law, we had justice on our side.

Invading the Spanish territories without order or authority, capturing their forts, hanging an Indian chief without the form of trial, executing two British interlopers, after a mere form of trial—all the high handed, but justifiable proceedings of Gen. Jackson in his Seminole campaign, were justified by Mr. Secretary Adams, on the same plea of indispensable necessity for the public safety which Mr. I. now asserted as the General's justification. He did not refer to this probably the best of all Mr. Adams's state-papers, in order to infer from it inconsistency with that gentleman's present position, but as the true doctrine then, as it was in 1815. After a few further observations, Mr. I.'s hour expired.

Mr. W. O. BUTLER next obtained the floor, but was precluded from addressing the House by the expiration of the morning hour.

JUDICIAL DISTRICT IN KENTUCKY.

On motion of Mr. UNDERWOOD, the House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. MCKENNAN in the chair,) and took up "A bill to divide the State of Kentucky into two judicial districts."

At the suggestion of Mr. FILLMORE, the bill was so amended as to fix the salaries of the marshals and attorneys at $200 per annum, instead of "the same as allowed in other districts."

Mr. FESSENDEN made an ineffectual effort to have taken up a bill to change the judicial district in Maine.

The committee then rose, and reported the bill to the House.

The amendment fixing the compensation of the marshals and attorneys at the stated sum of $200 was adopted, and the bill ordered to its engrossment.

It was then read a third time, and passed.

Mr. FESSENDEN moved that the House go into committee on the bill in relation to the judicial districts of Maine.

Mr. JACOB THOMPSON moved that the House go into committee for the purpose of taking up the bill to establish an additional land district in Mississippi, and urged the necessity of a speedy passage of the said bill.

After some conversation between various members and the Speaker,

Mr. FESSENDEN moved that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole generally.

The motion was not carried.

The bill for the relief of the heirs of Philip Renault came up in order.

Mr. BIRDSEYE addressed the House at length in favor of the bill.

At the request of Mr. C. J. INGERSOLL, the bill was informally passed over, in order to take up the following bill, the objection made to which had been withdrawn:

"A bill supplementary to the act of the 24th May, 1828, to continue a copyright to John Rowlett."

It was ordered to its engrossment, and then read a third time, and passed.

Mr. PARMENTER withdrew his objections to the bill for the relief of Wm. D. Smith.

The discussion of the bill for the relief of the heirs of Philip Renault was resumed, and continued by Mr. MOORE in favor of, and Mr. WM. COST JOHNSON against the claim.

At twenty minutes past 3, Mr. TILLINGHAST obtained the floor; but the desire for an adjournment was so great, that he was obliged to yield the floor.

A motion for an adjournment was made, but momentarily withdrawn at the request of several gentlemen.

Mr. UNDERWOOD offered the following resolution, which was adopted:

Resolved, That the letter of Jeremiah Lukins to J. R. Underwood be referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia, with instructions to inquire into the expediency of purchasing for the Government the clock mentioned in said letter.

Mr. J. C. EDWARDS offered the following resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the map of the western boundary of Missouri, made out by Seth Lee, accompanying the report of said survey, be printed, provided the printing of said map shall not exceed $6 per hundred copies.

Mr. BRIGGS attempted to introduce a resolution instructing the Committee on Accounts to allow pay to such members of the House as might have been detained from its service by sickness, or who should have started from home in time to have reached the Capitol by the first Monday in December, and were prevented by snows, floods, upsetting, accidents, and other impediments.

The resolution was objected to.

Mr. M. BROWN gave notice of his intention to ask leave, at the earliest opportunity, to introduce "a bill to authorize the appointment of a district judge for the district of West Tennessee, and the northern district of Mississippi."

The SPEAKER submitted several Executive communications, viz:

A communication from the War Department, in answer to a resolution of the House, calling for information as to the practicability of draining the everglades of Florida: referred to the Committee on Territories, and ordered to be printed.

A communication from the Treasury Department, asking for an appropriation to carry into effect the act of the 9th August, 1842, for the relief of David M. Hughes, Charles Shipman, and John Henderson: laid on the table.

On motion of Mr. CUSHING, the House then adjourned.

Mr. CROSS, under the resolution of the House adopted on the subject, referred to the appropriate committees the following petitions, to wit:

The petition of Joseph Wilson, of Phillips county, Arkansas, praying the allowance of a pension.

The petition of sundry citizens of Independence and Searcy counties, in said State, for the establishment of a mail route from Batesville to Lebanon; and

The petition of Elizabeth Davis, praying indemnity for property destroyed by British soldiers in the destruction of the Treasury building in 1814.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, January 9, 1843.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. laid before the Senate a communication from the Post Office Department, transmitting a report in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of 27th July last, showing what reduction of the number of miles on which postages are now charged, in the several cases designated by law, would be necessary to introduce the Federal coinage, so as not to diminish the aggregate revenues of the Post Office Department; which was, on motion by Mr. MERRICK, referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and ordered to be printed.

Also, laid before the Senate a resolution of the Legislative Assembly of Wisconsin, concerning the propriety of holding the present session of that Assembly, and condemning the course of the Governor in refusing to meet it; which, on motion of Mr. ALLEN, was ordered to be printed, and referred to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. CONRAD presented a memorial from Wm. A. Bradley, and other citizens of the District of Columbia, praying that an association may be incorporated in Washington city, to be called the Gaslight Company: referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. C. also presented a memorial from John Gregory & Co., merchants, of New Orleans, praying that they may be indemnified for a certain sum of money which was transmitted by the United States mail, and lost between the cities of New Orleans and New York; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. WRIGHT presented a memorial from several merchants of New York, urging that the bankrupt law is unconstitutional, destructive of the rights of the creditor, and praying for its unconditional repeal: referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. W. also presented a memorial from merchants of New York, praying for such a modification of the tariff of duties on cottons as will enable trade to be carried on in fine cottons. Also, a memorial from certain hardware merchants of the city of New York, praying such a modification of the tariff of duties on hardware as to give a proper ad valorem duty on imports of that character; which memorials were referred to the Committee on Manufactures.

Mr. HUNTINGTON presented memorials from citizens of Norwich, Wooster, and Donaldsonville, Connecticut, praying an appropriation to remove obstructions from, and to improve the navigation of the Thames river; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. H. also presented a memorial from citizens of the United States, praying Congress to pass a law extending the time allowed by law for laying down railroad iron imported free of duty: referred to the Committee on Finance.

Also, presented a memorial from sundry proprietors, captains, agents, and pilots in the several lines of steamboats plying to and from the city of New York, praying that the law requiring iron rods to be used fore and aft on board of steamboats, be modified so as to enable hemp to be used for tiller ropes, &c.; and praying that they may be relieved from the penalties incurred under the law: referred to the Committee on Commerce.

On motion of Mr. HUNTINGTON, it was ordered that the petition of Charles Larabee, for an increase of pension, be taken from the files of the Senate, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

On motion of Mr. MERRICK, it was ordered that the memorial of the president and directors of the Georgetown College, praying for an act of incorporation, be taken from the files, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. CRAFTS presented resolutions adopted by the Legislature of Vermont, requesting the Representatives and instructing the Senators from that State to vote for the repeal of the bankrupt law: referred to the Judiciary Committee.

Also, resolutions responding to the resolutions passed by the Legislature of New York, in favor of the abolition of the franking privilege, and in favor of a reduction of the rates of letter postage, and instructing their Senators to vote accordingly: referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Also, resolutions passed by that Legislature, requesting the Representatives, and instructing their Senators from that State, to vote for the extension, for five years, of the law granting commutation to widows: referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, resolutions passed by the Legislature of that State in favor of abolishing slavery in the District of Columbia and the Territories.

The question of reception was raised; when

Mr. KING moved to lay that question on the table.

Mr. TAPPAN said, if he understood the matter, it was not an abolition petition, but the resolution of the Legislature of a sovereign State—Vermont; and was not therefore involved within the rule.

The CHAIR remarked that resolutions of the Legislatures of the States, upon the subject of abolition, fell under the operations of the rule, to the same extent as abolition petitions.

The question was then put on the motion to lay the question of reception on the table, and decided in the affirmative.

Mr. TAPPAN presented the credentials of his friend and colleague, WM. ALLEN, who has been elected by the Legislature of Ohio a Senator in the Congress of the United States for a term of six years from the 4th of March, 1843.

Mr. MILLER presented a memorial against the repeal of the bankrupt law; which was referred to the Judiciary Committee.

Also presented a memorial, signed by 180 merchants, traders, and mechanics of Alexandria, asking Congress to recharter the Bank of the Potomac and the Farmers' Bank of Alexandria for a period of ten years: referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. FULTON presented resolutions adopted by the Legislature of the State of Arkansas, requesting the Representative and instructing the Senators from that State to vote for the bill to refund to General Jackson the fine and costs imposed on him by Judge Hall at New Orleans.

Mr. FULTON expressed a hope, as so many resolutions of instruction from the Legislatures of the States had been presented on the subject of this fine, (which had been so unjustly imposed,) that the bill would be speedily acted upon in the Judiciary Committee, reported to the Senate, and finally passed.

Mr. F. also presented resolutions from the same source, in favor of further appropriations to complete the forts on the frontiers of Arkansas: referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

On motion by Mr. WOODBRIDGE, it was ordered that the petition of Joseph Campeau, in relation to a claim to land, be taken from the files of the Senate, and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. W. also presented a petition from John R. Williams, praying that a warrant for a certain tract of land may be patented: referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. ARCHER presented a memorial numerously signed by citizens of Richmond, Virginia, urging that the bankrupt law was destructive of all confidence between man and man, and asking for its unconditional repeal: referred to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. KERR presented a memorial from a large number of the citizens of Baltimore, against the repeal of the bankrupt law; which was referred to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. GRAHAM, from the Committee on Claims, reported back, without amendment, and with a recommendation that they do pass

House bill for the relief of Samuel Hambleton; and House bill for the relief of the administrator of John Jackson.

Also, reported back from the same committee, House bill for the relief of Dexter Hungerford, of Watertown, Jefferson county, New York, with a recommendation that it do not pass.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Claims, made an adverse report on the petition of Samuel Grice, praying for indemnity for property lost in Florida; which was ordered to be printed and laid on the table.

Mr. PHELPS, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, made an adverse report on the petition of Ezekiel Wade, praying remuneration for property destroyed during the revolutionary war; and an adverse report on the petition of Lucretia Haymaker, heir-at-law of John Bowen, for bounty land; which reports were ordered to be printed, and laid on the table.

Mr. BAYARD from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported back, without amendment, the bill to regulate enlistments in the army, navy, and marine corps.

Mr. CONRAD, submitted the following resolution, which lies over for the present:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of repealing so much of the act, entitled "An act respecting the organization of the army, and for other purposes," passed August 23, 1842, as provides that the second regiment of dragoons shall, from and after the 4th day of March next, be converted into a regiment of riflemen.

On motion of Mr. WOODBRIDGE, it was

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to communicate to the Senate such information as may be in the possession of the War Department, not heretofore communicated, relative to any existing impediment to the convenient navigation of lake St. Clair, and relative to the sufficiency of the harbors, and safety of the commerce, on the upper lakes.

Mr. CRITTENDEN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back, without amendment, and with a recommendation that it do pass, House bill entitled "An act for the payment of seven companies of Georgia militia for services rendered in the years 1840 and 1841."

Also, reported back, from the same committee, without amendment, and with a recommendation that it do not pass, the bill for the relief of Thomas Copeland.

Mr. BARROW submitted the following resolution; which lies over one day:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to inform the Senate why the appropriation made by Congress, at the last session, for Fort Livingston, in the State of Louisiana, has been withheld from the officer superintending the construction of that work; and, also, by virtue of what law, or by whose authority, said appropriation was withheld; and whether the appropriation has been expended on any of the military defences of the country: and, also, that he inform the Senate whether the completion of Fort Livingston is not indispensably necessary to the military defence of New Orleans.

Mr. CRITTENDEN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back, without amendment, and with a recommendation that it do not pass, the bill to refund the balances due Massachusetts for disbursements during the late war.

On motion of Mr. CRITTENDEN, the Committee on Military Affairs was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Dr. E. Worrell, late assistant surgeon in the army of the the United States, praying to be restored to his late rank in the army.

On motion of Mr. HUNTINGTON, it was

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of so modifying the existing laws, that the circuit court of the United States for the district of Connecticut shall be held on the third Tuesday of September and the fourth Tuesday in April, in each year, instead of the time now provided by law.

Several adverse reports from committees were then taken up and concurred in.

Engrossed bill entitled "An act for the relief of the claimants to the indemnity received from the British Government for slaves taken from on board of the brigs Comet and Encomium, at Nassau, New Providence," was read the third time and passed.

Engrossed bill entitled "An act for the relief of persons residing within the reputed limits of the States of Arkansas and Louisiana, and beyond the boundary line between the United States and the Republic of Texas, as established by the commissioners appointed for that purpose," was read the third time and passed.

THE OREGON TERRITORY.

Mr. LINN'S bill for the occupation and settlement of the Territory of Oregon, came up as the postponed business of last week, appointed for further consideration on this day.

Mr. CALHOUN inquired what was the pending question.

The CHAIR said it was on the passage of the bill. It had been read a third time.

Mr. CALHOUN observed that he had been greatly gratified to learn that the Senator from Missouri, who introduced the bill, disclaimed any intention that its provisions should conflict with the provisions of our treaties with Great Britain. It was for the purpose of obtaining time to compare these provisions, and to satisfy himself that they did not conflict, that he had asked a postponement of the bill to this day. He had since examined both the provisions of the bill and of the treaties in relation to the Northwest Territory; and the result of his investigation was, that there was one provision in the bill which would conflict with the existing treaty with Great Britain in relation to this very territory. He alluded to the provision granting lands to settlers, which he read from the bill. To show in what respect this conflicted with the treaty, he should first take a review of the grounds on which both countries lay claim to the territory, and then the provisions of the adjustment by treaty, which must govern the action of both.

Here Mr. C. made a clear and precise statement of the three grounds upon which the United States Government sustains its title: first, of discovery by Captain Gray of the mouth of the Columbia river, and then by Lewis and Clark of its sources; next, by its transferred right to the Spanish title to the northwest coast; and, thirdly, to the transferred title and claims of France, through its extension of the Louisiana territory. He also stated the grounds upon which England based her claims, which were two: first, under the treaty with Spain, in 1790; and next, with regard to the Columbia river, by priority of discovery of the country tributary to that river. These conflicting claims had been the subject of negotiation, and by the treaty of 1818 it was agreed between Great Britain and the United States that the territory should be open to the subjects of Great Britain and citizens of the United States for ten years. In 1827 the treaty was renewed, leaving it optional with either country to discontinue its obligations upon giving the other a year's notice. He pointed out that the British Government merely claimed for its subjects the equal right of settlement and occupation of the territory with the citizens of the United States; and the Government of the United States insisted on its exclusive right of occupation, settlement, and jurisdiction. He also deduced, from the review of the whole case, that any provision of this bill undertaking to secure to a settler any part of land which he should occupy for five years, would be in conflict with the spirit and meaning of the treaty. For this reason, and also for another reason—namely, that it might be necessary to investigate whether the manner in which it is proposed to extend jurisdiction over the territory is reconcilable with the provisions of the treaty, and the interpretation of it by the British Government as exemplified in its acts of Parliament—he thought it desirable the bill should be committed to the Committee on the Judiciary, or the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. LINN replied, acknowledging that the Senator from South Carolina had correctly stated the claims of the two Governments, and the position in which they stood with regard to the treaty of 1818, renewed in 1827, and requiring one year's notice of discontinuance. He denied, however, that the Senator's deductions were correct—first, that the promise of this bill to make a grant of lands to the settlers, was in conflict with the treaty; and, next, that there could be any question of the right of the United States to extend our jurisdiction over our citizens residing in the territory. The object of the bill was to encourage emigration, by an assurance to those emigrating that they should have the benefit of the jurisdiction of our laws, and the security of their settlements. Without these encouragements, there would be no emigration of our citizens, and England would be left to occupy the whole country, through the agency of her Hudson's Bay Company. Through that agency, she was daily settling down her subjects—taking possession of, and occupying for all practical purposes, the choicest portions of the territory.

Through the same agency, she had extended to those settlers the protection of the British laws. We asked, by this bill, to do nothing more than Great Britain had done. If she interpreted the treaty to her advantage, we surely are entitled to make use of her interpretation to our advantage. But he did not want either the example or dictation of Great Britain in this matter. He took ground upon the indefeasible right of the United States to the territory, and to our indisputable right to extend the jurisdiction of this Government to our citizens within our territory.

Mr. CHOATE was sorry that he was obliged to concur with the Senator from South Carolina, that there was one objection fatal to the provision in the bill making a grant of lands to settlers. He said sorry; because he was entirely favorable to the bill itself, and approved of the objects and purposes proposed by it. On due examination of the existing treaty, he was constrained to say that, to grant away, or to secure a settlement, (which amounted to the same thing,) would be to exercise an ownership, contrary to the spirit of the treaty, according to which every portion of the territory is to be left open to the citizens of both Governments. The obligation not to exercise exclusive jurisdiction or ownership by either party, was implied in the obligation to leave the country free and open to the mutual occupation and settlement of the citizens of both. There was nothing in this view of the treaty conflicting with the extension of the British laws to the subjects of Great Britain residing in the territory; nor would there be in the extension of the jurisdiction of the laws of the United States, in the same manner, over our citizens residing there. There would be mutual jurisdiction; but mutual occupation could not be reconciled with an undertaking on our part to secure locations to our settlers.

Mr. LINN observed, that Congress had, at all events, made some progress in this matter. It was now admitted in Congress that there may be mutual occupation and jurisdiction, without cause of offence to Great Britain. As Great Britain had extended her laws over the territory, so may we extend ours. As she had built forts and made settlements, so may we. She is either to set us the example, or dictate to us what we may do. Now, he would pay no regard to the dictation of Great Britain. He maintained our right to the territory over which we propose to extend our jurisdiction and our population, and it was on this right he based the present bill. There was nothing in it to conflict with any obligation of the United States.

Here Mr. L. extended his remarks, in reply to portions of the observations made by the Senators from South Carolina and Massachusetts, only glanced at above.

Mr. McROBERTS followed, in an argument of much point, which showed the indisputable nature of our claim to the territory, and our unequivocal right to pass a bill with the provisions which this bill contains.

After a few remarks from Messrs. CHOATE and HENDERSON,

Mr. BAYARD submitted an amendment, which he thought would remove all difficulty. It was, in effect, that the provision of a grant of lands, as expressed in the bill, should be changed so as to read, that any person occupying a settlement in the territory for five years should be entitled to a pre-emption right, as against the United States, for 640 acres of land; and so for the share of the wife of a settler and each child for 160 acres.

Mr. CHOATE suggested that the amendment might be printed, and the further consideration of the bill postponed till to-morrow.

It was also suggested that the amendment could be adopted by unanimous consent—which it would require, as the bill was otherwise past the stage for amendment.

Mr. CALHOUN remarked that, as the modification proposed by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] required unanimous consent for its admission into the bill, he, for one, must object to it; because, if admitted, the amendment would, in his mind, be an admission of some doubt as to our title to the territory. He was not prepared to sanction any thing that could bear that construction, believing that the title of the United States was clear. Mr. C. desired to say a few words further; but, at the suggestion of Mr. ARCHER, yielded the floor to a motion for adjournment; wishing it, at the same time, to be understood that he was not entitled to the floor, as he only wanted a few minutes to express what he had to say.

On motion, the Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, January 9, 1843.

Mr. OLIVER presented a petition from 75 men and 35 women, from Yates county, New York, in favor of a repeal of the present law in reference to a recapture of slaves, &c.

Mr. O. also presented a petition from New York, of 75 men and 35 women, against the admission of Texas into the Union.

Mr. HUBARD presented the petition of John Dixon, for an invalid pension; which was, under the rule, referred to the appropriate committee.

Mr. HENRY DODGE presented the petition of the citizens of the town of Madison, the seat of government for the Territory of Wisconsin, asking Congress for an appropriation for a harbor at the town of Milwaukie, in said Territory.

Also, the petition of the citizens of the town of Jamesville, Rock county, Territory of Wisconsin, asking Congress for an appropriation for a harbor at the mouth of Root river, town of Racine, in said Territory.

Also, a memorial from citizens of the town of Racine, in the Territory of Wisconsin, asking Congress for an appropriation for a harbor at that town, on the western shore of Lake Michigan.

EXTRA PAY.

Mr. BRIGGS, by general consent, submitted the following resolution; which was considered and adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee on Accounts be instructed to allow the pay of all such members of this House as may have been unavoidably detained on their way to the seat of Government at the commencement of this session by the storms, and closing of the rivers by ice, which occurred about that time; or who were detained by being injured by accident; they having left their respective places of abode a sufficient time to have reached the capital in time to have taken their seats on the first day of the session.

IMPEACHMENT.

Mr. BOTTS desired to give notice to the House that to-morrow he should present for their consideration the charges upon which he expected to found an impeachment against the acting President of the United States.

Mr. ROOSEVELT presented a petition from sundry citizens of New York, on the subject of the repeal of the bankrupt law; which was appropriately referred.

PLAN OF THE EXCHEQUER.

Mr. FILLMORE, on leave, made a report from the Committee of Ways and Means, on the plan of an exchequer presented by the Secretary of the Treasury, and recommended by the President of the United States, concluding with the following resolution, which Mr. F. said was unanimously adopted:

Resolved, That the plan of an exchequer presented to Congress by the Secretary of the Treasury at the last session, and entitled "A bill amendatory of the several acts establishing the Treasury Department," ought not to be adopted.

Mr. ATHERTON asked leave, and presented a report on the same subject, from the minority of the committee, concluding with the following amendment, which he said he was instructed by them to offer:

And that the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to bring in a bill regulating the collection, safekeeping, transfer, and disbursement of the public money, in such a manner as shall, as far as possible, substitute provisions of law for executive discretion in the management of the finances, shall prevent the moneys of the people from being used for purposes of private speculation and emolument, and shall render the Government independent of the agency and influence of moneyed corporations.

Mr. FILLMORE said he was instructed by the committee to move the printing of the report, and he would include in his motion the report and amendment of the minority. He would further move that 10,000 copies of both reports be printed, and that they be postponed to, and made the order of the day for, this day two weeks.

Mr. CUSHING understood this to be an argumentative report from the Committee of Ways and Means, containing nothing but a negative proposition, while the report of the minority proposed some definite action on the part of the House. He therefore moved that the whole subject be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, which already had a bill before them in relation to it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maryland wished to know whether the Committee of Ways and Means intended to bring forward any bill or plan this session on the subject of the currency. He understood this to be a negative proposition—that the committee would not bring forward the plan of the Secretary of the Treasury; and he now wished to know whether they intended to bring forward any plan of their own.

Mr. FILLMORE observed that the gentleman was correct in supposing that the resolution of the Committee of Ways and Means was a negative proposition. The committee passed only on the subject that was presented to them. It would be perceived, however, that the minority of the committee had offered an amendment, instructing the committee to bring forward a bill—he supposed the sub-treasury—and a substantive proposition would, therefore, be before the House when the subject came up. In answer to the gentleman's question, he would say that he was not aware that the committee intended to bring forward any bill, unless instructed by the House. He hoped the proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts, to refer the subject to the Committee of the Whole, to be covered up by the exchequer bill of the select committee, would not prevail; as it would deprive the House of giving its opinion, by a direct vote on the proposition which came from the Secretary of the Treasury, recommended by the Executive.

Mr. CUSHING, in reply, contended that it was expected by the House that the committee should make a report containing a plan for the safekeeping and disbursement of the public money, as well as a plan of currency; and that it was their duty to make such a report. Now, the report was not merely a negative report, but a very particular kind of negative report. What did it say? Why, simply that it was not expedient to adopt this particular plan. Had the committee, then, discharged their duty to the House? Had they investigated this broad subject, that was committed to them, in all its parts? Had they met the expectations of the country? Or had they met only the limited question of how the revenue was to be kept? Compare the report of the Committee of Ways and Means with the report of the minority of the same committee. The minority saw the duty they had to perform—that it was to consider the message of the President of the United States, in reference to this subject, in all its parts; and they performed it—presenting a substantial proposition for the consideration of the House. Under these circumstances, he hoped the reference of the whole subject would be made to the Committee of the Whole—where a bill in relation to it was already pending.

How were the moneys of the United States to be kept? In what form were they to be deposited? And under what instructions, and with what limitations? None of these was presented by the act of 1779; but, in the absence of the act of the last Congress, called the independent treasury act, and of the other act which expired by its own limitation, they were left to stand on the discretion of the Treasurer of the United States.

Mr. EVERETT rose to a question of order. The question was on the motion to go into Committee of the Whole; and he wished to know if the whole merits of the finances of the country were in order for discussion.

Mr. CUSHING insisted that he was right; but if the gentleman from Vermont thought he was wrong, let him put his point of order into writing. But the gentleman from Vermont assumed what was not true; for he (Mr. C.) was not stating the whole question.

The SPEAKER interposed, as was understood, to intimate that the gentleman from Massachusetts was not out of order.

Mr. CUSHING resumed. He was of opinion that the majority of the committee were right in the view they had taken of the subject, and that it was the duty of the majority not merely to bring into the House a proposition to negative a bill—that was not the duty assigned to them—their duty was larger and higher; it was to present to the House a measure—a measure which the interests of the Government demanded, and a measure which the country calls for at the hands of this Congress. This they had not attempted to do. He would not say that they had neglected their duty; but they had not performed the duty enjoined by that House. What, then, was the proposition, and the object of the proposition, as stated by the gentleman from New York? There they had a further development of the purposes entertained by that committee. The gentleman objected to go into Committee of the Whole on that report—and why? Why, that if they did, that negative resolution would be overlaid. How? By legislation on the part of the House. Well, was not that what they were bound to do? Were they to spend their time in discussing abstract propositions? What was to be gained by retaining that negative resolution in the House for discussion, instead of taking up the resolution for practical legislation? They should not only take up the resolution, and inquire and discuss it; they should not only inquire whether a particular measure ought to pass; but they should go far beyond that—they should look into the whole scope of legislation, and inquire not only whether a particular bill ought, or ought not, to pass; but whether there was not some form of bill which should pass, and of which a majority of the House could be found to approve. His (Mr. CUSHING's) proposition was, that this subject should be put in a form for practical legislation, and not for mere abstract discussion of a party issue on a particular bill. It seemed to him that it was not only the course of wisdom and of expediency, but of duty, to refer this whole matter to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, that a bill—it was immaterial what bill, nor did he say it should be any particular bill—should be taken up. The gentleman from New York said his object was to have a direct vote of the House on the plan; but, if he wished to make so narrow an issue, it would be competent for him to make it in the House; after they should have been in committee on the whole question, in a practical form, in which there could be legislation. But, no; his object was to prevent legislation. Did the gentleman from New York desire to stand forth as the chairman of Ways and Means in that character, and say that that House was bound to refuse to make any attempt to legislate on the currency? He (Mr. CUSHING) hoped that, instead of sanctioning such a proceeding—instead of promoting a fancy discussion on a fancy resolution, he would consent that at the earliest possible day the House should go into Committee of the Whole, and attempt to pass some measure during this session of Congress.

Mr. ARNOLD said he understood the question now was simply to print; and he thought if this majority and this minority report were before them, in addition to the report which they got from the select committee nearly twelve months ago, they would understand the merits of the propositions much better. He hoped, therefore, that the printing would be ordered, and he now moved the previous question.

Mr. PICKENS asked the gentleman from Tennessee to withdraw that motion, to allow him to make one or two observations in reply to the gentleman from Massachusetts, which he thought would satisfy even him.

Mr. ARNOLD consented, on condition that the gentleman from South Carolina would renew it.

Mr. PICKENS said the report now before the House from the Committee of Ways and Means, was not for the purpose of overlaying a bill, but was in the nature of a negative proposition, and therefore, to effect the purpose of the gentleman from Massachusetts in a more efficient mode, was to let it take its course, and vote upon it in the House by yeas and nays.

Mr. WISE inquired if it was the intention of the Committee of Ways and Means to report a measure, or was it intended to do nothing more than submit a negative proposition?

Mr. PICKENS did not know what the committee intended to do, except so far as their report stated.

Mr. WISE inquired if they had such a proposition under consideration.

Mr. PICKENS again referred the gentleman from Virginia to the report of the committee for an exposition of their views and intentions; and then repeated, that in the House, on this report, they would get specific action. He did not wish to foreclose the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CUSHING] on his own bill; on the contrary he (Mr. P.) wished that gentleman's bill to have a fair hearing and discussion in the Committee of the Whole; and he agreed with the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CUSHING] that this resolution was merely negative against the bill reported by the Secretary of the Treasury, between which and the bill of the gentleman from Massachusetts there was a material and distinct difference, as there was between that gentleman's bill and all others. He was willing that the gentleman from Massachusetts should go into Committee of the Whole on his bill; but on this bill of the Secretary of the Treasury, to which they felt such particular objections, he wished specific action in the House by yeas and nays, in a tangible shape; and if the gentleman from Massachusetts wished for action by the House, he would agree with him, and not commit it to the Committee of the Whole. He concluded by moving the previous question, in conformity with his promise.

Some conversation ensued on the operation of the previous question, and Mr. ARNOLD was induced to withdraw his motion.

Mr. W. COST JOHNSON said, if they had been forced by the previous question to vote on this resolution, they should have voted while they were profoundly ignorant of the long written arguments of the several branches of the committee, which had not even been read by any gentleman, except such as were members of the committee—possibly only by the gentleman who wrote the argument. He was, therefore, opposed to giving a vote upon it, while he had not had an opportunity to examine the arguments which the reports contained. He also objected to vote on the proposition of the gentleman from New York—for the single reason, that it was presented to the House in the attitude, not of active legislation, but of a mere negative proposition, on which they might consume the time of the House, and, when it was disposed of, they would be as far from a settlement of the question as when they referred it to the Committee of Ways and Means, at the beginning of the session. Foreseeing such a result as that which they had witnessed, he voted against the reference of that portion of the President's message to the Committee of Ways and Means.

It was now seen that it was not the purpose of the committee to recommend any specific plan; and he asked, what was to be gained by this proposition of that committee? It was a negative mode of telling the House that they preferred seeing Congress adjourn to the adoption of any plan, or that there was neither capacity nor will in the House to meet the question directly, and to give a specific and tangible vote upon it. He knew how difficult the question was of settlement; but still he thought it was the duty of the House to present a specific proposition for its action, and to test its sense, that the country might see whether there was a majority in favor of any plan whatever. For that reason, he could not see how any progress could be made in legislation by voting on the proposition of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means; and, while he would cheerfully vote to print the reports, that they might have every advantage from them, he could not, and would not, agree to consume some two weeks in a discussion on a negative proposition, which, when the vote was taken, would bring them no nearer to its settlement than they were at the commencement of the session.

Mr. BOTTS said, while, of the plans proposed, he should prefer a United States bank, he must recall the House to the simple question before them, which was merely one of printing the reports, and not of the adoption of the resolution of either the majority or the minority of the committee. What was the resolution of the majority? It was simply a negative proposition, that it was not expedient to adopt the plan recommended. And what was the proposition of the gentleman from New Hampshire? It was to bring in a specific plan, which was substantially the sub-treasury. Now, was it not competent for the gentleman to move that specific plan in Committee of the Whole? If, therefore, they would keep these two subjects separate, and confine themselves to the question of printing, they might at once decide it.

Mr. FILLMORE said he was not surprised at the haste with which the gentleman from Massachusetts had attacked the report just laid on their table, before there was even time to read it, or to know its contents. The honorable gentleman had complained that the Committee of Ways and Means had presented this subject in a way that would not result in legislation, and the honorable gentleman from Maryland [Mr. W. C. JOHNSON] took exception to the report on the same ground. Now, what was the history of that question before the House? for, by recurring to that, they would see if there was weight in that objection. It was submitted to Congress at the commencement of the last session, and the report, containing the plan as recommended by the Executive, was sent to a committee, a majority of whose members were the avowed friends of the Executive. That committee, after holding the subject under consideration until the middle of February, made a report, accompanied by a bill as a substitute for the plan recommended by the Executive —a plan which had been prepared by a leading member of the Cabinet, and of which a distinguished member of the Cabinet, in a speech at Boston, avowed himself the advocate, and declared that the plan submitted as a substitute for the plan of the Executive was not worth a rush—that it was not worth the parchment on which it was written.

He then went on to remark that the subject of the currency and finance was before the House and the country in every possible phasis in which it could be presented. There was no reason why the House could not come to a vote. If any member was in favor of the plan of the exchequer, it would be easy for him to move to strike out the word "not" in the resolution reported from the Committee of Ways and Means, and thus make it declare that the plan is expedient. He should like to see the individual who was prepared to vote for it.

But the gentleman [Mr. CUSHING] had said that the committee had failed to discharge its whole duty. What was that duty? Was it to report the plan of the gentleman from Massachusetts? Was it to report a bank? No: it was made the specific duty of the committee to report another particular plan. The resolution of reference made it the duty of the Committee of Ways and Means to take into consideration such parts of the President's message as treated of the currency, "including the exchequer plan and the tariff." The Committee of Ways and Means of course had the whole subject of finance under its charge; but the exchequer and the tariff were expressly referred to it. The gentleman said that the committee should have reported some affirmative plan. Were the committee authorized to report a bill which they did not approve, in violation of all parliamentary precedent? According to the doctrine of the gentleman, the committee were bound to report in favor of the Executive plan.

Mr. CUSHING rose to explain. He did not say that the committee were bound to report in favor of the plan of the Executive, but that they should have reported some bill.

Mr. FILLMORE resumed, and was understood to insist upon the interpretation he had put upon the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. CUSHING.] He believed that the committee had discharged its duty. If the House differed from it, let the committee be instructed to report a bill in a modified form. He (Mr. F.) had been called out prematurely in this debate; and he desired to state the fact to the House. Though he had moved that the subject be postponed, and hoped it would be, for the purpose of examination; yet he would tell the gentleman from Massachusetts, who appeared so desirous of having the question passed upon, that, should the gentleman move to take up the exchequer bill, he (Mr. F.) would not oppose the motion. The House had been spending weeks in debating abstractions and political questions, in which debate the gentleman himself led off. His only desire, in wishing this report postponed a week or two, was in order to give time for its examination.

Mr. WISE said that the result of the reference of the President's message to the Committee of Ways and Means was precisely what he had anticipated and predicted. Indeed, when the motion was first made to that effect, it was intimated by the friends of the measure, (the exchequer,) that to refer the message of the President to the Committee of Ways and Means would be no more nor less than "committere agnum lupo." It was referred there simply to be destroyed—not to get some other plan from that committee, but to get their verdict of condemnation upon this one plan.

But what had the committee reported? A glance through the preamble had enabled him to discover some of the reasons on which they based their resolution. The reason was, that for ten years past the money power of the Government has been in the hands of the Federal Executive. The report said that it was now in the hands of the Executive; that such a state of things was dangerous; and that the Executive ought to be stripped of it. Now, the Executive had recommended a plan, by which he would be stripped of this power; and the Committee of Ways and Means, instead of carrying out their correct views, in which he (Mr. W.) agreed, contented themselves with saying that the plan would not do. There, their wisdom stopped. There, their patriotism stopped. They merely said that one plan out of a thousand was objectionable. But did the committee say that no other plan should be adopted? That the plan was so bad as to be unworthy of repairs? Did the gentleman [Mr. FILLMORE] say that he could not report a creature of his own brain, which would suit the wants of the country? For some years past there seemed to be but two alternatives—a bank of the United States and a sub-treasury. This, however, was now contradicted by the exhibition of the exchequer—a middle ground between the other two measures. The gentleman said this would not do: why, then, did he not give the House the model of a bank, which, some sessions ago, was made to assume any Protean shape? Could not the gentleman report that measure again? The fair and only construction of his report was, that he wished to have "aut Cæsar, aut nullus." Anything but a bank was unworthy of amendment or consideration! Did the gentleman weigh his words when he said that the exchequer could not be amended? What was the meaning of amendment? Was not every proposition capable of amendment? Was it not a common mode of amendment to move to strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert a wholly different proposition? Did the gentleman mean to say that the plan was so bad that it could not even be remedied in that form? Did he mean to say that he could not strike out the plan of the Secretary of the Treasury, and insert one from the collective wisdom of the Committee of Ways and Means? Why was not a substitute reported?

Mr. FILLMORE said, if the gentleman desired him to answer his question, he would say that a substitute had already been reported by the friends of the Executive, and was now before the House.

Mr. WISE said that the friends of the President did not themselves consider the plan of the Secretary of the Treasury to be perfect, and reported amendments to it. Was he to understand the gentleman as concurring in the amendments? No; the gentleman did not agree to them. The gentleman did not concur in the plan of the Secretary of the Treasury, or in the amendments to that plan by the friends of the President. Why, then, did he not report a better substitute? The gentleman had no answer to that question! The answer was a concealed one.

Mr. FILLMORE remarked that the majority of the Committee of Ways and Means had twice reported their plan to the House, but it was, on both occasions, defeated by the Executive.

Mr. WISE said he had now got the answer he wanted. He would go before the people upon it. A bank of the United States or nothing! He was willing to go before a jury of the country on this answer. Yes; the gentleman was willing to let the President have the power of the purse, unless he could get his national bank! Though there were regulations for the organization of the Treasury Department, yet the gentleman very properly thought that something further should be done to limit Executive discretion. When a plan for that purpose was proposed, what was his answer? A bank or nothing. There were no degrees—no gradations of policy or expediency. Aut Cæsar aut nullus, was the gentleman's maxim.

He (Mr. W.) differed from his friend [Mr. CUSHING] as to the disposition to be made of this report. He did not agree with him in wishing its reference to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. He wanted it before the House, to be decided by yeas and nays; and thus see whether one party would say that it would take nothing but the sub-treasury, whilst the other declared it must have a bank. He wished to see whether these two parties would insist upon extremes, or no measure. He was willing to sustain the previous question, and as ready to vote now as he would be two weeks hence. When the question should be taken, after the previous question was sustained, he should vote with the minority of the Committee of Ways and Means, who reported an amendment to the resolution of the majority. He should vote for the resolution of the gentleman from New Hampshire, [Mr. ATHERTON;] and he would ask the Clerk to read it aloud, for the information of the House.

[The resolution was read accordingly.]

The majority of the committee undertook to say that the plan of the Secretary of the Treasury should not be adopted. The minority did not choose to stop here; but wisely went further. They wished the majority to prescribe rules to the Executive for administering the finances of the country. In the first place, they said some plan (they did not say what) should be adopted to strip the Executive of his power over the purse of the country. In this, they concurred with the majority, and with himself, that the Executive should be deprived of his present discretion. In the second place, he concurred with the minority, that the public officers should not be allowed to use the money of the Government.

Mr. ATHERTON said the minority went further. They were in favor of prohibiting all persons whatsoever from using the public money.

Mr. WISE said he went the full length with the gentleman. He would allow none the privilege of trading upon the public money. In the third place, the minority said that they would separate the Government from all moneyed corporations. He (Mr. W.) would go that, too. He went for the doctrine in its full extent. Now, all three of these doctrines which he had named were asserted by the plan of the friends of the President. He should vote for the amendment of the gentleman from New Hampshire, [Mr. ATHERTON,] although he preferred, instead of instructing the Committee of Ways and Means—which had already said it would not concur in any plan but that of a bank, which had been twice presented, and which they knew could not be adopted—that the report and resolution should be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. When in that committee, there would be found a bill fully answering in its character to the instructions proposed. He was anxious to go into the Committee of the Whole to vindicate this measure, to exhibit all its details line by line, and to show that it comported with the instructions reported from the minority of the Committee of Ways and Means. He wished to show that it guarded the public funds; that it separated the Government from moneyed corporations; that it devised a system of law for the regulation of our finances; and that it in all respects agreed with the true Democratic theories of the present day and of the past time. He would show that the modification of the sub-treasury, proposed by the leading periodical of the Democratic party, would render it such as that it would agree with the exchequer. The only difference between them was this: The sub-treasury provided two currencies—one for the Government, and the other for the people; whilst the exchequer provided the same currency for both. He begged that the House might, at an early day, go into committee on this measure, and let a vote be taken. He begged this Congress not to go away without settling the question. He warned both of the political parties that it was not their policy to leave it unsettled. It was too much the policy of the leaders of both to keep it open. They seemed disposed to go before the country with the maxim aut

Caveat nullus—with extreme measures—and resolved not to take any middle ground. If they should continue to pursue this policy, he ventured to predict that both would be defeated, and that that party which had been most instrumental in keeping this question open would suffer most from the indignation of a suffering people.

Mr. GRANGER observed that the gentleman from Virginia who had just taken his seat [Mr. WISE] remarked that this question had met the fate he supposed it would meet, when the reference of it was made to the Committee of Ways and Means. He (Mr. G) would go further, and say, that it had met the fate he desired that it should meet, when he gave his vote for that reference. Notwithstanding all that the newspaper scribblers had said on this subject—notwithstanding all the efforts that had been made to manufacture public opinion here—notwithstanding the first and second Executive recommendations of this plan, he had declared elsewhere, and he now declared here, that there never was a time, from the moment that that plan was presented to this, when any member of either House of Congress was prepared to record his vote in its favor. We now (said Mr. G.) have that plan before us; and where is the fluttering? Do we (said he) charge it to those who have been charged with delaying the public business by useless and factious declamations? No. No sooner was the report presented from the Committee of Ways and Means, than the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, not having his cue, thought that the interests of the Administration required that the child should be strangled. He hardly thought the interests of the White House, when an opportunity was presented for the representatives of the people to vote on this favorite child of the Executive, which had been committed to the wolf—his friend from New York [Mr. FILLMORE]—were best consulted by strangling it, as the gentleman seemed to wish. No sooner was the proposition presented, than the gentleman from Massachusetts (one of the friends of the Executive) rose to see whether it could not be boiled down and frittered away in the grand caldron of the Committee of the Whole. It was not his purpose now to say anything in relation to this plan of the Secretary of the Treasury. It was enough for him now to say that he looked upon it to be a monstrous shoot of a Government bank engrafted upon the plan of the sub-treasury. We have heard something (said Mr. G) of the history of this plan, in the House and out of doors. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] spoke of the lamb's having been committed to the wolf; and let us then see (continued Mr. G.,) who has treated this pet lamb most kindly—the wolves to whom it had been committed, or the nurses whose peculiar charge it was. Let us see who has given it the most nourishment, who has been the most prepared to receive it into the folds, or turn it out to the wolves. This pet lamb—this darling of the Executive (who, although a year older than when they first saw it, seemed not to be as large as it then was,) was sent to a select committee on the 14th day of December: and what did they do? It was sent properly to a committee, within which was comprised every avowed friend of the Executive on that floor; and it was due to the Executive and to them that such a reference should be made. What was its fate? The honorable gentleman from Massachusetts—who was in the habit of every now and then reading the House a lecture on the delay of the public business—could not bring forward his proposition till the 1st of February, when this pet lamb was presented, and (good heavens) how little it looked! Having received this bill in the committee, and being head of the guard, the gentleman felt as if he could do with it as he pleased; and, after having it nine weeks in his possession, he brought it back in such a shape that nobody could have supposed that it was the one that was committed to him. If it had been turned out in the east room, the President himself would not have known it. Its tail was cut off, its ears slit, and every member of the committee seemed to have put his private mark upon it. It was then brought into the House, and they tried (said Mr. G.) to pull its wool over our eyes. [Laughter.]

When this plan first came from the Executive, there was a great anxiety manifested in the public mind in relation to it; and, therefore, it was expected that the committee would have given it a chance of being brought before the House, and considered by it. But what next? Why, the report of the gentleman from Massachusetts came in, and nothing was heard of the plan of the Executive. On the contrary, nothing was heard of but the splendid plan of the Secretary of the Treasury, and the magnificent report accompanying it. We waited (said Mr. G) a little longer; and what next? The honorable Senator from New York [Mr. TALLMADGE] presented a plan, which was extolled to the skies; while that of the Executive, as well as of the select committee, was forgotten.
